

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

EDUCATIONAL ENDOWMENTS (SCOTLAND).

*THE DUKE OF ARGYLL, in presenting a Petition for an Address to Her Majesty, praying her to withhold her consent from Scheme No. 201 of the Educational Endowments (Scotland) Commission, said: My Lords, I have a Petition to present from the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland upon the subject of a Provisional Order of the Endowed Schools Commissioners, with the authority of the Moderator, representing the Assembly, which they consider injurious to the interests of the Church of Scotland. Under the Endowed School Commission they have the power of issuing regulations in regard to all endowments connected with education. The endowments dealt with in this Provisional Order, being those belonging to the Society for Propagating Christian Knowledge, date from as far back as 1709, and a considerable sum of money is given into the charge of the Church of Scotland for the promotion of education and religion in Scotland, especially in the Highlands and Islands. My Lords, I can testify that a great deal of public good has been done for many years by these endowments. They have been employed for religious and educational purposes in some of the very poorest parishes in the Highlands and Islands. The Commissioners now propose that a considerable part of this money should be given into the charge of a new body for the purpose of education alone, and a much smaller share left in the charge of the Society for the Propagation of Christian Knowledge for religious purposes, of which I had the honour of being President for many years. Having inquired into the circumstance under which this Provisional Order has been issued, I can only say that while sympathising very much with the feeling of the General Assembly expressed in this Petition, yet, having looked into all the circumstances as far as I can, and looking at the position of the various religious bodies in Scotland which is very different now from what it was when the endowments were given, I am not prepared to ask the House to interfere with the Provisional Order of the Commissioners.

Petition read, and ordered to lie on the Table.

ELECTRIC LIGHTING PROVISIONAL ORDERS BILLS.

*LORD BALFOUR, in rising to move that the Order made on the 5th day of March last,

“That no Bill brought from the House of Commons confirming any Provisional Order or Provisional Certificate shall be read a second time after Friday, the 28th of June next,” be dispensed with, in order to enable a number of Electric Lighting Provisional Orders Bills to be read 2<sup>d</sup> said: My Lords, the House will require a word or two of explanation from me in making the Motion which stands in my name. I am glad to be able to say that it is the last time, as far as I know this Session, that I shall have to appeal for any suspension of the Sessional Orders. The circumstances under which it is necessary in this case are as follow:—Your Lordships are aware that last year an Act was passed amending the conditions under which Provisional Orders could be granted for the supply of the electric light throughout the country; and the consequence of that has been that a very large number of applications have been made, and those which are before the House are the first of the applications under the Act of last year. In consequence of the circumstances, a very great deal of discussion had to take place with the various Local Authorities concerned. The first of these Bills concerns Local Authorities in the country, and I believe the Orders confirmed by it are absolutely unopposed. With regard to the other Orders, which concern the Metropolis as well as the private Bill which has been just now moved on behalf of the Chairman of Committees, a very great deal of discussion also took place, and so important were the issues involved to the people of the Metropolis that the Board of Trade thought it necessary to have a special inquiry.

The Duke of Argyll

That inquiry extended over 18 days, before Major Marindin, one of the officials of the Board, and a Report was made upon the whole subject. Even subsequently to that Report, a very great deal of discussion and negotiation had to be gone through; so much, indeed, that the Bills confirming the Orders could not be presented to the other House in accordance with the Sessional Orders. But the other House suspended the Sessional Orders, and referred the Bill to a strong Committee, presided over by Sir George Trevelyan. The result was that, on every material point, the decision of Major Marindin was confirmed. The appeal I now make to your Lordships is that you will not allow this very large amount of discussion and expense to be wasted, but that you will suspend the Sessional Order and allow the Bills to be read a second time. I therefore beg to move accordingly.

The Resolution was agreed to, and the said Bill read 2<sup>d</sup> accordingly.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT (SCOTLAND) BILL. (No. 179.)

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE SECRETARY FOR SCOTLAND (The Marquess of LOTHIAN): My Lords, in rising to ask your Lordships to give a Second Reading to this Bill I cannot but express my regret that it has not been in my power to introduce the measure to your Lordships' House at an earlier period of the Session, altering as it does the whole condition of the County Government of Scotland. I should have been glad if it had been in my power to bring a Bill of this nature before your Lordships at a period of the Session in which you could have given a more adequate consideration to it. From the condition of the Benches of the House I am glad to see that confidence is felt in Her Majesty's Government, because it would appear from the number of noble Lords present that there must be a general conviction that the Bill is a good one, and that there is no desire to go very much into the details of it at this stage.

But I should have preferred that those noble Lords who are connected with Scotland should have been present in greater numbers to go somewhat into the details of the measure. I need not enlarge upon the principle of this Bill, because it is one to which your Lordships have already given your assent by the passing of the Local Government Bill for England last year. The Bill now before your Lordships' House simply gives effect as regards Scotland to the principles which your Lordships' House then accepted. But the circumstances of Local Government in Scotland, are so different from those which prevail in England, or which prevailed in England before the passing of the Bill of last year, that the Bill which I now place before the House necessarily differs in very important particulars from the Bill passed with regard to England last year. In some degree those differences make it more difficult to frame a measure which is to be applicable to the whole country than was the case in England, for I do not think the condition of things in England as regards the most distant parts of the country from one end to the other vary so greatly as they do between the more thickly populated and prosperous parts of Scotland in the south, south-east, south-west, and north-east, and the isolated, more thinly populated and often poverty-stricken districts of the north and north-west of Scotland. I must ask your Lordships to bear with me while I endeavour as shortly as I can to go into the details of the Bill, touching only on the more important points now, asking you to reserve the consideration of the details more particularly for a later stage when the Bill comes into Committee. But before going into the details of the Bill I think it would be convenient that I should shortly describe the existing condition of the administration and of the administrative bodies, for without that it would be difficult to explain to your Lordships what it is that is now proposed to be transferred from the existing bodies to the new County Councils. The first and most important body which now exists in the County Government of Scotland is that which is called the Commissioners of Supply. They are the chief County Authority. The Commissioners of Supply are composed of owners of land of the annual value of £100, and the owners of houses of the annual value of £200. They have a chairman elected from among their own body, who is called a convener. I allude to the name of the convener simply because it is proposed that the Chairman of the new County Councils should be called by that name. Their especial powers have reference to the police administration, of 1878 between main and other roads.

They impose all road rates, which, at their option, may be imposed on several parishes or on the parishes separately.

But under these bodies elected triennially as regards the representatives of the ratepayers there are what are called the Road Boards. They are nominated annually by the general body of the Road Trustees, and they practically to the Commissioners of Supply, who rate according to that requisition. Then the only other administrative Authority in the counties which I need refer to is the body of Justices of the Peace. In England those authorities are a very important body, and they have very important functions to perform; but in Scotland their administrative powers are small. Under this Bill the whole of their powers will not be transferred; only their administrative powers will be transferred to the County Councils, and not those with regard to the granting of licenses. The most important duty which now falls on the Justices of the Peace will be retained by them—namely, the granting of licenses. It is not proposed by this Bill to make any change in that respect. Those, my Lords, are the four existing authorities with regard to County Administration in Scotland. It will be necessary for me, I think, to refer also to the Parish Authorities. They are three in number. The first are the Parochial Boards, administering relief both to ordinary paupers and as required under the Poor Laws. The second Parochial Authorities are the Local Trustees for administering the Public Health Acts. They carry out the sanitary laws. Generally the Administrative Authority is the same as the parochial body. The rates levied under the sanitary laws are paid half by owners and half by occupiers. It is proposed to transfer the jurisdiction under the Public Health Acts from the Local Authorities to the County Councils by this Bill. The third authority of this class, which I need only refer to by mentioning it, as it is not affected by this Act, is the School Board which administers the Education Acts in each parish. Therefore, my Lords, what it is proposed under this Bill to do is to transfer to the County Councils the powers and duties of the Commissioners of Supply, of the County Roads Trustees, of the Local Authorities administering the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Acts, and of the Justices of the Peace, as far as administrative powers are concerned, but excluding the powers with regard to the granting of licenses; and to transfer the jurisdiction of Parochial Authorities as far as the public health is concerned, but not dealing with their administration of the parochial laws, or the powers of School Boards under the Education Acts. I think now, my Lords, having stated what are the powers which it is proposed to transfer to the County Councils, I should refer to the constitution and powers of the County Councils themselves. First, as regards their constitution: Under the third clause of the Bill the County Councils are to be charged with the whole of the administrative and financial business of the counties. Under the provisions of Clause 4, as your Lordships are probably aware, the Councillors are to be elected. Perhaps here I might point out the position which under this Bill it is proposed should be given to the small burghs. In Scotland, as those of your Lordships who are acquainted with the Scotch Burghs are aware, there is a large number of Royal and Parliamentary Burghs, the populations of which vary in a great degree, many of them—most of them indeed—being of very ancient origin. Some of them have, of course, almost dwindled away, and have but small populations; but on the other hand others have greatly increased and have already become large and important towns. By the Report of the Committee upon the Burgh and Police (Scotland) Bill, which sat in the other House in 1888, it was recommended that all burghs having a population under 7,000 should be amalgamated with the county. In preparing this Bill the Government have followed the suggestion and recommendation of that Committee, and it is proposed that all the Royal and Parliamentary burghs having a less population than 7,000 should for the purpose of police administration and in regard to dealing with contagious diseases among animals be amalgamated with the counties. Royal and Parliamentary burghs above that fixed limit of 7,000 will not be disturbed by this Bill. But there is another kind of burgh in Scotland. They are called police burghs, and some of them, such as Govan, have enormous populations. These burghs will, for the purposes of this Bill, be treated as in the county; they will be subdivided into wards, and each ward will send a representative to the County Council. Then this proposal has been made with regard to the small burghs: that they are to themselves elect their representatives (according to a number to be fixed by the Secretary for Scotland) from among the Town Councils, so as to avoid the expense and trouble of separate registration and separate elections. Then at first there will be in addition to the numbers fixed by the Secretary for Scotland under the Bill, four ex officio Councillors, who have been connected with the former authorities. That is to say, at the first election there will be those members in addition to the fixed number, and the object of that is to ensure there being on the first Councils some members who have been concerned in and are acquainted with the administrative work of County Government. There will be no Aldermen under this Bill: the number of the Councillors for each county will be settled by the Secretary for Scotland, and for the first election, when the number of Councillors for each County Council has been definitely fixed in each county, the Sheriff will divide the number of districts necessary according to the number of Councillors who are to sit on the Council, and each separate district will return one Councillor. After the first election there will be Boundary Commissioners appointed who will no doubt be able to perform the duty of dividing the districts more accurately than can be done by the Sheriff, who will make the division in the first instance. I now come to the question of the county electors, which is, perhaps, rather a more serious question. The electors will consist, first, of all the Parliamentary electors who are at present on the register for the Parliamentary elections, including those members of the electorate who are called "service franchise voters." In addition to that, all Peers will be placed upon the register, and women otherwise qualified as Parliamentary electors. The payment of county rates is made a condition of voting for these elections except in the case of service franchise members. Therefore there will be two payments of rates which will be essential before anyone can vote for members of the County Council; in the first place being on the County Register he will have to pay the Poor Rate, and in the second place being placed on the register for the election of County

Councillors he will have to pay his portion of the Consolidated County Rate. But with reference to the service franchise voters, they are placed in rather a different position; they will not pay any rate directly, but they are liable to their employer, who can, if he chooses, at any time insist upon the repayment to him of any rate in respect of the houses which they occupy under him. These proposals are merely giving legislative recognition to an existing practice. It is also expressly provided that if the service franchise voter has had any deduction made from his wages in the nature of rates, no further claim can be made upon him in that respect. Then there is a provision that county electors can only vote in their own divisions. Then, my Lords, comes the register. I do not think I need say much about that. The register will consist of the Parliamentary and supplemental registers, having upon it the names of Peers and of women, who would not otherwise be qualified to vote as Parliamentary electors. In reference to what I said just now about the payment of the county rates, provision is made in the Bill that in the register a mark is to be placed against the name of every elector who has not paid his county rates, and who will therefore be disqualified from voting at an election. I see that a notice on this subject has been placed on the Paper, and I think perhaps we owe it to the fact that women are not eligible to sit as County Councillors; but in that respect we are simply following out the provisions of the Municipal Elections Acts, where they are not allowed to sit upon Town Councils. The elections are to be triennial. They will take place on the first Tuesday in December, except that the first election is to be on the first Tuesday of February next year, it being impossible to complete the registers earlier, so as to allow the election to take place at the ordinary period. In addition to the powers and duties which I have already referred to, which will be transferred from the Local Authorities to the Town Councils, they will have power to appoint Medical Officers and Sanitary Inspectors for the Counties. That, I think, your Lordships will agree is a very desirable provision, because it is very desirable for the public health that the Inspectors and medical officers should have supervision over a larger area than is now possible. They will also have power to enforce regulations under the Rivers Pollution Acts. Now as to the question of rating. The principle of the Bill is that the rates should be paid half by owners and half by occupiers. But there is a very important deduction to be made from that principle, that is to say, a very important qualification as regards that principle, because the rates now levied solely on the owners have been stereotyped on the average for the last 10 years. They will continue to be paid by the owners only upon that average; and any increment above that will be paid half by the owner and half by the occupier. That is to say, the average rate of payment for the last 10 years by the owners in regard to the cost of police and for the different charges of administration in the county will be stereotyped, and the Sheriff is to fix that as the amount. There will be no appeal from his decision. But that average in the stereotyped rate is not to include any payment of debts, or the payment of any interest upon those debts. The average amount will be calculated, leaving out of that item the payment of any instalments of debts or of interest on debts. Otherwise the whole of the payments made under the authority of the Commissioners of Supply will be stereotyped upon an average of the last 10 years, and will fall to be paid by the owners only. Above that stereotyped amount any increment will be paid, half by the owners and half by the occupiers. I think this provision is a very satisfactory one. It has been adopted in recognition of the principle of representation and taxation. If the whole of the payments had been divided absolutely between the owner and the occupier, it would have placed upon the occupier to a very large extent a burden which he has never had before. It has, therefore, been thought right that, while the owner should continue to pay the average rate which he has paid during previous years, any increment upon that rate should be paid equally between him and the occupier after the establishment of the County Council. Then, my Lords, with regard to certain functions of administration, it has been thought that the country, as a rule, is too large an area; and under the Bill, except in very small counties, not exceeding six parishes, they must appoint District Committees. They must divide the counties into districts for certain purposes. The two particular points to which I desire to refer, in regard to which the Committees will take the place of District Councils, are, first, the management of the roads; and, second, the administration of sanitary matters. The Bill commits the administration under both these heads to the District Committees to be appointed under the Act, consisting of the district officers, and one representative from each Board within the district. This Board will supply the place of the Council, and does not involve any separate cost of election. Now, my Lords, I come to another point, and that is the Standing Joint Committees. In speaking just now of the constitution of the Commissioners of Supply, I did not refer to the Statutory Committee which is appointed by them—namely, the Police Committee. Under that Police Committee is the Statutory Committee. I think its number (speaking under correction from noble Lords present, who are well acquainted with these matters) must not exceed 15. They include the Lord Lieutenant of the county, and the Sheriff of the county. Their powers are very large. They have the appointment of the Chief Constable, and they have to report to the Commissioners of Supply at the general annual meetings. They have in their hands the general management of the police. It is now proposed by this Bill that a corresponding body called the Standing Joint Committee shall be appointed by the Council. The Bill proposes to give borrowing powers to the Standing Joint Committee of the Council, and the Commissioners of Supply, consisting of such number of County Councillors, not exceeding seven, as shall be appointed by the County Council annually at their meeting in May. The Sheriff of the county is to be an ex officio member of the Standing Joint Committee, or in case of his absence one of his substitutes to be nominated by him for the purpose, and the Committee are to elect one of their own number to be Chairman. For this purpose only will the Commissioners of Supply be retained; all their functions will be transferred to the County Councils; but for this purpose only—namely, that of electing seven members of their Board to sit upon the Joint Committee, will they be kept in existence. The Standing Joint Committee, in addition to the duties and powers which are now held by the Police Committee, will have a veto on all capital expenditure; that is to say, that if the Council determine to expend a sum of money upon constructing roads or furnishing water supply, or incur any capital expenditure of that kind, their decision will be subject to the veto of the Standing Committee; and the Standing Committee will have also a veto upon the borrowing powers and in regard to charging the future revenues of the county, which I think your Lordships will consider is a desirable power for them to have, so as to prevent future extravagance and future risk of a drain upon the county funds. Another point is that the Bill provides for an efficient audit. At present there is no general audit of accounts in Scotland. I think your Lordships will agree it is exceedingly desirous that a more efficient, general, and uniform system of official audit should be established for Scotland. I have already referred to the Boundary Commissioners to be appointed under the Act. The Commissioners are mentioned in the Act. Their function will be after next February to adjust the boundaries of parishes, and to make pecuniary adjustments wherever necessary between counties and parishes where the boundaries are altered, so as to involve financial changes. Now I have gone through the general provisions of the Bill, and I come now to the financial relations with the Exchequer. Upon this point your Lordships will probably take a greater interest in the measure. As you are aware, last year, under the authority of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, a new arrangement was made, by which the Probate Duties were returned—I am now speaking of Scotland alone—and an undertaking was given that the Excise Duties and License Duties should also be returned to Scotland. According to the estimates of the Probate Duty in Scotland the share of the Probate Duty amounted to £234,000. The Bill provides for grants in aid of £30,000 to the Highlands and Islands. For the police there is £155,000, for pauper lunatics £90,500, and for the medical relief of the poor £20,000. The amounts in those respects in all come to £265,500. The total amount received by Scotland during the current year is 1889-90 £499,500. Now, my Lords, to pay the grants amounting to £265,000 as regards police, medical authorities, and pauper relief, provision is made by the Bill. There is a special grant for maintenance of roads of £35,000. That makes a total grant of £330,000. Deducting that from the previous sum mentioned leaves £169,500. That is for the current year. In the next year, 1890-91, the local tax licenses, which are not, of course, included in the Returns I have given, will amount to £323,000, and the Probate Duty will come, as in this year, to £234,000, making a total of £557,000. The sums payable for police, pauper lunatics, and relief of the poor are calculated to be exactly the same—namely, £265,000. The sum paid for the roads will be £35,000, just as during this year; but for the Highlands and Islands only a sum of £10,000 will be allowed, instead of the £30,000 which was allowed this year and last year only as a temporary measure. The sum total, therefore, which will be required to pay for the items which I have mentioned to your Lordships will be £310,500, leaving available for further purposes £246,500. Now, the question to be decided was, what was to be done with this surplus money? As your Lordships are probably aware, in deference to the wishes of the Scottish people it has been proposed to devote those sums of £169,500 for this year, and of £246,500 for next year, to the payment of the school fees in all the State-aided schools in Scotland. My Lords, I should like to say one word upon that point, because I know it is a matter which has aroused great interest in this House and elsewhere. There are those who are of opinion that there should be absolutely free education in Scotland up to the Fifth Standard on the one hand, and there are others who think that such a system is dangerous in the extreme, and that, except under exceptional circumstances, there should be no free education at all. Upon that disputed question I do not propose to enter now; but I should like to call your Lordships' attention to the facts of the case. As I stated just now, the money which has been given back under the arrangement of last year has been given back to Scotland in the manner most agreeable to the Scottish people. It is entirely Scottish money. It is returned to Scotland in respect of payment of the Probate Duty, and in future what will come from the Excise Duty. I think, my Lords, after the expression of opinion in the other House of Parliament, which did not come from one Party or from one section only, but which came with absolute unanimity from the Representatives of the whole people of Scotland, Her Majesty's Government would have taken a very heavy task upon its shoulders in declining to listen to the wishes of the Scottish people. These proposals were laid before the other House; they were adequately discussed, and there was no question whatever that if the matter was to be left to the discretion of the people of Scotland it would be determined in the manner now proposed by this Bill—namely, for the relief of school fees in the first five Standards. I should like to call your Lordships' attention to the clause under which this proposal is carried into effect. By Clause 22, Sub-section 6, it is provided that—

“The balance shall be applied towards relief from payment of school fees in the State-aid Schools in Scotland, and shall be distributed in such manner and in accordance with such conditions as may from time to time be set forth in the Scotch Education Code annually submitted to Parliament.”

Of course, the Scotch Education Code now submitted to Parliament cannot contain that regulation; but as soon as this Bill passes, a Minute will be laid upon the Table of the House from the Education Department, showing the proposed distribution of this money and the safeguards under which it is distributed to the different School Boards and Voluntary Schools in Scotland. The amounts received from the Exchequer for distribution by the County Councils will be under the direction of the Secretary for Scotland, and the Licensing and Excise Duties and Probate Duties will be paid over in the same manner as the existing grants. After the existing grants have been provided for, as I have explained to your Lordships, they will be distributed according to the provisions of a Minute which will be submitted to Parliament as soon as this Bill passes into law. There is every reason to believe that the money so available will be found sufficient to relieve the school fees in the whole of the first five Standards. If your Lordships will allow me, I should like to say a few words upon that to show why I think there is reason to suppose that the money will be sufficient to relieve education in the first five Standards. The average school expenditure in Scotland at this moment is £503,000, and the amount of all fees is about £310,000; but of that sum from the fees in first five Standards about £260,000 to £265,000 is received. I do not say that I am quite accurate in these figures, but I am as nearly right, I think, as it is possible to ascertain them. So that for the first five Standards there will be about £265,000 to be provided. Over the whole of Scotland the average amount received from fees over the whole six Standards comes to about 12s. 10d.; but the average received from fees in the first five Standards comes to less than 11s., and, by next year, it will come to about 10s. per head. So that there will be provided very nearly the amount required to exempt the first five Standards from any payment of fees. I do not say the amount will be exactly met; but under this Bill a certain number of schools will be allowed to exact fees in populous places like Glasgow and Edinburgh, where there may be some loss experienced in respect of the fees from the first five Standards, and they will be able to recoup themselves; so that there will be sufficient money to relieve the first five Standards from payment of fees. The first proposal is to distribute this money for relief of rates and for public purposes, and this exemption from payment of fees coming to 10s. per head will very largely go to the relief of rates or ratepayers in Scotland except in places where the fees charged are very high. I think I have now gone through the principal provisions of this Bill. I have not attempted to go into any details upon most of its provisions, judging that the consideration of those details will be very much better left to occupy your Lordships' attention in Committee, and that they will be very much better discussed there. But I should like, before I sit down, to say a few words generally upon the change which by this Bill it is proposed to make. In proposing this measure to Parliament, and in making these changes in local administration in Scotland, I desire to say that I have not any fault (and I am sure I may speak for Her Majesty's Government when I say so) to find with the local administrative bodies. On the contrary, I am very glad to have this opportunity of recognising how earnestly they have done their work, that they have done it with zeal, efficiency, economy, and the greatest public spirit; and that while, on the one hand, they have avoided extravagance of expenditure, they have, on the other, always fully recognised the duties and responsibilities imposed upon them. This I know from my own private experience in Scotland; and I am glad to have this opportunity of saying that that experience has been amply borne out by the wider experience which I have obtained since I have had the honour to hold the office of Secretary for Scotland. But though I look upon the supersession of those bodies who have done their work so admirably in the past, with (as I confess I do) some feeling of regret, and though I feel that the responsibilities which will be thrown upon the Secretary for Scotland will be largely increased if this Bill passes, especially with regard to the educational system, it is with no feeling of doubt or misgiving that I ask your Lordships to give a Second Reading to this Bill, and I have every confidence that the work of local administration, placed as it will be on a broader and more extended basis, will be done as well as it has been done before. I am aware that at first there may be some friction. A new system cannot be introduced without some friction, and some difficulty. There may be at first a which may be over energy which may not sufficient discretion, but the work will be saved. If friction and difficulty exist, that state of things will pass away, as it has done in newly created bodies, in course of time we must have solid work to be done.

Scotland. We are getting a better system of education; with better education there comes greater knowledge; and then with greater knowledge there comes a most legitimate and proper desire to take a more effective part, not only in the work of the Imperial Parliament, but in the work of the county in which the people live, and which is nearer to them, and more important to their needs. Naturally, I myself do not think that my countrymen, the people of Scotland, are as Conservative as I should like to see them—not nearly so Conservative; but from one point of view, I do think the people of Scotland are strongly and thoroughly Conservative. They are so proud of their ancient history and institutions which affect themselves and everything connected with their daily life, that they would be reluctant to make any change which would tend to cut them off from the system of County Government which has gone before, and from their historic and local associations. Consequently I look forward with great confidence to the exercise of the increased powers which will be given by this Bill to the county electors of Scotland. I cannot help thinking that you will agree with me that such a measure as this is a guarantee for increased and substantial political progress, recognising as I think it does existing interests, and at the same time giving effect to that desire which I have alluded to—namely, a closer participation in Local Government. I think that such a measure as this, bringing home as it does to all who are interested in Scottish affairs the fact that with the new privileges given to them by this Bill there will come new duties and new responsibilities and with them new burdens, when this Bill passes into law, if your Lordships give a Second Reading to it, as I hope you will to-night, will confer lasting benefits upon the local Government and people of Scotland.

Lordships' House, and to be misunderstood from not having heard the Question put, whether upon a Motion for a Bill brought forward by myself or in opposition to any Motion brought forward by noble Lords. It is my privilege to be able to come and say whether I withdraw any Motion that I may make, or whether I am justified in my persistence in conduct which, with great reluctance, I pursue. This matter is one of principle. If my Motion were carried, the proposal for the word "now" could not be put. As to the Bill now before the House, it is said in the Scriptures that "In the multitude of counsellors there is safety." The noble Earl who has just sat down, the Secretary of State for Scotland, has given us a most excellent account of the composition and duties of the different bodies, which it is now proposed to supercede by a very much smaller number. My Lords, this is decidedly an experiment. It is impossible to say that the Local Government Bill of last Session was not an experiment. It is a case of paulo post futurum legislation. It has given a great deal of trouble and perplexity, and even the Commissioners who were the final referees say if there was any difference between counties and boroughs, they must alter their opinion. As to the division of money between them, everything is kept uncertain. We knew what we had to look to, when we had the Commissioners of Supply, when we had the Magistrates, and when the maintenance and care of the roads were under the control of most carefully selected bodies, who always, in my humble opinion, acted with great caution and great prudence. My Lords, I see no necessity for this Bill. It was my duty when in the Courts of King's Bench and Queen's Bench to submit to the Lord Chief Justice an abridgement of every record; if I made a mistake that mistake was a very serious one, and I believe I hardly ever had a record referred to in that way. The question before your Lordships is whether you will institute an entirely new system without being satisfied that the system which has now been attempted in England as an experiment will turn out to be a decided success or not. Money is wanted; every Council is asking for more. It puts one in mind of the caricature by H.B. of Lord Brougham represented as a schoolmaster and entitled "Henry asking for more." There is not a single instance in which "more" has not been demanded, and in which money has not been thrown out to be scrambled for. That is what comes from consulting demands made in the name of the community by County Councils. My Lords, I am certain if this Bill were postponed for three years you would better have seen by that time how the Local Government Bill for England has really worked. With regard to the attempt now being made, one is reminded of the words addressed by Falstaff to Henry V., when Prince of Wales, as to "robbing the Exchequer with unwashed hands." Even a Cabinet Minister responsible for the affairs of India has talked about reducing the tax upon plate. Every old tax is worth keeping, because of the extreme difficulty of introducing any new tax. The Chancellor of the Exchequer is a very ill-used man—40 millions! I never heard of such a sacrifice, and what has been the effect upon the taxes of this country? We may wish to have some modification of the Licensing Duties; we may wish to have some alleviation from the hardships of the Probate Duties, but we are going to tie our hands for ever. My Lords, we do not, because we are members of this House, forfeit all claim to common sense. I am satisfied that this Bill will be carried in a hurry if it gets through to-day. I have read it carefully, and there are provisions in it which I do not like; but I would not attempt to support any Amendment in Committee which would send the Bill out to the country with a slur upon it. What is the consequence if you want to alter a Bill at the end of the Session? The only time when there ever was a chance of asking this House to go on to the end of a Session was in a statute, now repealed, which gave a Peer the right to shoot a buck in Her Majesty's Forests on his way to Parliament, and another, in the presence of a keeper, on his return, when, if a Member did not stay to the end of it, he lost his pay. I am quite satisfied that this principle of saying there is no time to do this or that is a fallacious one. As if this House was not capable, if necessary, of sitting every month in the year! I have seen it sitting every month except October, and I have seen good work done. I remember, in particular, the measure as to locomotive engines. A suggestion was made for compromise. It was very late in September, and the Lord President of the Council the Duke of Richmond being here in his place, and Lord Watson, Lord Advocate, I wanted a uniform system to be adopted; but it certainly was very late, and probably that had something to do with the result. Parliaments have met at all times of the year, and in all parts of Her Majesty's Dominions. I am not sure that the Imperial Parliament has ever been confined to a particular locality or that anything has been so confined, except the Court of Common Pleas, which by a statute, perhaps repealed, was always to sit at Westminster. I believe Her Majesty might sit at any time and hold an Imperial Parliament in any part of her dominions. I would only recall the Parliament held in the time of William Rufus at Rockingham Castle. There is a Rockingham Castle also in Ireland, where they want Home Rule. I venture to say that in according to these Local Governments anything as a substitute for Home Rule, you are giving way to the greatest delusion that ever was entertained. It is a system which will cause disunion, debate, and discord. It is impossible to go on unless we assist the Chancellor of the Exchequer to raise the revenue by fair means, and I am sure that unless you will give him back the Probate Duties and the Licensing Duties you will repent it. With regard to taking away the jurisdiction over the police from the Magistrates, I think that is very objectionable, because the Magistrates are the only persons who know what the police really do. My Lords, I cannot see the use of having a Bill like this forced upon us, until the effect of its kindred Bill here is seen by the public. I am not one who looks to the effect of the future elections. Last Friday was the fourth anniversary of this Parliament. Mr. Brodrick said it was the third anniversary. Well, if so, my Lords, I can only say it has been a triennial Parliament so far, and I earnestly hope that it may last three years longer. Mr. Fox once held certain opinions, but changed them with regard to triennial Parliaments. I hope your

Lord Denman

Lordships will be on the register before the next Election. My noble Friend reminds me that in this Bill there is a very peculiar privilege given to women which might operate curiously with regard to any woman not living with her husband. If they are to be invested with political power it is rather a temptation to them, I think, to leave their husbands. But the Reform Bill of 1834, I venture to say, was imperfect in that respect, as the suffrage was not given to duly-qualified women. I ventured, on behalf of married women, to put in a claim for them in case their husbands ill-treat them and if they had to get a divorce from their husbands; but I hope that in all cases divorces may be discouraged, and especially in Scotland. This Bill gives a right to married women even if not divorced. My Lords, I have often been without a Teller, and with regard to any opposition to this Bill I am sure that I have had no communication with a single person throughout the progress of the measure, except Lord Thurlow just now. I wish to see that the Bill may have fair play, but I think that the registration provided for is extremely imperfect. The names are not placed on the church-doors, and any new claims should have been made by the 31st of last month. There is plenty of time to consider the Bill if your Lordships choose to adjourn for a short period. On one occasion two Bills were carried which only took two minutes each, because I did not hear the Question put. If your Lordships would adjourn there would be an opportunity for you to visit Ireland and see what is going on there. It might do away with some prejudice. I am sure that if this Bill were extended to Ireland it would have no good effect. I firmly believe that we are much better without it. We are better as we are, especially with the attachment of the people of Scotland to old institutions. I know that from my own observation, and I am quite certain, also, that there is no complaint with regard to the owners in regard to paying their proper share of the rates which are levied. My Lords, it would certainly be a very strong measure to refuse all these very large sums which are offered for the assistance of the counties; but I firmly believe that if you allow the present economical Magistrates to carry on the business of the counties, and if you do not take away their powers to tax the owners and occupiers—if you trust to them, you will find that there is no improvement likely to be made by creating a hybrid body which will always be in a state of opposition one part of it to the other and to the Legislature. I am certain that the necessities of the country require that the Magistrates of Scotland and the Magistrates of England and of Ireland—you are increasing the powers of Magistrates in Ireland, and degrading the Magistrates in England, and trying to lower the Magistrates of Scotland—should be left in their present situation. That is their own view; and one gentleman, who had been a High Sheriff, said to me recently, talking of the Bill, “We must grin and bear it.” We have been complimented by the noble Lord at the Board of Trade for being an economical body, and I am sure we have been an economical body. We have 200 Magistrates in Derbyshire, and only 150 County Councillors with various qualifications. I say it is imposing duties upon small bodies which it will be most difficult for them to discharge, even if they have physical endurance to be able to go through the duties imposed upon them. My Lords, I venture to move that this Bill be read a second time this day six months.

Amendment moved, to leave out “now” and add at the end of the Motion, “this day six months.”—(The Lord Denman.)

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: My Lords, I have seen it suggested with regard to this Bill that the changes which it makes in the system of Scottish Local Government are comparatively unimportant. I think that those who make that statement can have bestowed very little attention upon the contents of the Bill. This Bill makes a fundamental change in the whole system of Local Government, because it takes away all matters of local concern from the cognisance of one body and vests them in an entirely new constituency, and places them in the hands of an entirely new Council. This Bill places for the first time the local business of Scotland in the hands of the general body of rate-payers; and it goes even further than that—it places those affairs, to a considerable extent, in the hands of those who do not pay rates. Of course, it may be urged that the service electors do, as a matter of theory and in some manner which we do not quite understand, pay rates by some sort of implied bargain with those who employ them. But I think those of your Lordships who are familiar with county or local business know that, as a matter of fact, this question of local rates is not taken into consideration as far as the service voters are concerned. I would prefer to put it in another way. I think the line which the Government have taken is this—they have adopted the principle that it is the possession of a house which entitles the occupier to take his share of the local burdens and of the local business of the country; and I must say that to me this qualification appears to be the wisest and most sensible which you could possibly devise. It is a sensible qualification because the principle is intelligible; it has in it the essence of finality, and it carries with it some reason why the elector should possess a vote. I think it is very fortunate that the Government have not adhered to the line they first adopted when they introduced this Bill. At first, as your Lordships know, it was proposed that persons who are engaged in service should not possess a county vote unless they formally applied for it. I am glad that has been changed, and I think that change is a very great improvement. I am quite certain if the Government had adhered to their former plan a great deal of dissatisfaction and discontent would have been occasioned, and it would have been felt that even if the vote were given in the end, as of course it would have had to be given, it would have been simply given, not so much as a matter of favour, but because it was impossible to avoid it. Now, my Lords, let me say one word with regard to the powers which it is proposed to confer upon these new County Councils. It is said that these powers are chiefly possessed by Local Bodies in existence now; such, for instance, as the powers with regard to the management of the roads and the administration of the Public Health Acts, which are now entrusted to the Parish Authorities. The change which this Bill makes is that it confers those powers upon an entirely new set of persons. It takes away the powers from the Commissioners of Supply; it also takes the powers away from the parishes and from the Justices of the Peace. I regret that the Bill does not go a little further. I believe it would have been quite possible to have entrusted the power of licensing to the new County Councils, because I think there is a very important distinction in this respect between Scotland and England. I know very well that last year it would have been impossible to pass a Local Government Act for England if it had been proposed to transfer the licensing powers under the Bill; but some of your Lordships know very well that the licensing difficulties are not the same in Scotland as they are in England. It is considered by many as quite certain that before long the licensing powers will have to be transferred to the County Councils. I cannot say how far that expectation might have affected the passing of this Bill into law this Session, but I believe, as far as those powers are concerned, they might have been safely entrusted to the County Councils. This Bill hands over the entire administration of the county finances to a County Council elected by the householders, but it does so subject to a very important qualification. When it affects the question of borrowing money or of capital expenditure or when there is any reference to the management of the police, then it is provided that there is to be a Joint Committee of the Commissioners of Supply and County Councillors, seven of each, and in addition the Sheriff, who, by the way, I am glad to see is not necessarily to be the Chairman of that Subcommittee. I know that some exception has been taken to this proposal, but I think that on consideration those who are best acquainted with Local Government will admit that this proposal is one of a most reasonable and sensible kind. This principle of a control being exercised when it is a matter of borrowing money for public purposes by some external authority has been admitted in England, and is admitted in Scotland at the present time. If it is sought to obtain a loan for the purpose of carrying out the Poor Law, or for the purpose of administering the Public Health Acts, it is necessary to obtain the sanction of a Board of Supervision, and similar arrangements obtain in England with regard to the same matters. I do not think we are saying anything at all unjustifiable against these new County Councillors if we say that they are not infallible, and that it is very probable, when they first enter upon their office, that they will be very anxious indeed to carry out all kinds of projects in the way of what they consider to be improvements, and that it is at all events most satisfactory that when they propose to make large expenditures of money there should be some body of persons representing those who are interested whose consent would have to be obtained before the expenditures are sanctioned. My Lords, I have seen the evils produced by this want of control in Scotland. I remember in the County of Forfar we obtained a Local Act for the management of our roads, and under that Act it was perfectly possible for the new trustees to borrow money without any check. New trustees coming fresh into office, a great many of them being tenant farmers, would naturally want to have the roads improved as quickly as possible, although it might be—of course it did not necessarily follow—that in a few years afterwards they would be in the country. Therefore, all improvements were carried out at once, thus incurring a great deal of needless expense, and, indeed, a great deal of the money was thrown away. I must say myself, having had something to do with these matters, that it is a most sensible and wise precaution to establish a Joint Committee such as this which is proposed. There is another argument, which people are too apt to forget, and that is that owners of property in Scotland pay half the whole rate, and in virtue of that very large payment it is surely advisable that there should be some representation of property. I do not care how you give it; but, still, I think that owners of property should have some security that their money should not be spent solely by those whose interest in the matter, and therefore in taking care of it, is after all comparatively small, and whose contribution to the funds is necessarily still smaller. Now, my Lords, one word with regard to the numbers of the Councillors. I have received from the noble Marquess a statement of the numbers which he proposes, I do not say finally, but which, in the first instance he has an idea of proposing, for the various counties. I hope that before the noble Marquess comes to any final conclusion on that matter he will consult very carefully the public bodies in the various counties—I do not mean only the Commissioners of Supply, but I allude to the Road Trustees, or any other body which represents the public to any considerable extent, because we all have one interest in this matter—what we want is sensible, intelligent, economical local administration. It would be a great pity if such bodies were too few in number, because then the public would feel that they were not adequately represented; but I think, on the other hand, it would be as great an evil if those bodies were to be too numerous, because that would throw a very large expenditure upon the rates, and if you have once established a large body it becomes very difficult indeed to reduce its numbers at any period afterwards. There are, of course, a great many matters of detail in such a measure as this, and with those I do not intend to trouble your Lordships now. There is only one to which I will allude, and that is that, in forming the District Committees with regard to the management of roads, I am sorry to see that it is proposed to appoint only a member connected with each parochial body. I should object more than I do to these proposals if I did not believe that the constitution of these parochial bodies is very likely to be enlarged. At all events, the noble Marquess will have observed that in the District Committees those representatives will almost in every case outnumber the County Councillors with whom they will have to sit. Those, my Lords, are all the remarks with which I will trouble you on the Second Reading; and I may say of this Bill that I regard it as a measure for creating a new machinery in the shape of County Councils. It is obvious that, if it is found to work well, its provisions can be largely extended hereafter; and I observe that it is in the power of the Secretary for Scotland to entrust to these Councils hereafter any other matters of local interest which he may think it advisable to entrust to them, subject always to the sanction of Parliament. The Commissioners of Supply have done their work well, as the noble Marquess has said. They have been very economical; they have done their work very sensibly, and they have restricted their action to the subjects with which they had to deal. I have every confidence that their successors will follow their example, and I think it is high time we should take a clear step of this kind in popularising Local Government. I think, on the whole, that under this Bill the new County Councils will do the work of Local Government in a very practical manner.

*THE MARQUESS OF TWEEDDALE:

I do not intend to occupy your Lordships' time at any length, but I wish to make one or two remarks upon this Bill with regard to a subject which, I think, will justify me in asking your Lordships' attention. In the first place, I wish to add my testimony to the great value of the measure which has been introduced this evening. I believe it will carry out its aim and object—namely, the placing of Local Government in Scotland on a more popular basis than that on which it has hitherto stood. It is quite true, as has been remarked, that local affairs have been hitherto admirably administered in Scotland, both as to economy and efficiency; but the management has been in notoriously too few hands, and the extension of the control of local matters, and the placing the administration of them on a more popular basis, will, no doubt, be of great benefit to Scotland in many ways. The particular point to which I wish to draw your Lordships' attention, in the first instance, is this. Some of your Lordships are aware that Corporations in Scotland, such as Gas Corporations, Water Companies, and Railroads, have hitherto enjoyed a representation, in respect of the rates which they paid, to a very large extent. They are represented on the Boards of Commissioners of Supply; they are represented on the Boards of Road Trustees; they are represented on the Boards of Local Authorities and upon the Parochial Bodies. By this Bill every sort of local representation is swept away, and they are left without any voice in the election of the Councillors. This seems to me to be altogether inconsistent with the intention of the Bill. The noble Marquess used the words that payment of rates was essential to taking an active part in the elections to the Councils. When I tell your Lordships that the railroads alone in Scotland pay £200,000 a year in rates, you will not be surprised to hear that hitherto they have had some voice in the management of local affairs in respect of those rates. I am not able to speak so well with regard to the Gas and Water Corporations, but I have no doubt that they contribute largely also. I have a list of counties here amounting to 18, in which they are the largest contributors to the rates in those counties. Yet, notwithstanding this, as I said before, their representation is to be entirely swept away. Now, having regard to the fact that the only change which was made in this Bill in its passage through another place was with regard to the right of eligibility to the Council being extended to parties who practically pay no rates whatever, it does seem strange that those who have hitherto enjoyed the right of representation should have that right entirely abrogated. I hope the noble Lord who has charge of this Bill will take this matter into consideration; and I do not think it will be difficult for him to devise some means by which those powerful Corporations who contribute so largely to the rates in Scotland as well as in England should have a voice in the representation. Another of the points on which I should ask your Lordships' attention is with reference to the rules relating to the appointment of officers under Clause 82. It seems to me of very doubtful expediency compelling the new Councils to appoint the Clerks of Supply. Under that clause they have no option, but they must appoint for the first year whoever happens to be the Clerk of Supply. The Clerks of Supply will be, in many instances, by no means the least important of the officials who will be brought under the County Councils. In the County to which I belong the Clerk to the Road Board is a more important individual, and is far better paid than any other, and it seems to me either that the Councils should be permitted to appoint their own officers from the first, or they should be allowed to select from among the officers brought under their control. In that way I should prefer myself giving them full liberty in the choice of their officers. It is more important, especially at the commencement of such an institution as this, that the Council should have the best advice that they can possibly get.

Anyone who has had anything to do with Scottish business knows the importance of this, and how much the efficiency of the administration of Scottish local business will depend upon these posts being properly filled. I think the County Councils should at least have the option of appointing any officer whom they think most efficient to act as County Clerk. Then, my Lords, Clause 22, which has been referred to by the noble Lord, deals with the question of the appropriation of the License Duties and Probate Duty Grants. Those grants are distributed in six different ways. In the first five the sum allocated is a fixed sum, and the sum which is to be given in relief to State-aided schools is to be the balance. This sum may vary very considerably, but it seems to me to be very desirable if it were possible that the sum should be so far as it can be made a fixed one. I do not know whether that is impossible to be done, but I should like to suggest, at any rate, whether it would not be practicable to strike an average, say, for the last ten years, so that the Local Board might know pretty nearly what sum they would be entitled to in regard to the relief of school fees. The only other point which I have to refer to is the appointment of Justices of the Peace under Clause 10. That clause says that the Chairman shall be by virtue of his office a Justice of the Peace of the county. Justices of the Peace have hitherto been appointed by the Crown. I do not know whether the appointment by an Act of this kind will make any difference, or whether it will be necessary to make any new provision under which a Justice of the Peace will in future be made otherwise than by the Crown. I have no other observations to make than to say that I believe this measure will be attended with great advantage to Scotland. We have all had experience of popular Government in the administration of roads and schools, and, speaking for myself, and in my capacity as chairman of bodies of both kinds, I can only say that the introduction of the popular element has been attended with complete success. I have, therefore, no fear whatever of the operation of this Bill.

I feel that matters of detail would be best dealt with in Committee, but I should not like so large and important a measure as this affecting Scotland to pass without expressing an opinion upon it. I should myself have preferred that the Bill should have started upon another basis in dealing with the question of Local Government in Scotland, that is to say, I should have preferred the parish to be taken as a unit to start from, then the election to the District Committee, and then to the Central Council. But I recognise the difficulties of proceeding upon that basis in such a measure, and especially in Scotland; and I think that, taking it as a whole, the Bill now put down for Second Reading is as good a one as could be framed upon the lines upon which it has gone. But there are certain points which I think will have to very carefully considered in Committee. I agree with what my noble Friend behind me said as to the advantages of the Joint Standing Committee for the purpose of controlling the expenditure, but I do not entirely agree with him as to the bearing it may have upon the question of the maintenance of roads. As I read the Bill the whole of the powers now vested in the Road Trustees are transferred to the Road Board, which is to take the place of the Committees of Chairmen—I am now speaking of my own county under our private Act. This Board then delegates to the District Committee the entire maintenance of the roads, and the District Committee will have the management of them and will assess the rates. Therefore the whole of the rating for the maintenance of roads comes through the District Committee. But by Section 18, although they have the power of rating, yet the power of doing certain things for the improvement of the roads, is taken away from them. If your Lordships will look at that clause, Subsections 6 and 7, you will see that no capital works, that is, works involving capital expenditure, can be undertaken in any county or any district, without the written consent of the Standing Joint Committee; and then it is enacted that capital works are to include the erection, rebuilding, or enlargement of buildings, and the construction, reconstruction, or widening of roads and bridges. My experience in Aberdeenshire is that the powers conferred upon the Road Commissioners have been largely taken advantage of, but as I read this clause in future, though the District Committee will have the power of levying the rates under the Roads and Bridges Act, they will not be able to improve the roads and bridges in their district without the consent of the Standing Joint Committee; and I think that might be modified.

*LORD BALFOUR: Not if they pay for them out of the rates for the current year.

*THE MARQUESS OF HUNTLY: I was going to add that I see there is a provision for the payment of all works out of the current year's rates. Now, this is a very startling proposal, and will require consideration in Committee. However, I simply call the noble Marquess's attention to that, and perhaps by the time the Bill comes into Committee he will have considered it. Then the only other important point in this Bill upon which I would desire to say a few words is the proposal to devote the balance coming from the Probate and Licensing Duties to the relief of State-aided Schools. Many objections, no doubt, have been raised to that proposal, but I am quite clear that the majority of Scotchmen are in favour of that proposal, and I think the noble Marquess was quite justified in his reference to the almost unanimity with which that proposal has been received. I can only account for that unanimity by referring it to the feeling which has been manifested since 1874 when the Education Act was passed, and when a large expenditure was thrown upon the rates in connection with the schools, which had not previously fallen upon them. As your Lordships know, the Education Act imposed upon the rates a very heavy burden which they had not previously been called upon to bear, and an increase of that kind is always felt very severely indeed by the poorer ratepayers. This Bill will, I think, relieve them, for it is not so much a relief to the parents of the school-children as to the poorer ratepayers. It will, no doubt, be a very sensible relief to them. With those few words I beg to express my approval of this Bill.

*LORD FORBES: My Lords, I shall say but little at this stage of the Bill. I am sorry to see in this measure a repetition of what was done in the English County Council Bill. I have to say that my remarks upon this matter are not original, for they really follow what was said by Earl Beauchamp with regard to enlargement of area. I do not think, in England, the same objection exists, because, there, political feeling does not rise so high as it does in Scotland; but I cannot help thinking that it is unfortunate we should have a repetition of the same state of things. I think, instead of there being one County Councillor for each area as proposed, it would have been much better if the area were enlarged and six or so returned for that area. You would then get, as representatives, different sorts of people. You would get, perhaps, the larger tenant-farmers, the doctors, or the veterinary surgeons of the neighbourhood, whereas, if you have one Councillor only for one area, you will perhaps get the person returned who puts himself most prominently forward. I very much fear that the effect of that clause will be that the most pushing or energetic person, possibly some farmer radically inclined, will be found putting himself forward. I do not know what may happen to this Bill in Committee, so many Bills disappear at that stage; but I desire to give notice that I intend to move the deletion in Clause 82 of the latter part of Sub-section 3, the whole of Sub-section 4, and the latter part of Sub-section 6. My Lords, it seems to me that this point of one Councillor, one area is an important one and ought to be well considered. In other respects I think the Bill a useful and necessary one.

*THE EARL OF MINTO: My Lords, I wish to make only one remark. To my mind this Bill is in many respects a valuable one, and I hope it will work well in Scotland; but, in my opinion, the disfranchising part of it, as regards many of those who are qualified to take an intelligent part in the government of the county is a defect. Those persons are at present rather a numerous body, and by this Bill you are diminishing the number of those who may take part in treating subjects to be brought before the Council. I only wish to make that remark, and I shall perhaps in Committee move an Amendment embodying my views on the point. I rather think that the noble Lord who has just spoken looks upon it in the same light as I do myself.

On question that ("now") stand part of the Motion, resolved in the affirmative: Then the original Motion was agreed to: Bill read 2<sup>a</sup> accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Tuesday next.

INTERPRETATION BILL. (No. 92.)

Adjourned Debate on Amendment moved on Third Reading resumed according to Order.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: My Lords, I do not think I ought to persist in the Amendment which I had sought to introduce into this Bill after the remarks of my noble Friend upon it with regard to both place and time. Although I am still of opinion that it is important some such amendment of the law should be made, yet I should be sorry to carry by a majority an Amendment of this description, which some noble and learned Lords think is not really called for by the necessities of the case. I can only say, in abandoning this Amendment, that I shall claim from those noble and learned Lords next year their assistance into putting into a form more satisfactory to themselves some general enactment, which shall have a more definite legal meaning attached to it, so that that confusion shall not be possible in private Acts which exists at present. I know it is very easy to say that you can always cure that by putting a specific section into the Act. That is quite true; but the answer is that people do not do so, and the consequence is that from time to time Acts are passed without any provision as to what meaning is to be attached to them in computing time. Under the circumstances, after the opposition which has been offered to it, and the explanations given by my noble and learned Friends the other night, I do not think it would be becoming in me to persist in the Amendment of which that alteration formed the subject.

Amendment (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

Another Amendment proposed, in Clause 12, line 11, after the word "India" insert

"And where parts of such dominions are under both a central, and a local legislature, all parts under the central legislature shall, for the purposes of this definition, be deemed to be one colony."—(The Lord Chancellor.)

Amendment agreed to.

Bill passed, and sent to the Commons.

STATUTE LAW REVISION BILL.

(No. 186.)

Read 2<sup>a</sup> (according to order), and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Tuesday next.

COUNTY COURT APPEALS (IRELAND)

BILL. (No. 104.)

THIRD READING.

Order of the Day for the Third Reading read.

LORD FITZGERALD: My Lords, I have to move an Amendment on Clause 13, by which the right to appeal is given to a defendant who has not appeared at the hearing, within one month. The Amendment is to insert the words at line 19 after the word "may."

LORD HERSCHELL: My Lord, I shall not oppose the Amendment which my noble and learned Friend has now proposed, though I must confess I am not satisfied that it is really necessary. The fact is that this clause was considered after the Bill was introduced at the Irish Office. After my noble and learned Friend gave notice of a Motion to reject Clause 13, it was again considered at the Irish Office, and especially by the learned Solicitor General for Ireland, and he was satisfied with the clause as it now stands. I do not profess myself to know much about the special needs or wants of Ireland in this respect, but I do rely upon the matured view of the learned Solicitor General for Ireland who has considered the matter. But as my noble and learned Friend presses this point I shall not oppose him; of course, the matter may still be considered elsewhere.

Amendment agreed to.

Bill passed, and sent to the Commons; and to be printed as amended. (No. 205.)

INDIA—DISTRESS IN THE DIAMOND HARBOUR DIVISION OF THE PEGUNNAHS.

QUESTION.—OBSERVATIONS.

*LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY, in rising to ask the Secretary of State for India if his attention has been called to the Report of Mr. Bolton, collector, on the distress in the Diamond Harbour sub-division, and to the fines of two rupees or a week's imprisonment on nine starving men, and of one rupee on a woman, inflicted by Mr. Maguire, the Joint Magistrate of Alipore, for a breach of the Revenue Laws, they having scraped some salt from the earth to add to their meal of tamarind seeds and stalks of the water-lily; and to ask the Secretary of State what portion of the Reserve Famine Fund has been devoted to the famine in Ganjam and Orissa, said: My Lords, before putting the question which stands on the Notice Paper in my name, I wish to mention the great good which has resulted from the efforts of Lord Connemara, the Governor of Madras, and from his personal inspection of the district at the northern extremity of the Presidency, regardless of the hot season, when it is usual to take refuge in the hills at Ootacamund. Besides establishing relief works, the Governor of Madras has directed gratuitous relief to be given to women and children, who, but for that, must have perished; and local liberality has been encouraged by the presence of the Governor. The Indian Press is full of praise of Lord Connemara, not only for his exertions, but also for the way in which he has avoided the mistakes made in former famines; and it also states that he has received a message of commendation from Her Majesty the Queen. I hope that the noble Viscount the Secretary of State will be able to confirm the truth of that Report. The questions which I wish to ask the Secretary of State for India are—first, whether his attention has been called to the Report of Mr. Bolton, collector, on the distress in the Diamond Harbour sub-division. He went there, but he was there for so short a time that the people were not aware that he had been at the place until he was gone. In his Report he minimises the distress, it is said on insufficient information, and states that it is the proper policy not to demoralise the people by giving them food. It must be remembered that there is no Poor Law in India, and that the Government alone can relieve distress. I do not ask the Secretary of State to censure Mr. Bolton, but I ask him to disagree with that gentleman. Perhaps the best way of showing disagreement would be for the Indian Government to circulate Lord Connemara's Minute in other famine districts, if it is really as able a document as it is said to be. It has been stated that Lord Connemara has had experience of former famines, and has avoided the mistakes then made. As to Mr. Maguire's sentences for breach of the Revenue Laws by starving men, I hope the Secretary of State will be able to say that this Magistrate has been directed to exercise more discretion in future. The nine men who were imprisoned by him for a week not being able to pay the fine were perhaps benefited, as they must have been fed whilst in prison; but the woman said that if she were sent to prison her two infant children would starve. A Hindoo pleader who was present, speaking merely as amicus curiæ besought the Magistrate to dismiss her with a nominal fine, but without success. At last the Magistrate said to the woman, "you are fined a rupee which this Baboo will pay." The Baboo paid the fine, and the woman was let go. One feels somewhat curious to know whether Mr. Maguire, like most Irishmen in India, is a Home Ruler or not. If a similar occurrence took place in Ireland, what an outcry there would have been from the whole people and Press of Ireland at the conduct of the Magistrate. With regard to the last question in my notice, I may say that I have seen statements in the Press to the effect that the Reserve Famine Fund has been swept away or swallowed up in the North-West frontier; but I cannot believe that those statements are correct, because I find that in his Despatch of April 12, 1888, sanctioning the raising of the Salt Tax, the Secretary of State has written the following paragraph:—

"There is another reason of great moment for endeavouring to keep the duty on salt as low as practicable. One of the objects at which the Government of India aimed in the reforms that were instituted, of which great political and financial importance was foreseen, was to place a reserve in the hands of the Administration, for the purpose of meeting any serious emergency, and to enable them to obtain temporarily a considerable addition to the Revenue by an increase of duty, of which the mass of the people would be hardly aware."

This extract from a Despatch of April of last year would indicate that precautions must have been taken to reserve a fund for the emergency of the famine which has now occurred. From what has transpired in another place I am afraid the noble Viscount will not be able to give a satisfactory account of what has become of this fund, but it is clear from a telegram I have seen, stating that a total number of 80,000 people in Ganjam are receiving gratuitous relief, that the Indian Government has not regarded the disappearance of the fund, but must have supplied money from the equivalent in India of the Consolidated Fund. Lord Ripon lowered the Salt Duty a short time ago: it has been raised again, and the people of India are suffering very much in consequence. The last Medical Reports say that salt is required as a preventative against cholera, and there is no doubt also that the cattle suffer from murrain for want of salt. I think, my Lords, that before long the noble Viscount will have to look about for some other means of raising Revenue.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Viscount Cross): My Lords, with regard to the action taken by Lord Connemara in regard to the distress existing in the Presidency of Madras, I think you will agree that it is impossible to speak too highly of it. The Governor of Madras sent one of his most trusted officers at the earliest possible opportunity to examine into the whole question; and then, although the weather was extremely hot and the season far advanced, he thought it was wise to go to the district affected and make searching inquiry himself. The results have been most satisfactory. Lord Connemara has undoubtedly by this action given enormous encouragement to all those who are engaged in relieving the distress which exists, and has done a great deal to alleviate the sufferings of the people. It is quite true that Her Majesty has sent a message to Lord Connemara approving of his conduct, and unquestionably that high compliment the Governor of Madras has fully deserved. I have not yet received an official copy of the Report of Mr. Bolton, and therefore I must decline to discuss that matter at present. Neither have I received any information as to the alleged punishments referred to by the noble Lord, inflicted for scraping salt from the earth, but I will make inquiries. As to the famine, I can assure the noble Lord that the Viceroy is fully alive to all the dangers and difficulties of the situation, and that everything that can be done to alleviate the distress in Bengal and Madras has been done. As to the noble Lord's question regarding the Famine Fund, I must explain that there is no actual Reserve Fund. The expenditure which would be necessary to alleviate distress in Madras and Bengal will be meanwhile met out of the Provincial Funds, and according to a telegram which I received a few days ago the sum which would be required in Madras for the current year is set down at Rs82,000 and for Bengal at Rs40,000. The Provincial Governments are quite able to meet that expenditure. Of course if they had not had sufficient funds to do what they desired they would have applied to the Central Government, and they would have been offered money out of the Indian Imperial Exchequer, but I am happy to say that there is no probability of that being necessary.

TRANSPORT FOR THE AUXILIARY FORCES.

QUESTION—OBSERVATIONS.

*LORD TRURO: My Lords, I have to call your attention to, perhaps, one of the greatest anomalies that ever existed—namely, a standing Army—which has grown within the last 30 years to the number of 250,000 men, unprovided with transport. We have, within the last week or two, had the powerful assistance of the Lord Mayor, who has interested himself in the question of providing the Volunteer Regiments generally with proper equipment. However successful the Lord Mayor may be in London, and however successful the provincial towns of England may be should they follow his example, it is perfectly clear that without transport that Army of Volunteers must be practically useless, for the simple reason that it must be immovable. It can neither advance to the front to meet the enemy nor can it retire, if necessary, to take up a better position. Defeat, therefore, under such circumstances would simply mean its total and entire destruction. Inasmuch as the Volunteer Force has existed for a period of 30 years, it does seem somewhat extraordinary that, until quite recently, as far as I know, no attempts have been made on the part of the Military Authorities to organise in any way whatever a Volunteer Transport. Like many other requirements for the benefit of the Volunteer Force, the first suggestion of Transport has come from Volunteer officers themselves. Colonel Sir William Humphreys, a man of great ability and energy himself, undertook—one can hardly call it the organization, but an attempt at the organization of a Transport Force for his own corps in Hampshire, and I believe he met with somewhat unusual success. I think it will be found that similar success will not attend other battalions of the Volunteer Force, even should their officers exhibit the same ability and energy. It cannot be expected from the general public in this country that they will be willing, without either money reward or some honorary acknowledgment, to give gratuitously their horses, their carts, and their men, too, perhaps two or three times during the year in order to try whether the proposed scheme will be effective. I cannot therefore but come to the conclusion that although this able officer has been successful in his attempt, it is idle to suppose that such attempts, if carried out in other parts of the country, can attain like success. But it was upon this favourable Report of Colonel Humphreys that the War Office has been induced to issue two different Circulars in relation to transport for the Volunteers. The first of these Circulars was issued on the 14th February, 1888, when 10 regiments were selected in certain localities for the purpose of ascertaining whether the scheme suggested by Colonel Humphreys promised success. Now I do not know whether the localities in which these regiments were selected were localities most favourable to the trial of the scheme, or least favourable to it; but of this I am certain, that in trying such an experiment as this it should, to have been really of value, have been tried in the least favourable places. Whether that was so or not I will not pretend to say—certainly some of the localities, from what is stated in a Paper which I have read recently, do not appear to have been the least favourable. Now, the War Office Circular lays down very properly certain requirements in relation to this Transport Service, and in looking at the Return that was furnished it would appear, as it has been with regard to many other things in the Volunteer service, as though the War Office authorities would say, "you must do it yourselves." They have had no scheme of any kind whatever, and they have no scheme now; for the new instructions which they issued after this experiment to Colonels of Volunteer regiments were to register the cart and horses (I do not think men) in their several districts is hardly to be called a scheme. They have also intimated a wish that every encouragement should be given to those who are willing to lend their carts and horses for different days in the year that the experiment may be fully tried. Now, in the first instance, the War Office intimated its willingness to give £45 towards the expenses of the experiment to each of the battalions. In some cases the expenses will be found to have been in excess of that amount, though in one or two cases I believe the expenses of the battalion were kept within the margin of £45. Let me take the first Volunteer Battalion that stands upon the list. A very important part of any experiment of this kind was not tried—namely, the picketing of the horses. And why? The report says that the weather was unfavourable, and that the horses were therefore not picketed. Certain artificers were required, three to each battalion; it does not appear that artificers were forthcoming in anything like the number required. In one case the horses were too big for the water cart; in another case the horse bolted with the water cart, the shaft was broken, and it became utterly useless. In four or five instances in this return the horses were not picketed, because, as reported, the weather was wet or cold, or because the horses had no picketing-gear. In this Report it is stated that the Volunteers applied to the Government for the use of picketing-gear, which was refused. Now, seeing the small allowance—for small I must call it—that is demanded for all the exigencies of the Volunteer Service from the War Office, I think there should be no objection to an addition being made in this respect in order that a force of this character may be brought to a state of efficiency. At some time there can be no doubt a very great increase in the expenses will have to be provided for, and Her Majesty's Government must therefore be prepared for it. My Lords, after having tried this experiment, and after having received the Reports from the different regiments, there came this letter of the 22nd March, 1889, relating to the transport of the Auxiliary Forces, by which, at the direction of the Commander-in-Chief, Volunteer Officers were informed that the reports from the various districts had shown that a system of Volunteer transport was not requisite, and that it had been decided to discontinue, as far as the War Office was concerned, any steps in that direction. The circular further stated that officers commanding Volunteer battalions should annul any contracts of this nature which they had entered into on behalf of the State, and they were instructed to give notice to terminate them as soon as possible. The whole scheme has come to an end, and the War Office simply says that we are to rest where we are. My Lords, can it be contended by anyone that this is a proper condition for a standing army to be in? Is it possible that in a week or a fortnight the carts required for the transport of ammunition and baggage can be got? Your Lordships know from your own personal experience that matters of this kind certainly take a month or so, and if, as has been supposed by some authorities, an attack on this country would be settled one way or another in a week or ten days, I should like to know what would become of the Volunteer army without transport. This circular goes on to say that the experiments have proved that "ample transport is forthcoming for the use of Volunteers." Whether or not this has been proved in the places which are least favourable, I do not know. I believe that in the places selected there was abundance of transport. But it is not an abundance of transport alone that is necessary; it is the organisation of transport. Anyone who knows anything of these matters is aware that to carry them out requires a great deal of time and practice. You can no more organise the necessary transport at a moment's notice than you can organise immediately any other great undertaking. Then it is further stated that—

“No further grants in aid will be made, but His Royal Highness desires that there may be kept up in all districts a careful system of registration of available transport which can be obtained upon any emergency so as to ensure that the transport requirements of the Volunteer Force may be met with ease and rapidity. As the practical testing of such a scheme will materially aid to efficiency, Volunteer Officers should be encouraged to take this transport with them when going into camp, and on other occasions.”

I do not know, my Lords, where the encouragement is! If withdrawing the sum at first granted is encouragement, I think it is strange indeed. If they think the farmers will lend them horses and carts on all occasions for nothing, I think they will find themselves greatly mistaken. We all know that the Englishman is a very fine fellow, but I am not quite certain that he is not a tradesman before he is a patriot. Then the Circular says that—

I do not desire to detain your Lordships longer on this matter. I simply desire to call the attention of the noble Lord the Secretary of State for War to those two Circulars, which are certainly inconsistent with each other. When I say inconsistent, I mean that the experiment has not been sufficiently tried to satisfy the War Office that what they are proposing to do is likely to be effective. I am satisfied it would not be effective, and the question I am desirous of putting to the noble Lord is this—Has the Government abandoned, once and for all, its intention, not of registering carts and horses, but of organising a transport system for the Volunteer Forces? I say that, as far as I can judge, if they propose to abandon to the efforts of the Volunteers themselves the organisation of transport for that service, they are not doing justice to a force which has endeavoured to the best of its ability to supply a defence for the country in case its services may ever be required.

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Lord HARRIS): My Lords, the great interest which the noble Lord has always taken in the Volunteer Force fully justifies him in bringing forward any subject having reference to that force in this House; but I am afraid that the views of the noble Lord on this question and the views held by the Military Authorities hardly go together. I take it that the noble Lord starts with the assumption that the total and entire destruction of the Volunteer Force would ensue if they had to meet an enemy and have not an organised transport. I can quite understand, in the case of a country being invaded, or an expedition advancing from the coast where carts and horses were not easily procured, that dictum as to the necessity for transport being correct; but I submit to your Lordships, in the case of a country like England, with its vast supply of carts and horses, we are in a very different position, and that, as a matter of fact, it would be extremely easy on any sudden alarm to obtain such transport as was required for any Volunteer Forces. The noble Lord has called special attention to certain War Office Circulars, and it is necessary for me to detain your Lordships for a few moments while I explain what occurred in regard to the two experiments made which those Circulars had reference to. As the noble Lord has stated, the result of the experiment made by Sir William Humphreys induced the War Office last year to select 10 infantry battalions to further try the experiment whether carts and horses could be procured and the men to drive them, and whether those carts and horses could be brought out for three days' practice during the time the battalions went into camp. By that arrangement, to pay the expenses of those carts and horses being out for three days the sum of £45 was given to each battalion. The noble Lord appears inclined to cavil at the opinion of the War Office that the experiment was successful, and he instances the fact that, in one or two cases, horses were not picketed. I believe that in a few cases they were not picketed, but that was simply because it was not thought necessary for climatic reasons to incur loss which could be avoided. Whether that was due to the action of Local Authorities or to the Commanding Officers of the battalions, or the Officer commanding the sub-district, I do not know; but it was considered that colds might result to the horses from being picketed out at night, and I think that most people will agree that the Officers were perfectly right. At any rate, the opinion of the War Office was that the experiment was eminently satisfactory, and that it showed there was an ample supply of carts and horses for the transport of Volunteers. From what we know of the resources of the country, we have every reason to believe that this applies equally elsewhere, and that the same conditions will be found to exist in other parts of the country. The noble Lord will see that the Circular expressly refers to it as an experiment—nothing more. It was never intended that £45 should be granted to every infantry battalion in the country for the purpose of organising transport; the experiment was solely made to see whether the same thing could be carried out in other parts of the country, and our experience has shown that it can. Then the noble Lord referred to contracts, which, in some cases, had been entered into by Commanding Officers with persons owning carts and horses to supply them under certain conditions of emergency or when required. But it is obvious that we could not allow Commanding Officers to enter into contracts in which we were pledged to purchase those carts and horses at a future time. Clearly, in such a matter, it is necessary that headquarters should have the last word as regards the price that should be eventually paid. Therefore, it was proposed to carry out the idea in another way; that a skeleton form of contract should be sent round to all Commanding Officers of Volunteer battalions asking them to ascertain whether persons owning carts and horses in their neighbourhood would enter into such contracts. That scheme had nothing whatever to do with the scheme which Sir William Humphreys originated; it was a distinct system altogether, and was adopted in consequence of one or two Volunteer officers having entered into contracts. That was to some extent a little misunderstood by Commanding Officers, but at any rate the returns which they made showed that owners of carts and horses were unwilling to pledge themselves in the future to supply them without a price being agreed upon beforehand. But, my Lords, in the meantime, some-

Defence Bill has passed; and we can now requisition carts and horses, not for a limited period merely, but we can actually take those carts and horses and purchase them for as long as they are wanted. Before that Bill passed carts and horses could only be taken for a day's journey, but now they can be bought out and out at a value fixed; and when there is disagreement the matter may be referred to a County Court Judge. So that we are in a much more advantageous position with regard to obtaining transport now than when we issued the skeleton form for such contracts. As I have stated to your Lordships, we can now take carts and horses when they are wanted, according to the value set upon them at the time by the valuers. My Lords, I do not think it would be reasonable to ask the taxpayers of this country to keep up for what the noble Lord has called "a standing Army," that is to say for the Volunteer Force, a Standing Transport. I do not see how it could cost less than £10,000, taking it even upon the basis of the £45 each given to the 10 battalions; but whether that is considered a large or a small sum, I am bound to say that in my opinion we should not be justified in asking the country to keep up a Standing Transport Service for the Volunteer Force, because we know that there is an ample supply of both horses and carts in this country which would be forthcoming in the event of any attempt at invasion; and from the experience of the Military Authorities, it is believed that that transport could be adequately organised in the time within which it would be necessary for it to be organised. My Lords, upon those grounds it is, that the scheme for testing the supply of transport in the cases mentioned by the noble Lord has not been pursued, and as regards the scheme for contracting for the supply of carts out-and-out, that has been rendered unnecessary by the passing of the National Defence Act. But it is obviously a very great advantage, as pointed out in one of the letters, that Commanding Officers should keep a register of the carts and horses suitable for this purpose in their neighbourhood, because in the event of emergency, those are the carts and horses organise for transport purposes if they were wanted. I do not think from what I have heard from the Military Authorities that there is any necessity for establishing a Volunteer Transport Service; but such a register to be kept by Commanding Officers as is proposed in the War Office Circular would be of great value. I think it is very possible as the noble Lord has said, that we have not received from the Volunteers the last demand that will be made upon the country's purse in order to make provision for their equipment; but I am glad to hear the noble Lord acknowledge that the last grant made has been an assistance to them. My Lords, I can only say that whenever we think it is essential that the Volunteer Force should be assisted by schemes of a tentative nature such as those which have been brought under your notice by the noble Lord to-night, we shall most certainly carry them out in order to increase the efficiency of the Volunteer Force; but where we do not think they are absolutely essential we certainly decline to put the taxpayers to increased expense.

QUESTIONS.

THE COLONY OF ST. VINCENT.

MR. MACNEILL (Donegall S.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether his attention has been called to the case of Mr. C. J. M'Leod, who was appointed Provost Marshal and Inspector of Prisons in the Colony of St. Vincent in 1882, at a salary of £250 per annum, and upon whom, in the last three years, the additional offices of Registrar of the Supreme Court of Judicature, Registrar of Deeds, Registrar of the Court of Appeal for the Windward Islands, Secretary to the Incumbered Estates Court, and Registrar, Taxing Master, and Receiver in Bankruptcy, have been imposed without an increase of salary; whether there is any precedent, either in the Imperial or Colonial Service, for imposing seven more offices upon an officer without any addition to his salary; whether the Secretary of State will consider the question of either granting to Mr. M'Leod an increase of salary, or relieving him from performing the onerous and responsible duties of the said offices to which he has been appointed and for which he receives no additional remuneration; and, whether each Governor, under whom he has served, has placed on record his approbation of the manner in which he discharged his duties?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. de Worms, Liverpool, East Toxteth): Mr. M'Leod was appointed in 1882 Provost Marshal in the Colony of St. Vincent, the duties of which office included the inspectorship of the prison, with a salary of £250 per annum. By a colonial law, passed in 1886, the office of Provost Marshal and the office of Colonial Registrar, which embraced the duties of Registrar of the Supreme Court, Registrar of Deeds, Registrar of the Court of Appeal, and Secretary to the Incumbered Estates Court, were abolished, and a new office of Registrar was created to which the duties of both the abolished offices were attached with a salary of £250 per annum. This new office was offered to, and accepted by, Mr. M'Leod. By a subsequent Ordinance the duties of Registrar, Taxing Master, and Receiver in Bankruptcy have been assigned to the Registrar without increase of salary. There are precedents in the Colonial Service for imposing additional duties on public officers without additional salary. As the duties of the combined offices held by Mr. M'Leod can be easily discharged by one officer, and the salary is not considered to be inadequate, having regard to the financial position of the Colony, the Secretary of State does not propose to recommend that his salary should be increased, or that he should be relieved from any of those duties.

a year in rates, you will not be surprised to hear that hitherto they have had some voice in the management of local affairs in respect of those rates. I am not able to speak so well with regard to the Gas and Water Corporations, but I have no doubt that they contribute largely also. I have a list of counties here amounting to 18, in which they are the largest contributors to the rates in those counties. Yet, notwithstanding this, as I said before, their representation is to be entirely swept away. Now, having regard to the fact that the only change which was made in this Bill in its passage through another place was with regard to the right of eligibility to the Council being extended to parties who practically pay no rates whatever, it does seem strange that those who have hitherto enjoyed the right of representation should have that right entirely abrogated. I hope the noble Lord who has charge of this Bill will take this matter into consideration; and I do not think it will be difficult for him to devise some means by which those powerful Corporations who contribute so largely to the rates in Scotland as well as in England should have a voice in the representation. Another of the points on which I should ask your Lordships' attention is with reference to the rules relating to the appointment of officers under Clause 82. It seems to me of very doubtful expediency compelling the new Councils to appoint the Clerks of Supply. Under that clause they have no option, but they must appoint for the first year whoever happens to be the Clerk of Supply. The Clerks of Supply will be, in many instances, by no means the least important of the officials who will be brought under the County Councils. In the County to which I belong the Clerk to the Road Board is a more important individual, and is far better paid than any other, and it seems to me either that the Councils should be permitted to appoint their own officers from the first, or they should be allowed to select from among the officers brought under their control. In that way I should prefer myself giving them full liberty in the choice of their officers. It is more important, especially at the commencement of such an institution as this, that the Council should have the best advice that they can possibly get.

Anyone who has had anything to do with Scottish business knows the importance of this, and how much the efficiency of the administration of Scottish local business will depend upon these posts being properly filled. I think the County Councils should at least have the option of appointing any officer whom they think most efficient to act as County Clerk. Then, my Lords, Clause 22, which has been referred to by the noble Lord, deals with the question of the appropriation of the License Duties and Probate Duty Grants. Those grants are distributed in six different ways. In the first five the sum allocated is a fixed sum, and the sum which is to be given in relief to State-aided schools is to be the balance. This sum may vary very considerably, but it seems to me to be very desirable if it were possible that the sum should be so far as it can be made a fixed one. I do not know whether that is impossible to be done, but I should like to suggest, at any rate, whether it would not be practicable to strike an average, say, for the last ten years, so that the Local Board might know pretty nearly what sum they would be entitled to in regard to the relief of school fees. The only other point which I have to refer to is the appointment of Justices of the Peace under Clause 10. That clause says that the Chairman shall be by virtue of his office a Justice of the Peace of the county. Justices of the Peace have hitherto been appointed by the Crown. I do not know whether the appointment by an Act of this kind will make any difference, or whether it will be necessary to make any new provision under which a Justice of the Peace will in future be made otherwise than by the Crown. I have no other observations to make than to say that I believe this measure will be attended with great advantage to Scotland. We have all had experience of popular Government in the administration of roads and schools, and, speaking for myself, and in my capacity as chairman of bodies of both kinds, I can only say that the introduction of the popular element has been attended with complete success. I have, therefore, no fear whatever of the operation of this Bill.

public buildings, and are always supplied when asked for. They are not so generally supplied as the Swedish "Lion" matches, because the latter are lower in price. The contract prices are 5d. per dozen boxes for the latter, and 7d. for the former. In either case each box contains 100 or more matches.

IRELAND—MONEY ORDER OFFICE FOR LISCARRALL.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General if a Memorial has been received by the Post Office Authorities, largely signed by the traders and inhabitants of Liscarrall, asking them to open a Money Order Office and Savings Bank Department in that town; and, if, in view of the considerable business done and the important fairs held there, any steps will be taken towards affording those facilities asked for in the Memorial?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, Cambridge University): I find that the Memorial referred to by the hon. Member was received on the 5th of June last, and was duly attended to. Liscarrall contains about 600 inhabitants, and from a Return which has been taken it appears that only one money order was issued, during the four weeks ending the 8th June, to any resident in the place. The circumstances, therefore, would not justify a Money Order Office being opened there, unless a guarantee were given by the applicants to recoup the Department for any loss to the Revenue which might accrue from it. Offer has been made of a Money Order Office on these terms, but the offer has not been accepted, and as Postal Orders are already being sold at Liscarrall, I do not see that the Department can do anything further in the matter at present. The question of granting Savings Banks, irrespective of Money Order Offices, is under consideration.

H.M.S. RODNEY—H.M.S. ELK.

MR. GOURLEY (Sunderland): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty if it is correct that H.M.S. Rodney, which fouled the North Goodwin Lightship, when on her passage to Portsmouth, was considerably out of her course; and, whether the Elk, which fouled the Newark Lightship, when on her passage from Queensferry to Portsmouth, was also out of her course; if so, will he state whether either of the vessels had on board a licensed pilot, also the extent of damage sustained by the two vessels and the lightships?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): It is not correct to say that the Rodney and the Elk were considerably out of their course when they fouled the lightships referred to. An error of judgment in not making sufficient allowance for the strength of the tide was the cause of the collision in both cases. Neither of the vessels had pilots on board, but were navigated by their own officers. The damage done to the ships and light vessels was slight, except to the Elk, though even in her case the injury did not extend below the upper deck.

GEMS AND RELICS IN CYPRUS.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON (Shropshire, Oswestry): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he is aware that gems and antique relics found in Cyprus have for many years been, and are still being, taken away from the island; and whether some restrictions could be placed upon their removal?

BARON H. DE WORMS: Digging for antiquities cannot take place in Cyprus except under permit from the Government, which usually reserves to itself a share by way of Royalty. The permits are now given out with much caution, but the licences are not restricted by law as to the removal from the island of their share of what is found. Her Majesty's Government have decided not to issue any further licences (except, perhaps, under very special circumstances) to private parties desiring to export the antiquities for their own profit or benefit, but only to institutions like the Cyprus Museum, the British Museum, the Berlin Museum, &c.

IRELAND—POLICE REPORTS.

MR. M'CARTAN (Down, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, with reference to "the power of writing Reports," which is one of the qualifications for obtaining promotion in the Royal Irish Constabulary, whether he will state what test, if any, is applied as to the accuracy of such Reports?

say that my remarks upon this matter are not original, for they really follow what was said by Earl Beauchamp with regard to enlargement of area. I do not think, in England, the same objection exists, because, there, political feeling does not rise so high as it does in Scotland; but I cannot help thinking that it is unfortunate we should have a repetition of the same state of things. I think, instead of there being one County Councillor for each area as proposed, it would have been much better if the area were enlarged and six or so returned for that area. You would then get, as representatives, different sorts of people. You would get, perhaps, the larger tenant-farmers, the doctors, or the veterinary surgeons of the neighbourhood, whereas, if you have one Councillor only for one area, you will perhaps get the person returned who puts himself most prominently forward. I very much fear that the effect of that clause will be that the most pushing or energetic person, possibly some farmer radically inclined, will be found putting himself forward. I do not know what may happen to this Bill in Committee, so many Bills disappear at that stage; but I desire to give notice that I intend to move the deletion in Clause 82 of the latter part of Sub-section 3, the whole of Sub-section 4, and the latter part of Sub-section 6. My Lords, it seems to me that this point of one Councillor, one area is an important one and ought to be well considered. In other respects I think the Bill a useful and necessary one.

*THE EARL OF MINTO: My Lords, I wish to make only one remark. To my mind this Bill is in many respects a valuable one, and I hope it will work well in Scotland; but, in my opinion, the disfranchising part of it, as regards many of those who are qualified to take an intelligent part in the government of the county is a defect. Those persons are at present rather a numerous body, and by this Bill you are diminishing the number of those who may take part in treating subjects to be brought before the Council. I only wish to make that remark, and I shall perhaps in Committee move an Amendment embodying my views on the point. I rather think that the noble Lord who has just spoken looks upon it in the same light as I do myself.

On question that ("now") stand part of the Motion, resolved in the affirmative: Then the original Motion was agreed to: Bill read 2<sup>a</sup> accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Tuesday next.

INTERPRETATION BILL. (No. 92.)

Adjourned Debate on Amendment moved on Third Reading resumed according to Order.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: My Lords, I do not think I ought to persist in the Amendment which I had sought to introduce into this Bill after the remarks of my noble Friend upon it with regard to both place and time. Although I am still of opinion that it is important some such amendment of the law should be made, yet I should be sorry to carry by a majority an Amendment of this description, which some noble and learned Lords think is not really called for by the necessities of the case. I can only say, in abandoning this Amendment, that I shall claim from those noble and learned Lords next year their assistance into putting into a form more satisfactory to themselves some general enactment, which shall have a more definite legal meaning attached to it, so that that confusion shall not be possible in private Acts which exists at present. I know it is very easy to say that you can always cure that by putting a specific section into the Act. That is quite true; but the answer is that people do not do so, and the consequence is that from time to time Acts are passed without any provision as to what meaning is to be attached to them in computing time. Under the circumstances, after the opposition which has been offered to it, and the explanations given by my noble and learned Friends the other night, I do not think it would be becoming in me to persist in the Amendment of which that alteration formed the subject.

Amendment (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

Another Amendment proposed, in Clause 12, line 11, after the word "India" insert

"And where parts of such dominions are under both a central, and a local legislature, all

Orient Steamship Company of London for the conveyance of the Canadian mail between Plymouth and Canada, which has been for many years carried by Messrs. Allan, of Glasgow and Liverpool, between Liverpool and Canada via Londonderry; whether he is aware that it is not alone a matter of great importance to Londonderry that the service via Londonderry should be maintained, but it is also most important to Ireland generally, as the change in the service would have the effect of cutting off to a considerable extent the intercourse with Canada; and whether his attention has been called to the advantages which a subsidy from the Canadian Government for carrying the mails by steamers, which must call at a French port, and with a subvention from the British Government to the same vessels as Admiralty cruisers, together with the French export bounties, will give to the French manufacturers in Canadian markets over the British manufacturers, who will have to export their goods from Glasgow and Liverpool by unsubsidised steamers, and without the other advantages enjoyed by the French manufacturer?

BARON H. DE WORMS: The details of the contract between the Orient Steamship Company and the Canadian Government are under the control of the Dominion Government, and the considerations referred to by the hon. Member do not appear to justify Her Majesty's Government in making any official representations to Canada on the subject. The improved arrangements are, it is understood, highly appreciated by the public; and they form a part of the great system of communication between this country and the far East, via Canada, from which important advantages are anticipated.

KANTURK AND NEWMARKET RAILWAY.

MR. FLYNN: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if the Board have yet decided on the appointment of arbitrators under Section 13 of "The Kanturk and Newmarket Railway Act, 1888;" is he aware of the request put forward by the Kanturk Board of Guardians, as representing the ratepayers, to the effect that they should have a voice in the appointment of the arbitrators; is it a fact, as reported, that two gentlemen have already been named to act—namely, Mr. Denham Franklin and Mr. Kirby, C.E.; is he aware that Mr. Franklin is the nominee of the company, and Mr. Kirby has acted in an engineering capacity for and has been a paid employé of the company; and will he undertake that the request of the ratepayers, as conveyed in the correspondence with the Board of Trade, will receive due attention?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: Under Section 13 of the Kanturk and Newmarket Railway Act, 1887, the Board of Trade may, during a specified time, upon the request of the company, appoint as arbitrators the County Surveyor acting for the time being in the East Riding of the County of Cork, and two other persons to be selected by the Board of Trade. The names of two gentlemen qualified to act as arbitrators were suggested by the Railway Company. These names were approved by the grand jury and by the Irish Government, but the Kanturk and Newmarket Guardians suggested two other names. The Board of Trade appointed Mr. Franklin, one of the gentlemen suggested by the Railway Company, and Mr. M'Hugh, one of the gentlemen suggested by the Board of Guardians. They also appointed the County Surveyor, acting for the time being in the East Riding of the County of Cork, following the terms of the Act. It appears there are two Surveyors, and if it be found undesirable that Mr. Kirby should act the Board of Trade will take steps for the appointment of the other Surveyor acting in the East Riding.

FENIT PIER LOAN.

MR. MAHONY (Meath, N): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that in the instructions issued by the Lord Lieutenant to the cesspayers of the baronies connected with the Fenit Pier Loan, and on faith of which the cesspayers gave a guarantee for £95,000, the following passage occurs:—

"No portion of it (the loan) can be expended on the present canal, or in payment of the balance of the canal debt due to the Public Works Loan Commissioners, or of the instalments of the present loan;"

but that, in spite of this passage in the instructions, £2,500 was paid to the National Bank in discharge of a debt due by the canal, £300 and £290 were paid to the Public Works Loan Commissioners in discharge of the debt due by the canal, and £3,192 11s. 4d. was paid to the Irish Board of Works in discharge of the instalments on the Fenit Pier Loan referred to in the Lord Lieutenant's instructions as the present loan; whether interest has to be paid and capital repaid by the taxpayers as regards these sums, although these sums were paid by the Fenit Harbour Commissioners in direct contravention of the Lord Lieutenant's instructions, on the faith of which the taxpayers gave their guarantee; and, whether, if these facts be as stated, he will take steps to enforce the instructions of the Lord Lieutenant?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Full information on the subject of this question has not yet reached me. I must therefore ask the hon. Member to be so good as to defer it for two or three days.

GLOUCESTERSHIRE ENGINEER VOLUNTEERS.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): I beg to ask the Secretary to the War Office whether his attention has been drawn to the fact that the 1st Gloucestershire Royal Engineers' band is advertised to take part in a Unionist demonstration at Ledbury; whether the above-named band is the band of a Volunteer regiment; and, whether he will take any action in the matter?

THE SECRETARY TO THE WAR OFFICE (MR. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): The band of the 1st Gloucestershire Engineer Volunteers accepted an engagement to play at a fête at Ledbury under the impression that the fête was not political. On learning that the contrary was the case, the engagement was cancelled.

LABOUR STATISTICS.

MR. BRADLAUGH: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he can state the cause of the delay in the issue of the further Returns promised by the Labour Statistics Department; and, whether he can state if any additional information has been collected this Session, and when such information will be published?

Mr. Mahony

SIR M. HICKS BEACH: A part of the census of wages (a most important part) is now in the hands of the printers. A Return as to the cost of living is also in proof. The Report as to strikes for 1888 and the Annual Report as to Trades Unions are also with the printers. These four papers will be issued very shortly. The other parts of the programme in the Memorandum No. 433 of Session 1888 will be carried out. There has been unavoidable delay with some of these papers owing to the great novelty of the work, as explained in the Memorandum referred to, but they are being pressed forward as rapidly as possible with the staff at the disposal of the Department.

THE BLENHEIM.

MR. BRADLAUGH: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether any shipbuilding contracts with the Admiralty are now being carried out by the Thames Ship Building and Iron Works Company; whether he is aware that, in consequence of certain trade differences, a considerable number of unskilled workmen are now employed as rivetters in such works, and that some of the bolts are very imperfectly rivetted; and, whether efficient inspection is practised, to prevent such rivetting from being passed?

*LORD G. HAMILTON: The Blenheim is being built by the Thames Shipbuilding Company. The Admiralty are aware that certain difficulties have arisen with the workmen, but they are not aware that any unskilled workmen are employed on skilled work, or that any work has been done imperfectly. There is efficient inspection, and there is no risk of imperfect work being passed even if—which is unlikely from the reputation of the firm—such an attempt was made.

MARITIME INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE.

MR. GOURLEY: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade how many delegates he intends sending to the Maritime International Conference, which is to be held at Washington in the autumn; and whether he can place before the House a programme of the questions likely to be discussed?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: No answer has yet been received from the United States Government to our proposals as to the conditions to which the Conference should be subject, and until this is received it is not possible to make any statement with regard to it.

IRELAND—CASE OF DR. TANNER.

MR. MATTHEW KENNY (Tyrone, Mid.): I beg to ask the Solicitor General for Ireland if there is any precedent, since the passing of the Act 14 and 15 Vic. c. 93, for Magistrates at Petty Sessions in Ireland requiring a person adjudged by them guilty of a contempt of Court to find sureties for good behaviour?

*THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, University of Dublin): Perhaps I may be allowed at the same time to reply to the question of the right hon. Gentleman the Lord Mayor of Dublin—namely:—

“Whether it was for ‘contempt of Court’ in language used by him in addressing the Court upon a charge against himself that Dr. Tanner, M.P., was ordered by two stipendiaries at Tipperary on Monday last to find bail or to undergo imprisonment for three months; and whether it was within the legal competency of the justices to deal with ‘contempt of Court’ otherwise than by a sentence of imprisonment for a period not exceeding one week.”

It appears that the hon. Member referred to in these questions was not adjudged by the Magistrates to be guilty of a contempt of Court. The conduct in respect of which the hon. Member was ordered to find bail to be of good behaviour took place in open Court, but the Magistrates acted under their jurisdiction in holding the Commission of the Peace, and not under the statutable authority referred to in the question of the hon. Member for South Cork. The hon. Member was not sentenced by the Court to any punishment for contempt of Court, nor need he undergo any punishment at all provided he gives the required securities to be of good behaviour.

MR. MAC NEILL: Does not the Petty Sessions Act prescribe that the punishment for contempt of Court shall be seven days’ imprisonment, and no more?

*MR. MADDEN: The Magistrates did not in this instance exercise the statutory jurisdiction at all.

MR. W. O'BRIEN (Cork County, N.E.): May I ask whether the offence for which Dr. Tanner has been sentenced is not that of making a speech in his own defence, his counsel having been thrust out of Court by the Magistrates?

*MR. MADDEN: It was in the course of making a speech that the insult was offered to the Magistrates composing the Court.

MR. W. O'BRIEN: Are we to understand that in Ireland in future, if a Magistrate chooses to put an accused person's counsel out of Court, and the accused afterwards in any way offends the Magistrate's canons of manners, the presiding Magistrate is to send him to prison for three months?

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): Was or was not the offence contempt of Court, and, if it was, were the Magistrates justified in going outside the statute, which prescribes that a person committing contempt may be fined or imprisoned for a period of seven days only?

*MR. MADDEN: The right hon. Gentleman has brought the matter to a very narrow issue. The statute provides a certain punishment for contempt of Court. It is competent for the Magistrates to order a person guilty of certain conduct to find sureties for his good behaviour, and the question is whether this jurisdiction is ousted by the Statute in cases where the latter applies. The right hon. Gentleman raises the question whether the order in this case has been made legally or illegally—whether it was within or outside the jurisdiction of the Magistrates. As there are perfectly understood means by which such a question can be raised, it would not be proper for me to express an opinion on the legal point.

MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): Is there any precedent in the Superior Courts of England, Ireland, or Scotland where a Judge in a Superior Court, having been insulted in his Court, has dealt with such a case, not as one of contempt of Court, but has called on the offending person to find bail, and in default has sent him to prison?

*MR. MADDEN: There is the highest authority for saying that insulting or contemptuous language spoken of Judges or Magistrates is a proper matter for the exercise of the jurisdiction of the Magistrates under the Statute referred to; but whether, where there is statutable jurisdiction for dealing with contempt of Court, it is co-extensive with the general jurisdiction to which I have referred, I must decline to discuss, as that is a question which must be decided by proper legal authority.

Mr. SEXTON: In consequence of a telegram just received from Dr. Tanner as to the violence from which he has suffered I feel myself under the necessity of giving notice that at the end of the questions I will move the adjournment of the House.

SHIPBUILDING ON THE FOYLE.

Mr. JUSTIN M'CARTHY: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether, having regard to the fact that, on his own statement in April, 1887, the ship yard on the Foyle at Derry City was duly certified and placed upon the Admiralty List, he will give directions that some of the contracts for the new shipbuilding undertaken by the Admiralty shall be offered to the Derry shipbuilding yard?

*Lord G. HAMILTON: The shipbuilding yard on the Foyle at Derry, though placed on the Admiralty List as eligible for certain classes of war ships, is not considered capable at present of constructing vessels of over 2,000 tons displacement under the conditions required by the Admiralty. The ships to be built under the new programme are either too large for the capabilities of the yard or of such a special character that they could only be intrusted to firms which have made vessels of the kind a speciality.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT (SCOTLAND) BILL—THE BURGH OF DYSART.

Sir GEORGE CAMPBELL: I beg to ask the Lord Advocate if he will issue a revised edition of the provisional proposals as to number of County Councillors in Scotland, so far as regards the County of Fife, and will assign a representation on the County Council to the burgh of Dysart, hitherto omitted, so as to relieve the uncertainty which still prevails in the locality?

*The LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): I have sent to the hon. Gentleman a revised edition of the proposals, from which he will observe that Dysart is duly assigned a

THE NAVAL REVIEW.

Mr. HANBURY (Preston): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether, on the occasion of the coming inspection of the Fleet, when the Admiral and other officers in command are to be presented to the German Emperor on board the Victoria and Albert, any officers have been nominated to represent either the Royal Marine Artillery or the Royal Marine Light Infantry, 4,700 men of which corps are at present embarked in the Fleet; and, if not, whether this omission to recognise the senior officers of the Marine Force is due to an inadvertence?

*Lord G. HAMILTON: The only officers who are to be presented to the German Emperor, on the occasion of his visiting the Fleet at Spithead on August 3rd, are those in command of ships present, who are of the rank of commander and upwards. It is the tradition and the practice both in the Navy and the Army for the officer in command of a ship or of a land force to represent in his individual person all the component parts of the force under his command, and I see no reason for departing on the present occasion from this practice.

IRELAND—LOAN FUND BOARDS.

Mr. O'DOHERTY (Donegal, N.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether it is a fact that printed notices of default by Loan Fund Boards in Ireland are charged as letters, and notices by Railway Companies advising goods as circulars, and what is the distinction between them; and, whether he can see his way to treat them alike in future?

*Mr. RAIKES: The hon. Member has been good enough to send me copies of the documents referred to in his question, and having examined them, I have to state that they are both letters, and have no claim to be considered "circular" letters, as the particulars they contain must obviously vary from the particulars of other letters sent by the same persons for a similar purpose. They should, therefore, both alike have been charged at the letter rate.

THE CLANRICARDE ESTATE.

Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central): I beg to ask the Chief Secre-

whether the Rev. P. Costelloe, the newly-appointed parish priest of Woodford, Galway, has recently addressed a letter to him, stating that he had recently been authorised by the tenants of the Clanricarde estate to offer to Lord Clanricarde, either to purchase their holdings on reasonable terms, or to refer the matters in dispute to arbitration, or to agree to reasonable terms, conditional upon the re-installment of the seventy evicted tenants upon the same terms; and that Lord Clanricarde had refused the offer, and was making great preparations for the wholesale eviction of the tenants; whether Mr. Costelloe, under these circumstances, requested the Government to send down to the district an impartial Commissioner for the purpose of hearing both sides and presenting a Report on the whole case; and in the meantime to suspend supporting the evictions with the forces of the Crown; and, whether a refusal was made by the Government to this request; and, if so, whether he will lay upon the Table of the House the letter of Father Costelloe, and his reply to it, and also any correspondence which has passed between himself and Dr. Healy, the coadjutor Bishop of the Diocese, on the same subject, with reference to the pending evictions on the Portumna district of the Clanricarde property?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The right hon. Gentleman will not object to my saying, in accordance with an answer I previously gave on the subject of the last paragraph of the question, that I must with all respect decline to gratify his curiosity with regard to my private correspondence.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: Will the right hon. Gentleman answer the first part of the question, which has reference to correspondence not of a private nature?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The letter was addressed to me in my private capacity, and I decline to make it public.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: I understand that the letter was addressed to the right hon. Gentleman in his public capacity, and I should like to know whether a Minister can decline to publicly answer a letter written to him in his public capacity?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Yes, Sir; I have a right to answer privately any letter addressed to me in any way I like.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: I shall draw attention to the matter on the Estimates.

"BOARD OF TRADE JOURNAL."

MR. HOWARD VINCENT: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if he can give the House any information concerning the advantage the manufacturers and merchants of the United Kingdom take of the Board of Trade Journal as a guide to the condition and requirements of British trade abroad; and, if there is any truth in the allegation that foreign competitors more largely utilise the valuable information furnished by Her Majesty's Diplomatic and Consular Officers than our own countrymen?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: The Board of Trade Journal is made use of by Chambers of Commerce, the Agents General for the Colonies, and other authorities, as well as by private merchants, who express themselves as greatly interested in the contents. There is no doubt business people profit by information of the kind which the Journal contains. The Press also make a large use of the information. The Board of Trade have not been informed that our foreign competitors more largely utilise the information than our own traders, and they do not believe it likely that this is the case, the information relating mainly to places where our own trade requires development, or to circumstances which our own traders have the best opportunity to take advantage of. The risk of foreign competitors utilising the information is, of course, no reason why our own traders should not have the advantage of it.

IRISH PRISONERS AND WHITE-WASHED CELLS.

MR. MACNEILL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that Mr. Conybeare, and other prisoners in Derry Gaol, complained on Saturday evening last that their eyes were weakened and influenced by the glare of the whitewash on the walls of their cells; and, whether, having regard to the cases of Messrs. Wilfred Blunt and Cox, M.P., whose sight has been impaired by imprisonment under similar circumstances, he will be prepared to direct the calls of these prisoners to be covered with a wash of blue or pink instead of the ordinary whitewash?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: My attention has not been called to the article in question, which does not seem very relevant to the question on the Paper. The General Prisons Board inform me that the Governor of Londonderry Prison has reported that it is not the case that Mr. Conybeare or any other prisoner had complained, as alleged in the first paragraph of the question; and as the hon. Member has been already informed, in reply to questions put by him on July 19, there is no evidence that either the sight of Mr. Blunt or of Mr. Cox, M.P., was impaired by imprisonment, nor do the Prisons Board see any necessity to alter the existing arrangements in regard to the colouring of the walls.

MR. COX: I do not wish to trouble the House with my own grievances and infirmities, but does the right hon. Gentleman know that I was conveyed from Dundalk Gaol to Kilmainham Gaol at the order of the Prisons Board?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I shall be glad to answer any specific question put to me if the hon. Member will put it on the Paper; but the Prisons Board declare that there is no evidence that the sight of the hon. Member was impaired by his imprisonment.

MR. MACNEILL: Does not the right hon. Gentleman know that Mr. Blunt, in my presence and in the presence of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. Shaw Lefevre), swore that his eyesight was injured, and the Attorney-General, who was prosecuting, laughed, though he apologised for so doing?

MR. GILL: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that Mr. Powell, who is now being prosecuted, has practically lost the sight of one eye owing to two imprisonments?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: On the general question, I can only say that I can hardly believe that the eyesight of hon. Gentlemen in prison under the Criminal Law and Procedure Act is more delicate than that of persons imprisoned under other Acts; and, as I have not heard of complaints in the latter class of cases, I hope there is no ground for the fears of hon. Gentlemen.

FORAGE RATIONS OF OFFICERS' HORSES.

MR. HANBURY: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he has yet come to a decision upon the question of the right of the War Office to reduce the forage rations of officers' horses; and whether it is contended that the power to alter or vary the rations by the substitution of equivalents also includes a right to reduce it altogether?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (MR. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): I hold it to be quite within my power to make an experiment in the reduction of the ration, which is not a personal emolument of the officer's; but if any permanent alterations are deemed necessary a new warrant would certainly be issued.

MAILS TO CHINA VIA CANADA.

SIR GEORGE BADEN-POWELL (Liverpool, Kirkdale): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he can now say when the new contract for the conveyance of mails between England and China via Canada can be printed and circulated for the information of the House; and when it is likely to be brought before the House?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (MR. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): I hope the contract and Treasury Minute will be circulated to-morrow.

SIR GEORGE BADEN-POWELL: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he is aware that, in regard to the new contract for the conveyance of mails between England and Canada and China, Messrs. Allan have publicly declared that now they are released from mail duties they will be able to improve their service via Londonderry to Canada; whether the Dominion, Beaver, and other regular lines will continue to run as before unaffected by the new arrangements; whether the contractors for the new service, in their own interests, make special provision for Irish mails and passengers; and whether the new service will compete directly, not with any existing British lines, but with the subsidised French and German lines carrying the existing Continental trade, and especially the French line now running to Canada which is subsidised by the Canadian Government?

to hold out any hopes of being able to make any communication on the subject to the House this Session. During the autumn the Commissioners hope that they will be able to conclude their final Report.

TITHE RENT-CHARGE RECOVERY BILL.

MR. DILLWYN (Swansea): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, in view of the late period of the Session, and of the great opposition to the Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill which exists in many sections of the House, it is still his intention to press that measure this Session, notwithstanding that his doing so must necessitate its being passed either without due consideration of its provisions, or else by the considerable prolongation of the Session?

MR. S. LEIGHTON: Before the right hon. Gentleman answers the question, I should like to ask him whether his attention has been called to the following statement of Mr. Justice Field, made in his charge to the Grand Jury at Chester last week:—

"It was a disgrace that such things as the late tithe riots should take place in this country; and those who put in motion the mass of the people and who urged them on, directly or indirectly, had a terrible account to answer for. There was no doubt that the public mind had been agitated and roused to an extent hardly credible if it were not known as a fact."

MR. G. O. MORGAN (Denbighshire): I should like to ask whether the Bill of the Government would prevent the tithe riots?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I have not seen the report of the charge, and it would all become me to express an opinion on the learned Judge's utterances in the position which he occupies. But I wish to say that we do hope that this measure, small as far as its dimensions are concerned, will go very far indeed to remove the opportunity for these lawless displays which have occurred to the great pain of many hon. Gentlemen on both sides of the House. It is hoped that the Government will be able to pass the measure during the course of the Session. The Bill itself is confined within small limits, but it will tend very much indeed to the due regard of order.

regard to the great number of hon. Members for Wales and for English agricultural constituencies who are interested in this Bill, and in consideration of the undoubtedly protracted discussion which the Bill must lead to, the Government can see their way to allowing the discussion, when it is once opened, to be taken de die in diem?
[*MR. W. H. SMITH: I will certainly endeavour to do that.]

MR. G. O. MORGAN: Will the Bill be put down as the first Order of the Day?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The right hon. Gentleman must have sufficient experience of Parliamentary matters to know that it is impossible to answer that question definitely.

MR. H. GARDNER: Will the right hon. Gentleman consider the desirability of an autumn Session?

[No answer was returned].

SCOTLAND AND THE ASHBOURNE ACT.

MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether Her Majesty's Government has received several communications and memorials from Aberdeenshire and elsewhere, asking that the Ashbourne Act may be extended to Scotland: and whether Her Majesty's Government are or are not favourably disposed to consider the request before the meeting of Parliament next Session?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: Naturally I made inquiry for the memorials to which the hon. Member refers at the Scotch Office. Nothing is known at the Scotch Office of these memorials and communications, and, as far as I know, the Government have not received any.

PUBLIC BUSINESS.

MR. J. E. ELLIS: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, in view of the period of the Session, the general desire that it should not be much further prolonged, and the inadvisability of legislation involving controverted principles without reasonable opportunity for discussion, he can now state definitely what Government Bills will be persevered with?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I think the hon. Member will admit that the Government have been most anxious Court has been instituted at Gorey; and, whether the County of Wexford is quite free from anything like serious crime?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: An inquiry under Section 1 of the Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act was ordered at Gorey upon sworn informations that a conspiracy to boycott and intimidate existed in that district. This class of crime has, it appears, recently existed to a very great extent in different districts in the County of Wexford.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether it is true that the three men, Millan, Doyle, and Kavanagh, charged at Gorey with endeavouring to prevent people buying pigs from the Earl of Courtown, were confined in a small and dirty police cell for a considerable time, as bail was refused till next day; and, whether the Government intend to prosecute these men on any other charge than that connected with Lord Cour-with the Bill this Session. If necessary they propose to inquire into the subject early next Session.

MR. W. REDMOND: Have not strong representations been received from several of the Australian Governments in favour of the passage of the Bill?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: There can be no doubt that such representations have been made. It is fair, however, to say that a strong opinion has been expressed in this country as to the details of the measure, and the Government do not think it right, in these circumstances, to force the Measure through at this period of the Session, and, therefore, they will allow time for further consideration.

MR. W. A. McARTHUR (Cornwall, Mid, St. Austell): May I ask whether, having regard to the almost unanimous opinion in favour of this Measure, the right hon. Gentleman can give the Colonies an assurance that the Bill will be brought in early next Session, and that the Government will make a serious attempt to carry it?

brought under the Crimes Act before a Coercion Court. My hon. Friend, however, was brought before two "removable" gentlemen, the paid servants of the Executive, one of them a near relative of a well-known Irish Conservative landlord and politician, and the other a gentleman who has qualified in India for service as a Magistrate in Ireland. Mr. Healy, the Member for North Longford, was counsel for Dr. Tanner on that occasion. However hon. Members may differ from Mr. Healy, they will admit that he invariably acts from a high sense of public duty. At the hearing Mr. Healy seems to have made some observations against these two Magistrates, who seem to be somewhat peppery gentlemen, and they felt it to be their duty to take notice of them by removing him from the Court by force. Dr. Tanner was thus deprived of the services of his counsel. The case was adjourned from time to time—I can suppose for no other reason than that the sentence for the assault should not run concurrently with the other—and eventually Dr. Tanner's imprisonment for the speech expired. He had no sooner returned to his duties in this House than he received two urgent telegrams from the Crown Solicitor (Mr. George Bolton), who, having been relieved of his prolonged functions in regard to Mr. Soames, was at leisure to devote himself to the case of Dr. Tanner. The telegrams called upon my hon. Friend to appear in the Court at Tipperary. My hon. Friend, being without the assistance of counsel or solicitor, delivered a speech to the Court in his own defence, in which, in regard to the charge itself—an assault of a very objectionable kind—he declared the charge to be mean, infamous, and a lie. He said that the mere fact of being brought into Court upon such a charge gave him more moral torture than a sentence of 20 years' imprisonment. [A laugh.] I expected that sneer from the hon. and gallant Member for North Armagh (Colonel Sanderson)—it was characteristic of him; but I would appeal to the House whether Dr. Tanner is not one of the last men, in the House or out of it, to deny upon any occasion any word he has uttered or any act he has done? ["Hear, hear," from Colonel SAUNDERSON.] I thank the hon. and gallant Member for that assent. Dr.

Mr. Senton

Tanner, therefore, would never have declared this charge against him to be mean, infamous, and a lie if he had conceived there was any foundation for it. The Court, the moral competence of which to try the hon. Member I deny, nevertheless convicted him and sentenced him to a month's imprisonment with hard labour. That was a vindictive and cowardly sentence. Three times Dr. Tanner asked for such a sentence as would allow him to appeal, and three times he was refused. The Magistrates persisted in imposing a sentence which would permit of no appeal, and then added to it the indignity and torture of hard labour. It is high time for this House to intervene between the obscure kind of official subordinates in Ireland and the Irish Representatives in this House. All the time these Magistrates had another sentence up their sleeve. Dr. Tanner felt himself debarred, from a feeling of self-respect, from calling evidence in his behalf, and contented himself with denying the charge of assault, and I respectfully ask the House whether these two magisterial functionaries, if they had been inspired by a single spark of true magisterial spirit, would not have felt themselves under an obligation to allow a man whom they had deprived of his counsel and solicitor to appeal to another Court? Why is it that these servile agents of the Government should be afraid of the County Court Judge of Tipperary? Is he a gentleman they could not trust? At any rate, the appeal was refused, although imprisonment with hard labour had been inflicted on a Member of Parliament. I challenge contradiction when I say that to refuse Dr. Tanner an opportunity of bringing the case before a higher tribunal was a magisterial denial of justice. Repeated instances have been brought before me in recent days to show the growing and passionate hatred which many of these functionaries feel towards Members of this House in consequence of our action here. Let me remind the House of the fact that when the Crimes Act was being passed the Chief Secretary stated that there would be an appeal from the Magistrates in every case in which it was desired. Even if there had not been such a statement made, if it were not the well-known general intonation of the law, I ask was this not clause I have cited is clear, and the Magistrates were bound to take one of two courses—either to impose a fine or to commit to prison for some period not exceeding seven days. The argument that the Magistrates were entitled to fall back on some general jurisdiction and inflict the punishment of imprisonment for three months is untenable and absurd. As to the sentence of a month's imprisonment with hard labour for the assault, I believe that if I had the opportunity of consulting my hon. Friend (Dr. Tanner) he would not allow me to suggest that it should be modified. I therefore simply denounce that sentence as a vindictive and cowardly outrage. But with regard to the sentence for contempt of Court, I do ask that the Government should use their power and act on their duty to cancel that sentence, and to inform these blundering subordinates of theirs that they are bound to keep within the law. Then, again, why was the prison van used for Dr. Tanner alone? The prison van at Clonmel has been almost as long unused as some of the relics in the Tower of London. It is not even used for convicts. It was used for Dr. Tanner only. The officer of police whom Dr. Tanner was alleged to have assaulted was the officer in command of the police at this very place. This man had had his revenge through the law, but he was allowed to have a further revenge. He was the person who requisitioned the prison van. When I brought this question forward a little while ago, the Chief Secretary scarcely ventured to defend what has been done, but suggested that two other Members of Parliament had refused to enter an open break. I am informed the right hon. Gentleman is wrong in respect to one of them; but, whether he is right or wrong, is that any person for indicting degradation and insult on Dr. Tanner? I contend that the persons who brought the prison van to the Court did so because they knew that Dr. Tanner would refuse to enter it, because he had done so before. I submit that the authorities have been guilty of an act of mean and cruel tyranny. When Dr. Tanner refused to enter the van he was thrown upon the floor with force and violence, and the telegram to which I referred at the opening of the Debate I received from Mrs. Tanner. I have to-day received this telegram:—

“Dr. Tanner is suffering from the effects of a fall from the car in which he was being conveyed to the Court House on Monday, and by which his arm was bruised. He has since suffered from sleeplessness, and altogether his system has received a severe shock.”

That is, I think, an appeal which ought to command the sympathy of hon. Members without distinction of Party. It is one which it is impossible for the Government and for hon. Members opposite to resist, and which, I think, amply justifies the Motion which I am about to make. I think that I have proved the case I have laid before the House—namely, that Dr. Tanner has been subjected to unnecessary and wanton violence, that the first sentence passed on him was vindictive and cowardly, and that the sentence which has been passed upon him of three months' imprisonment for an alleged contempt of Court is manifestly illegal. I regret the absence on the occasion of the noble Lord the Member for Paddington, who has recently described the policy of the Irish police as a policy of exasperation. I am sure many hon. Members share the feelings which prompted that speech, and I hope they will remember that everyday brings us nearer to the time when the judgment of the nation will be asked on this excess of tyranny, persecution, and insult. I hope that hon. Members opposite will acquit themselves of all share in this cruel and unmanly violence which has been used towards Dr. Tanner, and of this lawlessness on the part of the servants of the law in Ireland, who now shelter themselves under the shield of the law. I beg to move the adjournment of the House.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
“That this House do now adjourn.”—
(Mr. Sexton.)

The Chairman of Ways and Means, at the request of Mr. Speaker, took the Chair as Deputy Speaker, in pursuance of Standing Order No. 1.

*THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University): I noticed in the speech of the right hon. Gentleman who has just just sat down that he did not for a moment deny that if the hon. Member in question had been entitled seven days for contempt of Court. It has been argued that that Act ousts the ordinary jurisdiction of the Magistrates to order persons misbehaving in their presence to find sureties to keep the peace. I do not intend to argue this question, because it is perfectly open to the hon. Member to go to the proper tribunal to have the question decided.

MR. SEXTON: And the hon. Member will remain in gaol all the time.

*MR. MADDEN: Yes, because the original sentence is unaffected by this question, but as regards the additional sentence its validity can readily be determined. The right hon. Gentleman says that the second sentence must have been for contempt of Court, because there was no formulated charge. That is not so, for Justices may exercise the jurisdiction of requiring sureties for good behaviour for what is done in their presence. By ordering the defendant to give sureties for good behaviour the Magistrates adopted a more lenient course than by imposing the statutory penalty. For if the hon. Member gives the required security, he need not go to gaol for a day. I repeat that if there is any desire to test the validity of the second sentence it is open to the hon. Member and his Friends to have the point decided by a competent Court having jurisdiction in the matter.

*MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): There are in this case two distinct trials, two distinct convictions, and two distinct punishments. The Solicitor General for Ireland, with that ability with which we are so familiar, has very cleverly mixed up two things and has endeavoured to prejudice the consideration of one by a defence of the other. I, for one, hold that it is a very serious thing to send a Member of Parliament to prison; and the noble Lord the Member for Paddington, who is a marvellously acute observer of public opinion, has discovered, what the Chief Secretary has not yet discovered, that sending Members of Parliament to prison is not popular with the constituencies of the United Kingdom. When a Member sent to prison happens to be a prominent and, if you like, a disagreeable political opponent, whose absence from the House may be desired by many sections of it, it behoves the House to scrutinise such a case with the greatest jealousy and impartiality. We ought to regard the case of the hon. Member for Cork in the same light and deal with it on precisely the same principles as we should apply to the case of any Gentleman sitting on either Front Bench. The Solicitor General in dealing with the first sentence has objected to its being called vindictive; but it must be borne in mind that an offence against the Crimes Act, against the present administration of affairs in Ireland, had been already committed, and Dr. Tanner had been punished for it. The second offence, this alleged assault on the police, arose entirely out of the first offence and cannot be severed from it. The Solicitor General said it was an outrageous and disgraceful offence. The hon. Member for Cork agrees in that view, for he avers he would sooner have suffered a long term of imprisonment than have been so accused. It is to him torture to be charged with such a vulgar and disgraceful act. But, after all, this second offence was not in the nature of an outrage tending to a breach of the peace; it was not an assault in which a policeman's head had been broken open; still, it was a very offensive assault upon the police, and whoever committed it ought to have been punished. What we are complaining of is, not that the offence was too severely punished if it was committed, but that the hon. Member for Cork was deprived entirely of two safeguards to which every Englishman is entitled—I say Englishman, and expressly exclude Irishmen. An Englishman is entitled to be represented by counsel; and no English Judge, from the Lord Chief Justice downwards, would have excluded the hon. Member for Longford for what he said on that occasion. A Judge would have remonstrated and reproved, but he would not so far have forgotten his high station and what is proper to the administration of justice as to deprive a defendant of legal advice on account of an unseemly conflict between the Bench and the Bar. Thus, in the first place, the hon. Member was deprived of his right of legal advice. Secondly, Dr. Tanner was deprived of his right of appeal. The Solicitor General says that this was a proper case to be brought under the Crimes Act. Every case in Ireland is now considered to be so. I presume that if a man committed bigamy

Mr. Madden

BARON H. DE WORMS: In answer to my hon. Friend I have to say that the Secretary of State has not a copy of the contract, and has no official knowledge of these details. He has no reason to doubt the accuracy of the facts stated by my hon. Friend; but the subject is one for the Dominion Government to deal with.

THE MEDEA AND THE VICTORIA.

MR. HANBURY: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether it is the fact that the Medea, designed to make 19½ knots, did not succeed in making more than 16 on her recent experimental cruise to Gibraltar and back, and whether, after cruising even at that speed, her boilers must be re-tubed throughout; and when were the two 110-ton guns of the Victoria tested, or has neither of them been tested yet?

*LORD G. HAMILTON: The Medea was designed to make about 20 knots on the measured mile and with forced draught, and this was accomplished by her sister ship, the Medusa. In her experimental cruise, subsequent to the forced draught trials, the Medea did not make more than 16 knots in a sea-way, with natural draught, and the tubes of the boilers leaked considerably from the results of the forced draught trials. The boilers will not require re-tubing. The Admiralty are carefully watching the trials of these and similar ships, as the problem to be solved is to test the power of the engines to develop the horse power contracted for under forced draught without injuring the boilers by the test applied. One of the 110-ton guns on board the Victoria has been tested, but the second gun has not been accepted, and is about to be returned.

GOVERNMENT DEPARTMENTS (TRANSFER OF POWERS) BILL.

MR. ROWNTREE (Scarborough): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board if he can state what course it is proposed to take with regard to the matters dealt with by the Government Departments (Transfer of Powers) Provisional Order Bill in the next Session?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. Ritchie, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): As the hon. Gentleman knows, after the Report of the Select Committee the Bill was deferred because it was manifestly impossible for the Government to proceed with the measure this Session. I am not at present prepared to state what course the Government will take next Session.

MR. T. E. ELLIS (Merionethshire): When will the evidence taken by the Committee be published?

*MR. RITCHIE: I have not the smallest idea. It is a matter with which I have no concern whatever.

POLITICAL PLACARDS IN POST OFFICES.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he is aware that a printed placard, announcing that a Primrose and Conservative demonstration will take place at Husbands Bosworth on 8th August, at which there there will be addresses from two Conservative Members of this House, dancing, a dinner, a donkey race, and other similar amusements, is exhibited in a prominent position in the post office at Market Harborough; and whether he will issue orders forbidding such placards to be exhibited in post offices in future, and will see that this particular placard is forthwith taken down?

*MR. RAIKES: I have given directions that the placard in question, if exhibited in the Market Harborough post office, is to be taken down at once, and a notice will be issued forbidding the exhibition of such notices in post offices.

ARMY AND NAVY ADMINISTRATION.

SIR WALTER BARTTELOT (Sussex, N.W.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if he is able to give the House any information as to the progress made by the Royal Commission on the Administration of the Army and Navy in the consideration of the important questions referred to them?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): The Royal Commission has agreed upon a preliminary Report on part of the subjects submitted for their consideration; but, inasmuch as this Report deals with matters of the highest importance and calls for the most careful consideration of the Government, I am unable at this late period of the Session to hold out any hopes of being able to make any communication on the subject to the House this Session. During the autumn the Commissioners hope that they will be able to conclude their final Report.

TITHE RENT-CHARGE RECOVERY BILL.

MR. DILLWYN (Swansea): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, in view of the late period of the Session, and of the great opposition to the Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill which exists in many sections of the House, it is still his intention to press that measure this Session, notwithstanding that his doing so must necessitate its being passed either without due consideration of its provisions, or else by the considerable prolongation of the Session?

MR. S. LEIGHTON: Before the right hon. Gentleman answers the question, I should like to ask him whether his attention has been called to the following statement of Mr. Justice Field, made in his charge to the Grand Jury at Chester last week:—

"It was a disgrace that such things as the late tithe riots should take place in this country; and those who put in motion the mass of the people and who urged them on, directly or indirectly, had a terrible account to answer for. There was no doubt that the public mind had been agitated and roused to an extent hardly credible if it were not known as a fact."

MR. G. O. MORGAN (Denbighshire): I should like to ask whether the Bill of the Government would prevent the tithe riots?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I have not seen the report of the charge, and it would all become me to express an opinion on the learned Judge's utterances in the position which he occupies. But I wish to say that we do hope that this measure, small as far as its dimensions are concerned, will go very far indeed to remove the opportunity for these lawless displays which have occurred to the great pain of many hon. Gentlemen on both sides of the House. It is hoped that the Government will be able to pass the measure during the course of the Session. The Bill itself is confined within small limits, but it will tend very much indeed to the due regard of order.

*MR. H. GARDNER (Essex, Saffron Walden): May I ask whether, having regard to the great number of hon. Members for Wales and for English agricultural constituencies who are interested in this Bill, and in consideration of the undoubtedly protracted discussion which the Bill must lead to, the Government can see their way to allowing the discussion, when it is once opened, to be taken de die in diem?

[*MR. W. H. SMITH: I will certainly endeavour to do that.]

MR. G. O. MORGAN: Will the Bill be put down as the first Order of the Day?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The right hon. Gentleman must have sufficient experience of Parliamentary matters to know that it is impossible to answer that question definitely.

MR. H. GARDNER: Will the right hon. Gentleman consider the desirability of an autumn Session?

[No answer was returned].

SCOTLAND AND THE ASHBOURNE ACT.

MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether Her Majesty's Government has received several communications and memorials from Aberdeenshire and elsewhere, asking that the Ashbourne Act may be extended to Scotland: and whether Her Majesty's Government are or are not favourably disposed to consider the request before the meeting of Parliament next Session?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: Naturally I made inquiry for the memorials to which the hon. Member refers at the Scotch Office. Nothing is known at the Scotch Office of these memorials and communications, and, as far as I know, the Government have not received any.

PUBLIC BUSINESS.

MR. J. E. ELLIS: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, in view of the period of the Session, the general desire that it should not be much further prolonged, and the inadvisability of legislation involving controverted principles without reasonable opportunity for discussion, he can now state definitely what Government Bills will be persevered with?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I think the hon. Member will admit that the Government have been most anxious to avoid bringing before the House at this period of the Session strongly opposed Bills. As far as I am aware the only Government Bill which involves serious controversy is the Tithe-Rent Charge Recovery Bill, and I am hoping that we shall be able to conclude the Session without any undue delay.

MR. J. MORLEY (Newcastle-on-Tyne): May I ask whether the Government are likely to allow facilities for a discussion of the Irish Sunday Closing Bill?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The Government are most anxious that an opportunity should be found for discussing that question.

MR. H. H. FOWLER: Considering the number of Votes still remaining to be taken, will the Government proceed with Supply de die in diem?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I hope that Supply may be reached this evening so as to make effective progress, and also to-morrow. The Education Estimates in Class 4 will be taken on Monday, and I hope that they will be disposed of on that evening. On Tuesday the Irish Constabulary vote will be taken, and the House will proceed with the consideration of Irish Estimates during the remainder of the week.

MR. CAUSTON (Southwark, W.): Are we to understand that the Merchant Shipping (Pilotage) Bill will not be taken until after next week?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I believe that the Merchant Shipping (Pilotage) Bill is generally accepted by the House, but I will not say whether or not it will be taken to-day or to-morrow. I do not wish to go beyond Thursday of next week in allocating business. After the Education Estimates on Monday and the Irish Constabulary Vote on Tuesday, I do not desire to say at present what business will be taken until the Government have seen what progress has been made.

MR. STOREY: Does the Chief Secretary propose to take the Bann Drainage Bill to-morrow?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No, Sir.

MR. H. GARDNER: I wish to know whether the Government can give hon. Members interested three or four days' notice before the Tithes Bill is taken.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The Government will give all the notice they can. Hon. Members will have ample notice.

ADMISSION OF STRANGERS TO THE HOUSE.

MR. HENRY H. FOWLER: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether it is proposed to make any alteration in the regulations now in force for the admission of strangers to the House?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The Government have been considering this question. They are sensible of the fact that the existing regulations for the admission of strangers are not wholly satisfactory to hon. Gentlemen. But although a Committee sat and reported on this question last year, the Report of that Committee has not met with that amount of general agreement on the part of the House which would justify the Government in asking the House to act upon it. Attention will be given to the subject during the recess, and the Government hope to make in the early days of next Session, either by the appointment of a Committee or by technical proposals of their own, regulations under which strangers will be admitted.

SEAFIELD FISHING HARBOUR.

MR. JORDAN (Clare, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether, in pursuance of a promise in a letter from the Treasury of the 1st January, 1889, in reply to a memorial of the 13th December, 1888, anything has yet been done to improve the fishing harbour of Seafeld, Miltown Malbay, County Clare; and, if so, what?

MR. JACKSON: Sir, there is, I think, some misapprehension, as I cannot find that the Treasury made any promise to improve the harbour at Seafeld. The Treasury letter stated only that the claims of Seafeld would be considered with those of other places in the allocation if any surplus from the Fishery Piers Fund. There is no surplus yet available, and, therefore, the numerous applications which have been received could hardly usefully be considered at present.

BOYCOTTING IN WEXFORD.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND (Fermanagh, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will state the grounds upon which a Secret Inquiry

Court has been instituted at Gorey; and, whether the County of Wexford is quite free from anything like serious crime?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: An inquiry under Section 1 of the Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act was ordered at Gorey upon sworn informations that a conspiracy to boycott and intimidate existed in that district. This class of crime has, it appears, recently existed to a very great extent in different districts in the County of Wexford.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether it is true that the three men, Millan, Doyle, and Kavanagh, charged at Gorey with endeavouring to prevent people buying pigs from the Earl of Courtown, were confined in a small and dirty police cell for a considerable time, as bail was refused till next day; and, whether the Government intend to prosecute these men on any other charge than that connected with Lord Courtown's pigs?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I understand that it was not practicable to send these men to the county gaol, and they were detained in the police lock-up. Bail was not refused, nor was it offered. The men were released on bail on the following day.

MR. W. REDMOND: Is it calculated to promote law and order in Ireland that respectable men should be prosecuted simply because they refuse to buy Lord Courtown's jugs?

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

WESTERN AUSTRALIA CONSTITUTION BILL.

MR. W. REDMOND: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, in view of the strong expression of opinion of the Australian Governments in favour of conferring Home Rule on Western Australia, the Government intend to proceed this year if possible with the Bill dealing with the constitution of Western Australia?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The Government propose to ask the House to affirm the principle of giving responsible Government to Western Australia by reading the Bill a second time. But, having regard to the details of the measure and the necessity for examination, they propose not to proceed further with the Bill this Session. If necessary they propose to inquire into the subject early next Session.

MR. W. REDMOND: Have not strong representations been received from several of the Australian Governments in favour of the passage of the Bill?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: There can be no doubt that such representations have been made. It is fair, however, to say that a strong opinion has been expressed in this country as to the details of the measure, and the Government do not think it right, in these circumstances, to force the Measure through at this period of the Session, and, therefore, they will allow time for further consideration.

MR. W. A. McARTHUR (Cornwall, Mid. St. Austell): May I ask whether, having regard to the almost unanimous opinion in favour of this Measure, the right hon. Gentleman can give the Colonies an assurance that the Bill will be brought in early next Session, and that the Government will make a serious attempt to carry it?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I think the hon. Member will see that it would be very unwise for me to make any serious engagement as to next Session. The Government desire to give effect to the principle of the Bill at the earliest possible moment.

MR. CHILDERS (Edinburgh, S.): Will the Government consider the propriety of appointing a Special Commissioner to proceed to Western Australia with the object of making inquiries on the spot, because the question is to a very large extent a local one?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: A suggestion of that kind is so important and so grave that I am unable to return an immediate answer to it. It will, however, receive the consideration of the Government.

MR. W. REDMOND: Are we to understand that the Government will not in the face of the representations from the Australian Governments introduce their Bill early next year?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: No, Sir; that would be an entirely inaccurate representation of the answer I have given.

ORDER OF BUSINESS—SUPPLY, &c.

SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy): Do the Government propose to take the Orders of the Day in the order in which they appear on the Paper? Will they

great error to regard this as an isolated example. It is an instance of an unhappily familiar practice; and I do not think that the Magistrates had open to them any other course than that which they actually pursued. I do not think it is necessary for me to deal with any more of the points raised except one. All the hon. Gentlemen who have addressed the House from the Opposition side have made allusions to a speech delivered two days ago by my noble Friend the Member for Paddington. My noble Friend has been quoted as a critic of the Government in respect to the imprisonment of Members of Parliament, and he has been deliberately quoted by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Belfast as being on his side of the controversy, and the right hon. Gentleman opposite stated that the noble Lord had discovered what I, the Chief Secretary for Ireland, had not discovered—that it was unpopular to imprison Members of Parliament.

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The right hon. Gentleman will not be in order in discussing the speech of the noble Lord to which reference has been made. It has no connection with the question before the House.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Do I understand you, Sir, that no allusion can be made to that speech?

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: An examination of it cannot be entered into now.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Nothing in the nature of an examination of that speech was going to fall from my lips. I was merely going to protest against the language of my noble Friend being interpreted as it has been interpreted by hon. Gentlemen opposite. My noble Friend is not present to defend himself, but I do not know that it is my business to defend him. Of course, Sir, I bow to your ruling. I will only say, in conclusion, that I have never taken into account the consideration which the right hon. Gentleman opposite seems to think ought to have paramount weight with me. He seems to think that the question of popularity or unpopularity is the paramount consideration to determine these matters. I do not think so. Whether it is popular or unpopular, I am going to do my best to preserve law in Ireland. And I do not think that to allow even a Member of Parliament to spit on a policeman with impunity is the best course to be taken in order to maintain the law. But I go further. I have not been, and shall not be, deterred from doing anything I think to be right by the fear of unpopularity, or by the threat of what the right hon. Gentleman may say before my face or behind my back. But I do not agree with the right hon. Gentleman in thinking that the people of this country would look with favour on so grossly partial an administration of justice as would punish the humble dupes in Ireland and leave unpunished those more powerful politicians who use their position in this House as one from which they can with impunity and effect stir up the people to courses of disloyalty and disorder.

MR. HANBURY (Preston): This is not the first time in which, differing as I do with hon. Members below the Gangway, I have risen to resent what has seemed to me to be not only an inexpedient treatment of Irishmen from a Party point of view, taking the lowest consideration, but to protest against what seems at first sight to me to be actually illegal and unconstitutional treatment. If we are to fight hon. Members opposite—and I am prepared to fight them on the question of Home Rule to the last—if, at any rate, we are to make our case clear and just before the people of this country to whom we shall have to appeal at an earlier or distant date, at any rate let us be able to show to the country that we have treated Irish Members with every possible degree of fairness. I agree that distinctions ought not be drawn between Members of Parliament and ordinary criminals; indeed, I should be inclined to punish a Member of Parliament who broke the law more severely than an ordinary lawbreaker. Although I should be perfectly ready to attack the Government, if I thought them wrong in the case before the House, yet, seeing that they have not defended the Resident Magistrate, the vote I shall give will not be against the Government, but will show my appreciation of the fact that the Resident Magistrates ought not to strain and stretch the law as they do. If Dr. Tanner is guilty of the offence with which he is charged, then he richly deserves the punishment which he has received. But with reference to the tribunal, I express an opinion not general on this side of the House, but one which I have held ever since I had read the names and occupations of the Resident Magistrates, that they are not the most fitting persons to administer justice in the exceptional circumstances of the Coercion Act, and it was no satisfaction to me to see the occupants of the two Front Benches pointing to each other as responsible for their appointment. It does not matter two pins by whom the appointments were made. I do not think these gentlemen are qualified to exercise the jurisdiction entrusted to them. There was every reason why, in this particular case, the Resident Magistrates should have acted with the greatest possible circumspection. In the first place, they had a politician as the criminal, and although politicians must be tried like other criminals who offend against the law, still you cannot help, in the excited state of public feeling in Ireland, a certain amount of prejudice from being imported into the case in such instances. In this particular instance there was one very special circumstance. The man whom Dr. Tanner was charged with grossly insulting was an official of the Court, and that is a circumstance which ought to have weighed with the Court in passing sentence. But the question we have to deal with is one solely of contempt of Court. I am no lawyer, but I was very much struck, from the common-sense point of view, with the remarks of the right hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. Fowler) when he, speaking as a lawyer, gave it as his opinion that the recent Act, which only inflicts seven days' punishment for contempt of Court, overrides the old law under which it is possible to give a greater amount of punishment. But, whether that be true or not, when we pass exceptional laws for Ireland, which are considered to be sufficiently stringent, it seems to me to be unnecessary, modern laws being so strict, to go back and find out musty precedents in order to bring them into Court against opponents. It is no answer to say that Dr. Tanner need not have gone to gaol, and that he might have chosen the other alternative and given surety for good behaviour. The Judges who gave the decision looked on the two things as equivalents, and both of them, I say, far exceed the seven days' imprisonment which can be inflicted under the law. Speaking from the point of view of a Unionist, and as one who wishes to maintain law and order in Ireland, I think we ought to be sure that the law and order to be maintained is the law and order which is recognised by Parliament and sanctioned by Statute. The Government, while they ought, undoubtedly, to keep order in Ireland and maintain the law, ought to be very careful that they do not go one iota beyond what is absolutely certain is the law. I have often observed that the law, as administered by the Resident Magistrates, has been somewhat strained. I could understand anyone who wished to separate England and Ireland trying to make enemies of the hon. Members from Ireland, and of the Irish people, but for the Conservative Party, who look to the day when the difficulties between England and Ireland will be removed, I think it is very bad policy indeed to try and embitter the Irish people, and to allow a sentence of this kind, which can be quashed by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. A. J. Balfour) to remain, and so seemingly to be supporting what, if it is not actually illegal and unconstitutional, does seem to be a strong straining of the law. It is because I am a strong Unionist that I say it is folly to make the English Law unpopular in Ireland, and to provoke the Irish Members, who, for the present at least, are the leaders of the Irish people, by acts which, I venture to say, are illegal and unconstitutional.

MR. ATHERLEY-JONES (Durham, N.W.): I have almost invariably noticed that when excesses by the Irish Resident Magistrates are brought before the notice of the House the English Law Officers are silent. I should like to ask the hon. and learned Attorney General whether or not he thinks that the Resident Magistrates exceeded their powers when they bound Dr. Tanner over in his good behaviour for the alleged contempt of Court. I feel confident, speaking as a very humble English lawyer, that my hon. and learned Friend will inform the House on his great authority that this action of the Irish Magistrates cannot possibly be defended by any lawyer. I do not think we ought to confine ourselves to narrow and technical grounds as to whether the Magistrates signally and exceptionally a case in which the defendant, having been debarred from offering his defence before the Magistrates, ought to have had an opportunity of presenting his defence to an independent member of the judiciary? Dr. Tanner made a speech in his own defence, in which he expressed his convictions with regard to the Court with energy and without reserve. Perhaps the most frank course to pursue would be to read the speech of the hon. Member. Dr. Tanner said:—

"He would not insult any gentleman by asking him to come forward on the Table to give evidence for the defence. But the people of Tipperary knew him, the people of the country knew him. The present case had been known in England, had been talked of in the House of Commons. His character as a gentleman had been sought to be injured. Now, putting aside all heat, putting aside all bitterness, he asked in the judgment of all honest, fair-minded men, was the present case brought forward in a fair way? First of all, he impugned the jurisdiction of the Court altogether, and when he consented to employ a counsel or a solicitor he did so against his own wishes, and because he did not wish that other men, his poorer friends, would be deprived of that assistance to which they are entitled. In the hearts and minds of the Magistrates on the Bench they knew what he and others were tried for—for adherence to the cause of the country—for standing by the oppressed and the persecuted; for sustaining the poor and the weak."

Then he went on to say:—

"We seek liberty, and we are determined to have it. We are prouder of the gaol in the struggle in which we are engaged than the toga of distinction and prominence and place and all the power that a Government—the present Government—can bestow. He was brought before the Court on a charge that put him to more pain and torture than if he were sent to prison for twenty years. The charge was mean, infamous, and a lie."

Dr. Tanner concluded:—

"You deprived me of the assistance of my counsel, and if I were a free man I should impeach your conduct before the House of Commons. I would put you on your trial before the whole country, and would confidently look to their verdict on your conduct. Do not think for a moment that I submit to your Court. I have nothing to fear. I feel for you. I pity you—for the position you are forced into. It is humiliating, but it is the effect of the British administration in the land which we intend to rule. This prosecution has been gone into because I am an Irish patriot Protestant, and it has been sought to defame and traduce me. Pass your sentence, I defy you. I defy the Government which seeks to rob the people—to help the strong against the weak, and to oppress the suffering."

[Mr. WINTERBOTHAM: Is that all?] I am not surprised at the question. That was the speech delivered in Court by my hon. Friend, and I ask hon. Members whether, considering that this Gentleman laboured under a keen and exasperated sense of wrong, there was anything extraordinary in the use of that language? The Magistrates did not act with precipitancy. The Magistrates retired and deliberated for 20 minutes. At the end of 20 minutes they came into Court, and the Chairman, having first delivered their sentence on the charge of assault, went on to say that Dr. Tanner was to find bail for £200 for his good behaviour, or go to prison for three months. When they made that order, the Magistrates well knew that Dr. Tanner would refuse to find bail. What was the offence committed? A little while ago I asked a clear question on that point, and I now press for a specific answer. Was the offence that of contempt of Court or not? I find the offence described in the letter addressed by the Magistrates to Mr. Speaker, and read to the House yesterday. It is that "C. K. Tanner had outrageously misbehaved, and wilfully insulted the Magistrates." I turn to the Act which regulates the proceedings in Petty and Quarter Sessions, and I find it enacts that if any person wilfully insults—the very language used in describing the charge—any Justice or Justices sitting in any Court, or shall commit any other contempt of Court, it shall be lawful for the Justice or Justices to direct such person to be removed or taken into custody, and, at any time before the rising of the Court, by warrant to commit such person to gaol for any period not exceeding seven days, or to fine such person any sum not exceeding 40s. There is not the remotest reference or hint to any other jurisdiction. The Solicitor General for Ireland suggested that there was an alternative jurisdiction; but I challenge him to cite a case, since the passing of that Act, in which the members of a Court of Justice showed by action or argument that they had any other jurisdiction except under the Act. The charge must have been one of contempt of Court. If it had been anything else, it would have been necessary that it should have been brought before the Court and evidence given upon it. The language of the justified in refusing to admit the jurisdiction of the Court, but that after his counsel had been ordered out of Court and he had been deprived of legal advice he was perfectly right in contending that he could not have a fair trial.

*MR. FULTON: That refers to a different matter. The right hon. Gentleman repeated several times that the Magistrates had sentenced Dr. Tanner to three months' imprisonment, and I said "No." Then the right hon. Gentleman said—"The hon. Gentleman is referring to the fact that he could have given sureties to keep the peace. Of course he would not give sureties to keep the peace." We have it, then, on the authority of the right hon. Gentleman that a Member of Parliament brought up before a Court properly constituted and which has heard evidence on oath is perfectly justified in refusing to find sureties to keep the peace. I am quite willing that this House and the country should judge as to whether that is a proper attitude to adopt. I should like to know whether the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton or the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle (Mr. J. Morley) approves of the conduct of Dr. Tanner's counsel. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton says that if such conduct took place in England there would simply be a rebuke from the Bench and that would be an end of the matter. I venture to say that no one can produce anywhere any record within modern memory of a counsel daring to use such language and behaving in such a manner in a Court of Law in England. I invite any one of my hon. and learned Friends opposite who sympathise with Dr. Tanner to attempt to use such language in any such Court. I say, without hesitation, that if any member of the English Bar sank so low as to act in that manner he would very soon be brought to his senses by one of Her Majesty's Judges in a way that would be extremely disagreeable to him. I altogether deny the right of members of the Bar to insult any properly constituted tribunal merely because they happen to disapprove of its constitution. It has been said that in England Magistrates will always increase a sentence in order to give a right of appeal. Of course they will, and the Magistrates in this case would have been wrong to refuse if Dr. Tanner had called any evidence. As he called no evidence there was no reason why they should give a right of appeal. This matter after all has been opportunely brought forward, because it shows how utterly unfounded are the accusations of hon. Gentlemen opposite against the Government.

*MR. R. T. REID (Dumfries, &c.): The hon. and learned Gentleman who has just sat down is apparently of opinion that this House ought not to take cognisance of what he calls legal cases but what we call the maladministration of justice in Ireland. In my opinion it is one of the most important duties this House can discharge to see, especially in the exceptional circumstances of the criminal law in Ireland at the present time, that Magistrates do not abuse the powers committed to them. I think it is one of the most gross abuses of which the Resident Magistrates have hitherto been found guilty that they have made use of this old Statute for the purpose of inflicting punishment for contempt of Court. The law relating to contempt of Court is so jealously guarded in England that it is only permitted to Judges of the Superior Court except by Statute. And this for two reasons—in the first place, because the term of imprisonment is unlimited, and in the second place, because the punishment is inflicted by those who have themselves sustained the insult, and it is not necessary to point out that you require carefully to safeguard the powers of punishment placed in the hands of any man under such circumstances. There has been an alteration of the law by Statute in the case of County Courts, and also an alteration of the law in Ireland by which when contempt of Court has been committed, Justices are entitled to imprison for seven days, and may order the person to be removed from Court. Now, Sir, the Resident Magistrates in the case before the House knew of the law which relates directly to contempt of Court, and they deliberately refrained from using it, but went back to the old Statute of Edward III., the object of which was to punish persons for disorderly conduct. I may specify one or two cases mentioned in the Act:—Persons "who sleep in the the conduct which has been imputed to him he was guilty of a grave offence and ought to receive due punishment. I do not think that in the circumstances of the case, if the hon. Member was guilty of such a grave offence as that which is imputed to him, any one would be justified in asserting that he has been the object of a vindictive sentence. I come now to the circumstances to which the right hon. Gentleman called the attention of the House—namely, the circumstances under which the sentence was pronounced. I do not think hon. Members will deny that an assault of this nature upon a public officer in the discharge of his duty is a grave offence. It is said that Dr. Tanner was deprived of the assistance of his counsel; but, as a matter of fact, the hon. Member has been represented throughout the trial by his solicitor, who raised points of law in his favour. There was, moreover, no reason why the hon. Member should not at the adjournment have been represented by another counsel.

Mr. SEXTON: At the opening of the proceedings his counsel retired, and I do not know that Dr. Tanner could have been represented by another counsel after his first counsel had been expelled the Court.

*Mr. MADDEN: The expulsion of counsel had taken place long antecedently, and after that a solicitor appeared in Court on behalf of the hon. Member. It is said that the Court found Dr. Tanner guilty without hearing evidence on his behalf. What are the facts? What really occurred was this. The case was clearly proved by the evidence of the Inspector of Police and of the constables. A witness was called on the part of the hon. Member, and he admitted that the assault with which the hon. Member was charged might have been committed without his seeing it. Then the case was adjourned till the 26th. July, and when the hearing was resumed the hon. Member deliberately declined to call any further evidence, on the ground that he would not subject his witnesses to the indignity of being examined before the Court. In these circumstances, the Court had no course open to them but to act on clear and unimpeached evidence, which was not broken down in cross-examination, and to convict the hon. Member. It ought not to be suggested for one moment, that because an accused person, even if he be a Member of Parliament, refuses to produce evidence on the ground that he would not subject his witnesses to the indignity of appearing before the Court, the Magistrates are not to act on the testimony before them. It appears to be assumed by hon. Members opposite that what occurred gave the hon. Member a right of appeal, although the law provides in the case of such a sentence no such right of appeal. It would be absurd to allow any person charged to obtain a right of appeal merely by refusing to call witnesses on his own behalf. The right hon. Gentleman has read from a report of what took place in Cork, but I will refer to a report in the Times, which supplies omissions in the account already read. From that it appears that the Magistrates were of opinion that the action of the hon. Member amounted to an outrageous insult to the Court. The hon. Member said that the Magistrates who tried him had the sentence in their pockets, and he openly defied the Court to do their worst.

*Several hon. MEMBERS: Is that all?

Mr. MADDEN: Hon. Members ask is that all? It is all, and I think it fully justifies the language used by the Magistrates. A question has been asked by the right hon. Gentleman as to what power Magistrates had for punishing misbehaviour in their presence. I will refer to the highest authority on the subject (Burn's Justice of the Peace), which lays it down that a man can be bound over to be of good behaviour for speaking words of contempt to inferior Magistrates, Justices of the Peace, or Mayors. To speak words of contempt to Magistrates, even though not engaged in the discharge of their duties, is good ground for causing a person to be bound over to be of good behaviour. Contemptuous language to those intrusted with the administration of justice being "a proper matter for taking sureties for good behaviour," the question then arises whether the discretion of the Magistrates was properly exercised in this case. The right hon. Gentleman relies on the Petty Sessions Act as showing that the Magistrates had no jurisdiction in this matter. That Act makes it lawful for Justices to commit persons to prison for regard to the proof which the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Reid) has attempted to give of the utter illegality of the action of the Resident Magistrates, it seems to me that the more thoroughly he satisfies himself and this House that they had no kind of warrant for this proceeding, the more extraordinary it is, if there should be a real wish to relieve Dr. Tanner of his imprisonment, that a certiorari has not been applied for at once. I make no doubt it will be applied for, after the utterances from a solicitor (Mr. H. H. Fowler) a barrister (Mr. Atherley Jones) and a Queen's counsel (Mr. Reid.) In the course of the many interjections which have adorned this Debate, some hon. Member for England said that Dr. Tanner was too poor to get an opinion. [Mr. SEXTON: No one said that.] Well, I thought so. At all events, that need not stand in the way now he has got opinions in this House from the hon. and learned Gentlemen I have named, that he has a good case against the Resident Magistrates if he likes to apply for a certiorari, and he has got those opinions for nothing. All he has to do to-morrow morning is to get a counsel who can restrain himself in the presence of an Irish Court of Justice. I would not advise him to employ the same counsel as before, as then the real point of the case may never be reached. He has only to employ an orderly and competent counsel, if he can find one in Ireland, and to ask that counsel to apply for a certiorari, and if he only mentions the opinions of the three hon. and learned Gentlemen, I have no doubt he will get it immediately. The more he proves the Resident Magistrates to be wrong, the less need, it appears to me, is there for interference on the part of this House or the Officers of the Crown. Reference has been made to a letter written by the hon. Member, which asked for the grace of the Crown.

MR. SEXTON: The hon. and learned Member is under a misapprehension. Dr. Tanner does not want the grace of the Crown; he desires, simply as a Member of Parliament, to expose the cruelty of his treatment.

*MR. C. J. DARLING: I am very sorry indeed to have imputed so respectable a motive. The only way in which the Chief Secretary, who has been appealed to, can exercise his power is to advise the Lord Lieutenant to exercise the grace of the Crown. He cannot quash the Order of the Resident Magistrates. The only possible way to quash the Order is to go before the Courts in Dublin. I think the application for grace to the Crown might be made with some force. There are circumstances with regard to Dr. Tanner to which I need not allude. ["Allude to them." "What are they?"]—they cannot but be present to the minds of every Member of this House—why the Crown might take a lenient and exceptional view of this matter.

MR. W. O'BRIEN (Cork, N.E.): Mr. Speaker, before the House closes, I should like to say a word or two, though not as a lawyer. The scintille juris to which we have been just treated by the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Darling) were not intended or expected to elicit any serious reply from this side of the House. I do not think he has improved the Government case in reference to the charges against Dr. Tanner by his chivalrous and gentlemanly reference to poor Dr. Tanner's wife. I turn, Sir, to more important persons. I congratulate the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton and the hon. and learned Gentleman, who sits opposite, upon their success in drawing the Chief Secretary, who declared two nights ago that there was nothing happening in Ireland which did not bore him now since he had ceased latterly to be amused.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I never said anything of the kind.

MR. W. O'BRIEN: The right hon. Gentleman repudiates the report of the secret meeting at Shoreditch. Am I to understand that?

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I repudiate the version which the hon. Gentleman has given of the remarks I made.

MR. W. O'BRIEN: Well, I have given the version which I myself saw, and the right hon. Gentleman has only himself to blame if there is not a more authentic report given. He did state according to both the versions I have seen that latterly there was nothing in the state of Ireland, or in what was happening in Ireland that even amused him, or even gave him, as it once gave him acute pleasure to deal with in this House. To-

they would try him under the Crimes Act for that offence. Listening to the Solicitor General, one would have thought that the offence of assault on the police was created by the Crimes Act, whereas it is one of the oldest offences known to the law and is punishable under statute. Why on earth, except in wanton disregard of the rights of the Irish people in the administration of justice, the law officers of the Crown should have sanctioned such an absurdity as a proceeding under the Crimes Act for an assault on a policeman in the discharge of his duty I am utterly unable to fathom. If proceedings are taken under the Crimes Act, then we must take the Crimes Act with all its concomitants. We must remember, and we shall never forget, that the Chief Secretary pledged himself over and over again that any one charged under the Act should have a right of appeal. This was a solemn pledge given on behalf of the Government by the Minister in charge of the Bill when it was under discussion in this House, and the right hon. Gentleman will be reminded over and over again of this breach of faith on his part. Perhaps it may be said that he did not mean that pledge to apply to little trumpery cases; but this not a trumpery case; it is the case of a Member of Parliament charged with a disgusting and improper offence, of which he maintains his innocence. Dr. Tanner thought—and I do not hesitate to say I think so too—that he could not have a fair trial before these two Magistrates. Dr. Tanner claimed a right of appeal, and they could have given him an appeal by sentencing him to 32 days' imprisonment; but they imprisoned him for only 31 days. The Solicitor General says the record of appeals was not encouraging. I do not think this appeal would have been heard in Donegal, where a Government pamphleteer has been rewarded by being made a County Court Judge; but this case raises only a question of fact, although the Solicitor General has accepted the finding of the Court on ex parte evidence when the counsel for the prisoner was excluded. My point is this: The sentence was vindictive because it was pronounced after an unfair trial, and because it was one day too short to entitle the prisoner to an appeal. I now come to the other part of the case—the observations indulged in by the hon. Member for Cork. I admit that the hon. Member indulged in some very free observations which were not very respectful to the Bench. I was not surprised when the Solicitor General read his version of what occurred that hon. Members exclaimed, "Is that all!" It seems extraordinary to have sent a man to prison for three months because he had violated the decencies of the Court by these exclamations. But after all what did Dr. Tanner say? He said he would not subject his witnesses to the indignity of appearing before the Court; and he was quite right. His counsel had been sent away, and he would have been a silly man if he had called his witnesses. Next he said that the Magistrates had got his sentence in their pockets. I will admit that that was a very rude remark; but I have no doubt what he meant was that they had made up their minds as to the sentence they would inflict. Prisoners sometimes say extraordinary things in England; but Judges do not send the offender to prison for three months for such language. A short time ago an amateur lawyer, promoted to judicial functions in Trinidad, sentenced a man to 31 lashes and penal servitude for life for attempting to assault him in Court; but the Colonial Secretary not only annulled the absurd sentence, but remitted a sentence of seven years' penal servitude, which the man richly deserved, for an offence he had committed, and warned the Judge that if such conduct were repeated he would be removed from his office. Then Dr. Tanner said "Do your worst; I defy you." For these foolish remarks Dr. Tanner was sent to prison for three calendar months. The hon. and learned Gentleman will no doubt tell us that Dr. Tanner would not have been sentenced if he had found sureties. Of course he would not find sureties; it would have been unworthy of him as a man to have done so. The Solicitor General has told us that there is a power some centuries old which enables Magistrates to require persons to find sureties if they have been guilty of outrageous conduct in Court. This is not quite so clear as the Solicitor General for Ireland thinks. I am not going to presume to argue a legal point with him, especially as that will come for judgment before the proper coming to a close. Then you have the adjournment to the date when he could not have the advantage of a concurrent sentence. Then you have this episode before Mr. Fitzgerald; you have his counsel thrust out of Court—a counsel who, I think, will compare possibly not unfavourably either in character or in ability with the hon. and learned Member who has just spoken. Mr. Healy is flung out of the Court at the whim of these creatures of the Chief Secretary, and then the man is left defenceless and to his own resources, and actually for the very speech he made in his own defence he is sentenced to three months' imprisonment. I believe it is unheard of that an undefended prisoner should be subjected to this punishment simply because in his defence he is betrayed into a few words of rough truth—a few words which do not disgrace him in the smallest degree in the eyes of his countrymen or in the eyes of honest men in this country. It seems to me that the speeches we have heard to-night establish conclusively that these Magistrates are not content even with the ferocious powers which the Coercion Act gives, but that they must endeavour to heel-tap that Coercion Act by having recourse to this ancient Statute against strangers and vagabonds. Whereas it appears as clear as daylight that seven days is the extent of the term of imprisonment for contempt, they have gone to this musty old Statute for a punishment which is in direct contravention of the pledge and understanding upon which this Coercion Act passed this House. The more this question is considered and discussed, the more, I believe, it will be seen that it is a cowardly and vindictive attempt to victimise a political opponent, because Dr. Tanner is supposed not to be a very popular person in this House. It is not the first time that the Government have pressed us too far before the ordinary humane feeling and sympathy of the people of England, and I dare say their experience to-night will have shown that they have ventured too far upon Dr. Tanner's personal un-say that the man who is capable of directing that policy, or of tolerating such a policy, ought to blush for himself in the eyes of honest men, instead of smirking and bragging as he does of it. I will only refer to one other topic—the argument that Dr. Tanner might have obtained bail. Had he done so, it would have been a confession that he had been guilty of this disgraceful conduct, which he utterly repudiates. There is no reason why we should not all be shut up in secula seculorum without any particular charge being made if the Magistrates chose to take such a course. So far as we are concerned, we are accustomed to this sort of thing; but it is a very serious thing for you to encourage these officials in Ireland to believe that, practically speaking, they are safe in putting any story or any charge to the discredit or the dishonour of an Irish Nationalist, and that the more atrocious the charge the better are their chances of promotion. They are convinced that the right hon. Gentleman will accept any story they choose to tell him without qualification, and they are justified in that belief by the conduct of the right hon. Gentleman. They know that he will resolutely refuse the English people any honest way of judging the conduct of his subordinates as the result of any honest and independent public inquiry. They have come to consider that if they only make themselves sufficiently obnoxious to the Irish people they will be the first to be pensioned off when Home Rule is established. It is a very dangerous feeling that you are encouraging in the minds of these officials, and it is time it should be known that the day will come when there will have to be a full and searching investigation into the right and truth of all these matters, if not under the present Government, at any rate under the Government that will succeed it. I have no doubt that when the treatment of Dr. Tanner is inquired into, it will be seen that it was an unworthy and disgraceful attempt to defame a political opponent, and but a part and parcel of the policy which you are opposite. But I cannot believe, that my hon. Friend behind me means to attack the Government; and therefore I proceed to make such reply as may be necessary to the speech of the right hon. Gentlemen the Member for Wolverhampton. The right hon. Gentleman has very properly divided the case into two distinct parts—first, that part which, in its nature, is more legal and technical, relating to the action taken by the Magistrates in consequence of the hon. Member for Cork's behaviour in court; and, secondly, the part which relates to the sentence inflicted by the Magistrates for the original offence with which Dr. Tanner was charged. On the second part I need not detain the House long. The right hon. Gentleman has advanced the astounding assertion, as coming from a gentleman learned in the law, that the Court sentenced Dr. Tanner to three months' imprisonment for contempt of Court. The Court did nothing of the kind. Dr. Tanner need not remain one moment longer in prison in consequence of his conduct in Court. He has only to find sureties for good behaviour, which he can do without the slightest difficulty, and no imprisonment will follow on account of that conduct. But the right hon. Gentleman, to my intense surprise, says that Dr. Tanner naturally did not take a course that would be discreditable to him, that he was not the man to find sureties for his good behaviour, and, acting like a man of courage (Interruptions.) [An hon. MEMBER, "more than you do."] ("Order")—acting like a man of courage, he went to prison. Irrelevant and discourteous interruptions do not disturb me, and I do not think my hon. Friends behind me need trouble their heads about them. The right hon. Gentleman admitted that the language of Dr. Tanner in Court was highly improper. ("No! If he used it.") He did not defend it; he admitted it was highly improper. The phrase which I myself should have used as to that language is much stronger than that; but, take it to be what the right hon. Gentleman admitted it was, if Dr. Tanner used language which was highly improper, why should it be disgraceful to him to give sureties for his good behaviour? He was guilty of that which was not good behaviour, the right hon. Gentleman admits the impropriety, why, therefore, is it discreditable to him that sureties should be required from him, and why this loose and violent rhetoric which has been used by the right hon. Gentleman? But this is not all. The right hon. Gentleman says that the adjournment of the House affords a very proper opportunity for bringing this case before the House and the country; but, at all events, neither the House nor the country can do anything to relieve Dr. Tanner from the sentence, if you call it a sentence ("Why not?"), imposed on him by the Court. But something can be done to relieve Dr. Tanner from the consequences of his behaviour if the Magistrates have been guilty of the misconduct attributed to them by the right hon. Gentleman. This House is not the place to re-try the action of the Magistrates. There is a Court which is competent to survey, and, if necessary, to quash, the action of the inferior Court on the ground of illegality; and if the Magistrates have acted illegally, as the right hon. Gentleman maintains, let him not come down to the House and indulge in violent tirades against the Magistrates and the Officials—let him take the legitimate course of asking a competent legal tribunal to give an opinion on the action of the Magistrates. With one further remark I will leave this branch of the question. The right hon. Gentleman appears to be deeply indignant because the Magistrates took the course which they did take rather than that under the Statute, which has been referred to more than once, that would have enabled them to inflict a sentence for contempt of Court. Now, in my opinion, the Magistrates adopted, I will not say the legal course, but the merciful course; and they did so not merely because by the action they took they did not necessarily inflict a single hour's imprisonment, but because if they were wrong in taking that course there is a mode of questioning the action of the Magistrates. The right hon. Gentleman is very strong on the matter of appeal, but I apprehend that if the Magistrates had given Dr. Tanner seven days' imprisonment there would have been no appeal. But now their action can be reviewed by a higher Court. Therefore I say that the Magistrates took the merciful course on two grounds, partly because they did not inflict a sentence at all, and partly because their action can be done away with if a superior Court should hold that it was illegal. I would remind the mover of the adjournment that as that sentence was concurrent with the sentence for the assault on the policeman, a whole month must elapse before any injury can, under any circumstances, be inflicted on Dr. Tanner. During that month there will be ample time for taking steps to have the legal question tried; and if it is not tried it can only be—whatever hon. Gentlemen opposite may say in this House—because they think the case, though good enough to bring before a Party audience, is not good enough to go before a Court of law. I pronounce no opinion on the question of law. I know not and I care not how it may be decided by the superior tribunal; but let not hon. Gentlemen opposite say the Magistrates have acted improperly unless they have the courage to go to a Court that is competent to decide the question. I pass to that part of the charge brought against the Magistrates which relates to the sentence inflicted on Dr. Tanner for the original offence in respect of which he was brought before them. This has been described with an extraordinary wealth of invective, as gross, indecent, discreditable, and vindictive, and with other high-sounding adjectives which it is not worth while to record. Now, it is not my business to say whether the sentence was excessive or was not, but I do say most emphatically that the offence of which Dr. Tanner was accused and found guilty, and with regard to which he brought no evidence to prove his innocence, was a most disgusting and horrible offence. It was an offence which I gather Dr. Tanner did not himself defend in Court, and the character of which none of his friends have ventured to defend in the House. If Dr. Tanner was guilty of that offence, and whether the sentence inflicted was too serious or not, I maintain that, taking all the circumstances into account, the fact that Dr. Tanner is a Member of Parliament, instead of diminishing, greatly aggravated the offence. The right hon. Gentleman appeared to found part of his indictment against the Government on the fact that the man accused is a Member of this House. Of all men in the world, surely a Member of Parliament ought to be the one who would not, under any circumstances or provocation whatever, be guilty of the disgusting offence of which Dr. Tanner was accused. Having read the proceedings, and taking into account the circumstances of the case, I feel no doubt that the tribunal not only acted rightly, but as any other tribunal in the world would have acted in finding Dr. Tanner guilty of the offence. The most clear and specific evidence was tendered on oath that he was guilty; and no evidence of a rebutting kind was adduced, though every opportunity was given for its production if it existed. There is but one conclusion that any Member of the House or any tribunal can arrive at—namely, that Dr. Tanner was guilty of the offence. The right hon. Gentleman says that, at any rate, Dr. Tanner should have had an appeal. But the right hon. Gentleman has admitted that there was no question of law involved, but that it was a simple question of fact. If the Magistrates were not qualified to decide intricate legal questions, they were perfectly competent to decide an issue of the kind brought before them. And why should a tribunal, having a simple plain matter of fact to deal with, in respect of which evidence of a conclusive kind was adduced on one side, and none on the other, go out of its way to give an appeal to Dr. Tanner? There had been a great deal said about the retirement of Dr. Tanner's counsel. [Cries of "Expulsion."] If the right hon. Gentleman had followed with the close attention I have had to give to them the proceedings under the Crimes Act, he would have known that the course habitually pursued by a certain class of the accused and of lawyers in Ireland before the Crimes Courts has the appearance of a deliberate conspiracy to insult the Court and render the decorous administration of justice absolutely impossible. Instances of this kind have been familiar for the last two years. There is no doubt if decency and order are to be maintained in these Courts, and Magistrates are to be allowed to possess and use those powers without which the law cannot be administered with dignity and propriety, such incidents as that which resulted in the expulsion of the counsel of Dr. Tanner must be dealt with severely. It is a great error to regard this as an isolated example. It is an instance of an unhappily familiar practice; and I do not think that the Magistrates had open to them any other course than that which they actually pursued. I do not think it is necessary for me to deal with any more of the points raised except one. All the hon. Gentlemen who have addressed the House from the Opposition side have made allusions to a speech delivered two days ago by my noble Friend the Member for Paddington. My noble Friend has been quoted as a critic of the Government in respect to the imprisonment of Members of Parliament, and he has been deliberately quoted by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Belfast as being on his side of the controversy, and the right hon. Gentleman opposite stated that the noble Lord had discovered what I, the Chief Secretary for Ireland, had not discovered—that it was unpopular to imprison Members of Parliament.

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The right hon. Gentleman will not be in order in discussing the speech of the noble Lord to which reference has been made. It has no connection with the question before the House.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Do I understand you, Sir, that no allusion can be made to that speech?

*MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: An examination of it cannot be entered into now.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Nothing in the nature of an examination of that speech was going to fall from my lips. I was merely going to protest against the language of my noble Friend being interpreted as it has been interpreted by hon. Gentlemen opposite. My noble Friend is not present to defend himself, but I do not know that it is my business to defend him. Of course, Sir, I bow to your ruling. I will only say, in conclusion, that I have never taken into account the consideration which the right hon. Gentleman opposite seems to think ought to have paramount weight with me. He seems to think that the question of popularity or unpopularity is the paramount consideration to determine these matters. I do not think so. Whether it is popular or unpopular, I am going to do my best to preserve law in Ireland. And I do not think that to allow even a Member of Parliament to spit on a policeman with impunity is the best course to be taken in order to maintain the law. But I go further. I have not been, and shall not be, deterred from doing anything I think to be right by the fear of unpopularity, or by the threat of what the right hon. Gentleman may say before my face or behind my back. But I do not agree with the right hon. Gentleman in thinking that the people of this country would look with favour on so grossly partial an administration of justice as would punish the humble dupes in Ireland and leave unpunished those more powerful politicians who use their position in this House as one from which they can with impunity and effect stir up the people to courses of disloyalty and disorder.

MR. HANBURY (Preston): This is not the first time in which, differing as I do with hon. Members below the Gangway, I have risen to resent what has seemed to me to be not only an inexpedient treatment of Irishmen from a Party point of view, taking the lowest consideration, but to protest against what seems at first sight to me to be actually illegal and unconstitutional treatment. If we are to fight hon. Members opposite—and I am prepared to fight them on the question of Home Rule to the last—if, at any rate, we are to make our case clear and just before the people of this country to whom we shall have to appeal at an earlier or distant date, at any rate let us be able to show to the country that we have treated Irish Members with every possible degree of fairness. I agree that distinctions ought not be drawn between Members of Parliament and ordinary criminals; indeed, I should be inclined to punish a Member of Parliament who broke the law more severely than an ordinary lawbreaker. Although I should be perfectly ready to attack the Government, if I thought them wrong in the case before the House, yet, seeing that they have not defended the Resident Magistrate, the vote I shall give will not be against the Government, but will show my appreciation of the fact that the Resident Magistrates ought not to strain and stretch the law as they do. If Dr. Tanner is guilty of the offence with which he is charged, then he richly deserves the punishment which he has received. But with reference to the tribunal, I express an opinion not general on this side of the House, but one which I have held ever since I had read the names and occupations of the Resident Magistrates, that they are not the most fitting persons to administer justice in the exceptional circumstances of the Coercion Act, and it was no satisfaction to me to see the occupants of the two Front Benches pointing to each other as responsible for their appointment. It does not matter two pins by whom the appointments were made. I do not think these gentlemen are qualified to exercise the jurisdiction entrusted to them. There was every reason why, in this particular case, the Resident Magistrates should have acted with the greatest possible circumspection. In the first place, they had a politician as the criminal, and although politicians must be tried like other criminals who offend against the law, still you cannot help, in the excited state of public feeling in Ireland, a certain amount of prejudice from being imported into the case in such instances. In this particular instance there was one very special circumstance. The man whom Dr. Tanner was charged with grossly insulting was an official of the Court, and that is a circumstance which ought to have weighed with the Court in passing sentence. But the question we have to deal with is one solely of contempt of Court. I am no lawyer, but I was very much struck, from the common-sense point of view, with the remarks of the right hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. Fowler) when he, speaking as a lawyer, gave it as his opinion that the recent Act, which only inflicts seven days' punishment for contempt of Court, overrides the old law under which it is possible to give a greater amount of punishment. But, whether that be true or not, when we pass exceptional laws for Ireland, which are considered to be sufficiently stringent, it seems to me to be unnecessary, modern laws being so strict, to go back and find out musty precedents in order to bring them into Court against opponents. It is no answer to say that Dr. Tanner need not have gone to gaol, and that he might have chosen the other alternative and given surety for good behaviour. The Judges who gave the decision looked on the two things as equivalents, and both of them, I say, far exceed the seven days' imprisonment which can be inflicted under the law. Speaking from the point of view of a Unionist, and as one who wishes to maintain law and order in Ireland, I think we ought to be sure that the law and order to be maintained is the law and order which is recognised by Parliament and sanctioned by Statute. The Government, while they ought, undoubtedly, to keep order in Ireland and maintain the law, ought to be very careful that they do not go one iota beyond what is absolutely certain is the law. I have often observed that the law, as administered by the Resident Magistrates, has been somewhat strained. I could understand anyone who wished to separate England and Ireland trying to make enemies of the hon. Members from Ireland, and of the Irish people, but for the Conservative Party, who look to the day when the difficulties between England and Ireland will be removed, I think it is very bad policy indeed to try and embitter the Irish people, and to allow a sentence of this kind, which can be quashed by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. A. J. Balfour) to remain, and so seemingly to be supporting what, if it is not actually illegal and unconstitutional, does seem to be a strong straining of the law. It is because I am a strong Unionist that I say it is folly to make the English Law unpopular in Ireland, and to provoke the Irish Members, who, for the present at least, are the leaders of the Irish people, by acts which, I venture to say, are illegal and unconstitutional.

MR. ATHERLEY-JONES (Durham, N.W.): I have almost invariably noticed that when excesses by the Irish Resident Magistrates are brought before the notice of the House the English Law Officers are silent. I should like to ask the hon. and learned Attorney General whether or not he thinks that the Resident Magistrates exceeded their powers when they bound Dr. Tanner over in his good behaviour for the alleged contempt of Court. I feel confident, speaking as a very humble English lawyer, that my hon. and learned Friend will inform the House on his great authority that this action of the Irish Magistrates cannot possibly be defended by any lawyer. I do not think we ought to confine ourselves to narrow and technical grounds as to whether the Magistrates were entitled to act as they did or not. Under a recent Statute, as has been pointed out, the maximum penalty for contempt of Court in a Court of Summary Jurisdiction in Ireland is seven days' imprisonment, and I cannot help thinking that these two Irish Magistrates had a very shrewd notion that Dr. Tanner would not allow himself to be bound over in surties to keep the peace, and they came to the conclusion that by binding him over they would be inflicting a far heavier punishment upon him than if they sentenced him to seven days' imprisonment. The Solicitor General for Ireland quoted from Hawkins's Pleas of the Crown to show that the Magistrates were entitled to take the course they did take. The power under which such a sentence could be imposed is conferred by the Statute of the 34th of Edward III., Chapter 1. The hon. and learned Solicitor General for Ireland was careful not to quote Hawkins's statement, that the power appears to refer only to matters having relation to the peace, and "it has been said not to apply to rash, quarrelsome, or unmannerly words unless they directly tend to a breach of the peace." Although there is a power in the Magistrates to bind over for good behaviour, it is a power which has no relation whatever to contempt of Court. I will ask my hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General whether he can state that in all his experience there has been one single instance in which a person has been bound over for contempt of Court under this Statute. It is the commonest thing in the world for strong language to be used in the heat of the moment by prisoners, and Justices or Judges either ignore such language altogether or confine themselves to ordering the detention of the offender, perhaps for the rest of the day. It appears to me there can be no possible defence, either technically or in substance, for this most extraordinary conduct on the part of these Magistrates. They also declined all facilities for appealing. Under the 42nd and 43rd Vict. it is expressly provided for the liberty of the subject that whenever a person is convicted and punished by imprisonment, there shall be a power of appeal. I say that to have deliberately shut out Dr. Tanner from an appeal is a scandal in the administration of justice. Matters of this kind disturb the public conscience and constitute what is nothing more or less than a reproach to the Government of Ireland, and I utterly refuse to believe that my hon. Friend Dr. Tanner was guilty of so disgusting an offence as that with which he is charged.

*MR. FULTON (West Ham, North): I rise in order to enter an emphatic protest against the growing practice of discussing legal questions in this House—legal questions which are capable of being properly discussed in a Court of Law. The hon. and learned Member who has just sat down had the amazing effrontery—"Oh," and "Order!"—I will not insist upon that word but will say the hon. Member asked the Attorney General to be kind enough to give his opinion upon the question of law as to whether the Crimes Act Court was right or not. I sincerely hope the Attorney General will do nothing of the kind. If, as is said, the Magistrates acted without jurisdiction, there is the simplest possible way of ascertaining that immediately. As every lawyer knows by simply moving the Queen's Bench that Court would at once have ordered, on cause being shown, a rule nisi to have the order of the Magistrates brought up, and by that means the order, if they acted without jurisdiction, could be quashed. Hon. Members opposite are hard to please. They complain of the Magistrates because they would not, in the first instance, pass on Dr. Tanner a sentence which would give him the right of appeal, and then, when the Magistrates make an order with respect to the contempt, which gives him the opportunity to appeal, they find fault with the Magistrates for giving him that opportunity. This Debate has been very instructive. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. Fowler) a Member of the Privy Council, and a former Member of the Government, has stated in his place in this House that the hon. Member for Mid Cork, Dr. Tanner, was perfectly right and acted as every hon. Member would have done, when he positively and peremptorily refused to admit the jurisdiction of a Court constituted by law.

*MR. FOWLER: The hon. Gentleman will be good enough to quote me correctly. I did not say he was perfectly justified in refusing to admit the jurisdiction of the Court, but that after his counsel had been ordered out of Court and he had been deprived of legal advice he was perfectly right in contending that he could not have a fair trial.

*MR. FULTON: That refers to a different matter. The right hon. Gentleman repeated several times that the Magistrates had sentenced Dr. Tanner to three months' imprisonment, and I said "No." Then the right hon. Gentleman said—"The hon. Gentleman is referring to the fact that he could have given sureties to keep the peace. Of course he would not give sureties to keep the peace." We have it, then, on the authority of the right hon. Gentleman that a Member of Parliament brought up before a Court properly constituted and which has heard evidence on oath is perfectly justified in refusing to find sureties to keep the peace. I am quite willing that this House and the country should judge as to whether that is a proper attitude to adopt. I should like to know whether the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton or the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle (Mr. J. Morley) approves of the conduct of Dr. Tanner's counsel. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton says that if such conduct took place in England there would simply be a rebuke from the Bench and that would be an end of the matter. I venture to say that no one can produce anywhere any record within modern memory of a counsel daring to use such language and behaving in such a manner in a Court of Law in England. I invite any one of my hon. and learned Friends opposite who sympathise with Dr. Tanner to attempt to use such language in any such Court. I say, without hesitation, that if any member of the English Bar sank so low as to act in that manner he would very soon be brought to his senses by one of Her Majesty's Judges in a way that would be extremely disagreeable to him. I altogether deny the right of members of the Bar to insult any properly constituted tribunal merely because they happen to disapprove of its constitution. It has been said that in England Magistrates will always increase a sentence in order to give a right of appeal. Of course they will, and the Magistrates in this case would have been wrong to refuse if Dr. Tanner had called any evidence. As he called no evidence there was no reason why they should give a right of appeal. This matter after all has been opportunely brought forward, because it shows how utterly unfounded are the accusations of hon. Gentlemen opposite against the Government.

*MR. R. T. REID (Dumfries, &c.): The hon. and learned Gentleman who has just sat down is apparently of opinion that this House ought not to take cognisance of what he calls legal cases but what we call the maladministration of justice in Ireland. In my opinion it is one of the most important duties this House can discharge to see, especially in the exceptional circumstances of the criminal law in Ireland at the present time, that Magistrates do not abuse the powers committed to them. I think it is one of the most gross abuses of which the Resident Magistrates have hitherto been found guilty that they have made use of this old Statute for the purpose of inflicting punishment for contempt of Court. The law relating to contempt of Court is so jealously guarded in England that it is only permitted to Judges of the Superior Court except by Statute. And this for two reasons—in the first place, because the term of imprisonment is unlimited, and in the second place, because the punishment is inflicted by those who have themselves sustained the insult, and it is not necessary to point out that you require carefully to safeguard the powers of punishment placed in the hands of any man under such circumstances. There has been an alteration of the law by Statute in the case of County Courts, and also an alteration of the law in Ireland by which when contempt of Court has been committed, Justices are entitled to imprison for seven days, and may order the person to be removed from Court. Now, Sir, the Resident Magistrates in the case before the House knew of the law which relates directly to contempt of Court, and they deliberately refrained from using it, but went back to the old Statute of Edward III., the object of which was to punish persons for disorderly conduct. I may specify one or two cases mentioned in the Act:—Persons "who sleep in the day and go abroad at night," "such as keep suspicious companies," "eavesdroppers," and "common drunkards." The proceeding is on a Statute passed in Edward III., and it is intended for persons of the character I have described. It is an open question whether, according to the English law, Justices of the Peace are entitled to make use of this Statute at all. I believe it would be difficult to maintain that proposition. But suppose for the sake of the discussion that they are entitled to use it. How have they applied it? They have grossly misapplied the Statute, intended for "drunkards and persons who sleep in the day and walk by night," for the purpose of inflicting punishment they could not otherwise inflict on a man who is supposed to have insulted them. That is the grave part of this matter. I put this question to the Attorney General—has any person ever heard before of this Statute being applied in England for contempt of Court? Has any lawyer in this House ever heard of this obsolete Statute of Edward III. (obsolete for this purpose) being used for inflicting punishment for contempt? What have we got? We have got a couple of Resident Magistrates, being authorised by law to inflict seven days' imprisonment, with the significant alternative that they may order the man to be turned out of Court, making use of a Statute which has no more to do with the law of contempt than any stray Statute you would pick up from that table. It is said there may be an appeal. I will endeavour to meet that proposition. There may be an appeal, not an appeal in form, but a legal process for bringing forward and quashing this proceeding, if it appear that the very wide language of this Statute cannot, under any circumstances, embrace disorderly conduct such as has been suggested here, then the conviction would be set aside, but if, technically, it should appear that this very wide and very loose language may possibly embrace disorderly conduct of any kind, then there will be no certiorari and no appeal. We have, therefore, to remember that Dr. Tanner is now required to raise the question as to what construction can be put on the language of the Statute of Edward III. It is a legal question which I need not now discuss, as the House will not take much interest in it. I believe, in point of fact, that this imprisonment will be set aside. Supposing it is not, the result will be that for the first time in the course of our history Resident Magistrates have made use of a Statute which is not intended for the purpose, in order to wreak their personal revenge upon a man who is supposed to have insulted them. I have endeavoured to point out how the law is maladministered in Ireland by Resident Magistrates, and although it is important, no doubt, that Dr. Tanner should be relieved from the infliction of the sentence which, even if there were lawful power to administer it, is a most gross sentence in comparison to what was done, in my mind a far more important matter is that this is an apt illustration of the length to which these Resident Magistrates will go in gross defiance of the constitutional aspects of the law, which I am afraid they are unable to appreciate.

MR. C. J. DARLING (Deptford): All that the hon. and learned Gentleman has said about the length to which Resident Magistrates will go amounts simply to this, that they have ordered a person who has been disorderly in Court to bring some sureties, which he could have obtained in a moment, that he would be of good behaviour for some time to come. And we are actually told that the country is going to rise in revolt against Her Majesty's present Government, because they do not instantly rebuke in some way or another the Magistrates who have merely ventured to ask a person disorderly in a Court of Justice to give security that he will not be disorderly again. Seeing that the country is for the most part composed of orderly persons, I do not think they will be so shocked at what has happened to a notoriously disorderly person as hon. Members seem to fancy they will. The real secret at the bottom of this Debate is that the Opposition are delighted on this particular evening, before coming to a subject which will divide them into 50 atoms, to find a subject upon which they can all go into the Lobby, and represent to the country that they are a united Party. The hon. Member (Dr. Tanner) is used as a corpus vile for performing in the presence of the public this interesting experiment. But with regard to the proof which the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Reid) has attempted to give of the utter illegality of the action of the Resident Magistrates, it seems to me that the more thoroughly he satisfies himself and this House that they had no kind of warrant for this proceeding, the more extraordinary it is, if there should be a real wish to relieve Dr. Tanner of his imprisonment, that a certiorari has not been applied for at once. I make no doubt it will be applied for, after the utterances from a solicitor (Mr. H. H. Fowler) a barrister (Mr. Atherley Jones) and a Queen's counsel (Mr. Reid.) In the course of the many interjections which have adorned this Debate, some hon. Member for England said that Dr. Tanner was too poor to get an opinion. [Mr. SEXTON: No one said that.] Well, I thought so. At all events, that need not stand in the way now he has got opinions in this House from the hon. and learned Gentlemen I have named, that he has a good case against the Resident Magistrates if he likes to apply for a certiorari, and he has got those opinions for nothing. All he has to do to-morrow morning is to get a counsel who can restrain himself in the presence of an Irish Court of Justice. I would not advise him to employ the same counsel as before, as then the real point of the case may never be reached. He has only to employ an orderly and competent counsel, if he can find one in Ireland, and to ask that counsel to apply for a certiorari, and if he only mentions the opinions of the three hon. and learned Gentlemen, I have no doubt he will get it immediately. The more he proves the Resident Magistrates to be wrong, the less need, it appears to me, is there for interference on the part of this House or the Officers of the Crown. Reference has been made to a letter written by the hon. Member, which asked for the grace of the Crown.

Mr. SEXTON: The hon. and learned Member is under a misapprehension. Dr. Tanner does not want the grace of the Crown; he desires, simply as a Member of Parliament, to expose the cruelty of his treatment.

*Mr. C. J. DARLING: I am very sorry indeed to have imputed so respectable a motive. The only way in which the

to, can exercise his power is to advise the Lord Lieutenant to exercise the grace of the Crown. He cannot quash the Order of the Resident Magistrates. The only possible way to quash the Order is to go before the Courts in Dublin. I think the application for grace to the Crown might be made with some force. There are circumstances with regard to Dr. Tanner to which I need not allude. ["Allude to them." "What are they?"]—they cannot but be present to the minds of every Member of this House—why the Crown might take a lenient and exceptional view of this matter.

Mr. W. O'BRIEN (Cork, N.E.): Mr. Speaker, before the House closes, I should like to say a word or two, though not as a lawyer. The scintille juris to which we have been just treated by the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Darling) were not intended or expected to elicit any serious reply from this side of the House. I do not think he has improved the Government case in reference to the charges against Dr. Tanner by his chivalrous and gentlemanly reference to poor Dr. Tanner's wife. I turn, Sir, to more important persons. I congratulate the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton and the hon. and learned Gentleman, who sits opposite, upon their success in drawing the Chief Secretary, who declared two nights ago that there was nothing happening in Ireland which did not bore him now since he had ceased latterly to be amused.

*Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: I never said anything of the kind.

Mr. W. O'BRIEN: The right hon. Gentleman repudiates the report of the secret meeting at Shoreditch. Am I to understand that?

*Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: I repudiate the version which the hon. Gentleman has given of the remarks I made.

Mr. W. O'BRIEN: Well, I have given the version which I myself saw, and the right hon. Gentleman has only himself to blame if there is not a more authentic report given. He did state according to both the versions I have seen that latterly there was nothing in the state of Ireland, or in what was happening in Ireland that even amused him, or even gave him, as it once gave him acute pain.

coming to a close. Then you have the adjournment to the date when he could not have the advantage of a concurrent sentence. Then you have this episode before Mr. Fitzgerald; you have his counsel thrust out of Court—a counsel who, I think, will compare possibly not unfavourably either in character or in ability with the hon. and learned Member who has just spoken. Mr. Healy is flung out of the Court at the whim of these creatures of the Chief Secretary, and then the man is left defenceless and to his own resources, and actually for the very speech he made in his own defence he is sentenced to three months' imprisonment. I believe it is unheard of that an undefended prisoner should be subjected to this punishment simply because in his defence he is betrayed into a few words of rough truth—a few words which do not disgrace him in the smallest degree in the eyes of his countrymen or in the eyes of honest men in this country. It seems to me that the speeches we have heard to-night establish conclusively that these Magistrates are not content even with the ferocious powers which the Coercion Act gives, but that they must endeavour to heel-tap that Coercion Act by having recourse to this ancient Statute against strangers and vagabonds. Whereas it appears as clear as daylight that seven days is the extent of the term of imprisonment for contempt, they have gone to this musty old Statute for a punishment which is in direct contravention of the pledge and understanding upon which this Coercion Act passed this House. The more this question is considered and discussed, the more, I believe, it will be seen that it is a cowardly and vindictive attempt to victimise a political opponent, because Dr. Tanner is supposed not to be a very popular person in this House. It is not the first time that the Government have pressed us too far before the ordinary humane feeling and sympathy of the people of England, and I dare say their experience to-night will have shown that they have ventured too far upon Dr. Tanner's personal unpopularity with a certain section of the House, and that they are not quite so safe as they supposed they were in attempting to degrade and to insult him, and to drag him about in the hands of policemen as they have done. I venture to say that the man who is capable of directing that policy, or of tolerating such a policy, ought to blush for himself in the eyes of honest men, instead of smirking and bragging as he does of it. I will only refer to one other topic—the argument that Dr. Tanner might have obtained bail. Had he done so, it would have been a confession that he had been guilty of this disgraceful conduct, which he utterly repudiates. There is no reason why we should not all be shut up in secula seculorum without any particular charge being made if the Magistrates chose to take such a course. So far as we are concerned, we are accustomed to this sort of thing; but it is a very serious thing for you to encourage these officials in Ireland to believe that, practically speaking, they are safe in putting any story or any charge to the discredit or the dishonour of an Irish Nationalist, and that the more atrocious the charge the better are their chances of promotion. They are convinced that the right hon. Gentleman will accept any story they choose to tell him without qualification, and they are justified in that belief by the conduct of the right hon. Gentleman. They know that he will resolutely refuse the English people any honest way of judging the conduct of his subordinates as the result of any honest and independent public inquiry. They have come to consider that if they only make themselves sufficiently obnoxious to the Irish people they will be the first to be pensioned off when Home Rule is established. It is a very dangerous feeling that you are encouraging in the minds of those officials, and it is time it should be known that the day will come when there will have to be a full and searching investigation into the right and truth of all these matters, if not under the present Government, at any rate under the Government that will succeed it. I have no doubt that when the treatment of Dr. Tanner is inquired into, it will be seen that it was an unworthy and disgraceful attempt to defame a political opponent, and but a part and parcel of the policy which you are endeavouring to carry out all over the country.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON (Armagh, N.): It is very interesting, to hear the hon. Member for North-East Cork (Mr. W. O'Brien) giving his opinion in regard

Mr. NOBLE (Hastings): I rise to order. I wish to know whether the kindheartedness of Dr. Tanner is the question before the House?

Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE: A few days ago I spoke to Dr. Tanner on the subject of the charge against him, and he assured me on his word of honour that he did not commit the act of which he was accused, and I believe him. The House should remember that Dr. Tanner did not produce evidence in contradiction of the charge against him because he denied the jurisdiction and competency of the Court. I would ask hon. Members opposite to consider whether it is not certain that two Resident Magistrates sentenced Dr. Tanner to one month's hard labour with the intention of ousting what would otherwise have been Dr. Tanner's appeal to the County Court. This is only one illustration of many cases of the same kind. The Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant has pointed out that Dr. Tanner might have relieved himself from imprisonment by giving security and bail for his good conduct. But if Dr. Tanner had done so, he would have admitted that he had been in the wrong, and I do not think there is a Member of this House who, under similar circumstances, would have taken that course. When the hon. Member for South Belfast (Mr. Johnston) was very unjustly sent to prison by a Conservative Government in 1868 for holding an Orange meeting in the North of Ireland, Lord Mayo offered to release him if he would enter into his recognizances for his future good conduct, and would undertake not to repeat the act, but the hon. Gentleman very rightly refused to give such an undertaking. If he had done otherwise, I think he would have forfeited the good opinion of every Irishman. I will conclude by remarking that, in my opinion, the Magistrates took this method of dealing with Dr. Tanner's case knowing that that Gentleman would go to prison for three months in addition to the three months' hard labour that had previously been inflicted upon him on another charge.

*SIR H. DAVEY (Stockton): I do not think there is any real difference of opinion among lawyers on the point before the House. No hon. and learned Member opposite has expressed the opinion that the Magistrates had jurisdiction to inflict three months' imprisonment on the hon. Member for Mid Cork (Dr. Tanner). To put a strained interpretation on the Statute of Edward III. so as to include contempt of Court within the general wording is not a proper use of the Statute. It has been said that legal questions which may come before the Courts ought not to be argued in this House; but I claim, on behalf of the honour and dignity of the House, the right to bring forward any case wherein a Member of the House has been committed to prison by a Magistrate acting in excess of his jurisdiction. This is not a question affecting Dr. Tanner, but it affects the House. I deny that because it is a matter which may have to be decided by the Courts the House is precluded from discussing the reasons why one of its Members is prevented from attending its sittings. We have continually called, and intend to call, the attention of the House to any case in which there has appeared to be any maladministration of justice in the circumstances in which Ireland is now placed. The Government have obtained an exceptional Act creating an exceptional tribunal. I admit that the Act is the law of the land, and that we cannot complain of the powers which it confers being exercised. But the exceptional character of the Act makes it more incumbent on the House to take care that the large jurisdiction conferred on Magistrates shall not be exceeded. Then we are told that this may be a matter of appeal, or that a certiorari might be applied for. I do not know what course Dr. Tanner may take, but even if he applies for a certiorari that does not answer the point which the Lord Mayor of Dublin has brought before the House. The right hon. Gentleman expended a great deal of eloquence in describing the horrible and abominable nature of the crime of which Dr. Tanner has been convicted. If Dr. Tanner has been guilty of that offence it may be admitted that his conduct was at least unbecoming and unworthy of a gentleman. But the real points are—first, whether the Magistrates have not exceeded their jurisdiction; and, secondly, whether they have exercised that jurisdiction in a proper manner by refusing an oppor-

Secretary, but by this democratic House of Commons; and I maintain that if there is one thing which the people of this country will insist upon more than another it is that Members of this House shall be treated in the eyes of the law in the same way as the meanest man in the Kingdom. You are asked to sympathise with the hon. Member for Cork because he is now in gaol undergoing the tyrannical law which this House has passed; but, in so putting himself in gaol, he has only fulfilled his highest aspirations. If the House will allow me, I will read an elegant extract from one of the hon. Gentleman's speeches—

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: As this Motion of Adjournment has been made on a definite matter of urgent public importance, I think the hon. Member should confine himself to the matter at issue.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON: I still maintain that, in imprisoning Dr. Tanner, the Magistrates were fulfilling his highest aspirations, openly expressed—namely, that he desired and hoped to be put in gaol, and to obtain a period of retirement, which he has now succeeded in securing. The right hon. Gentleman the Lord Mayor of Dublin has appealed to this House for sympathy towards Dr. Tanner, who is now in prison for a disgraceful and odious offence; but it should be remembered that this is not an accusation suddenly brought against the Member for Mid Cork, but one which has been before the public for some time. Why did not the hon. Member come before the country and deny that he had ever committed such an abominable action? [An hon. Member: "What chance had he?"] At all events, some of the 85 mouths below the Gangway on the other side of the House might have spoken for him. Allow me to point out how childish it was on the part of the hon. Member for North East Cork (Mr. W. O'Brien) to say why should Dr. Tanner in a Court of Justice attempt to deny a charge of this kind. I maintain that any man, whatever his position, is under the necessity of denying such a charge, supposing it to be untrue. I say it is the duty of every hon. Gentleman so charged of an abominable offence to establish his character as a private man, and as a Member of this House. I hope the House will see that Her Majesty's Government, at any rate, are not to blame in this matter. Is there any instance on record in Parliamentary history of any hon. Member of this House getting up in his place and accusing the Government of the day of prostituting justice to their own ends, either in England, Wales, or Scotland? But because this occurred in Ireland, and because hon. Members opposite found their policy on a successful resistance to the law of Ireland, we have the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton, who is a lawyer and ought to know better, getting up in his place and without a shadow of foundation for his remarks accusing two Irish Magistrates of being absolutely destitute of one shred of honour, and of having for political motives prostituted the law which they were bound to administer. Whatever may be said of an Irish lawyer he may, at any rate, compare favourably with the right hon. Gentleman himself. No language is too strong to repudiate this attempt to vilify the Irish Magistrates, whose duty is hard enough already, in the attempt to exercise the different functions which this House, and not Her Majesty's Government, have placed in their hands. And yet the right hon. Gentleman gets up in his place in this House and helps to fan the flame of illegality in Ireland, and to prompt the Irish people to disobey a law which this Parliament has passed.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central): I do not desire to detain the House on this question, but I think it right to say that I know Dr. Tanner to be a high-hearted and honourable man, and I am convinced that he did not commit the act of which he has been charged. I think I know more about Dr. Tanner's character than the hon. and gallant Gentleman who has just sat down, and I am not ashamed to say so. I believe him to be a very kind-hearted, honourable man, although, perhaps, not always very discreet. Some time ago a friend of mine who was travelling in Ireland met with a very severe accident by being thrown out of a car. Dr. Tanner took charge of this gentleman, and for many days nursed him most kindly and tenderly.

Court would adjourn, thus doing the very thing which my hon. and learned Friend said they ought to have done. The Court was adjourned from the 2nd to the 26th of July, and since then Dr. Tanner has been in communication with many of his able and accomplished friends in the House, and, among them, with the Member for Bradford, as that right hon. Gentleman has told us to-night. It is trifling with the House when it is said of an hon. Member accused of a disgusting offence—it is trifling with the House to say that he had witnesses who could prove that he was not guilty, and declined to call them. Dr. Tanner acknowledged the jurisdiction of the Court, having appeared before it by counsel and solicitor, and called a witness; the House, therefore, will draw its own conclusions as to why the other witnesses were not called. Further, having regard to the character of the language admitted by the Lord Mayor of Dublin to have been used by Dr. Tanner, the Court would not have been justified in taking the protests of a man who had used such language against the testimony of witnesses who had been sworn and cross-examined. My hon. and learned Friend challenges me to pledge my reputation as to a particular view of the law. Well, it does not seem to me that this is the right place for one lawyer to boast or brag of his own opinion or to pledge his reputation; but when the Statute comes to be examined I think a great deal more is to be said for the power of the Justices who had such conduct before them to act upon the Statute than has been suggested. But I decline in this House to express an opinion upon a matter which ought to be discussed and dealt with by a proper legal tribunal upon proper information. It seems to me that, inasmuch as this question may be raised elsewhere in the course of a few days or a few weeks, it would not be right for anyone to pledge his reputation either on one side or on the other in this House.

*MR. REID: Will the Attorney General say whether the Statute has ever been so used since the reign of Edward III.?

*SIR R. WEBSTER: I am not able to make all my observations at the same time. No doubt I ought to have answered the hon. Member for Dumfries first. I know of no case in which the Statute has been so used. On the other hand, I am very glad to know that the instances of such insults offered to Magistrates in the face of the Court are of very rare occurrence indeed. At any rate, the law books I am privileged to consult do not show many such instances. But this is not the proper tribunal for dealing with the case. With characteristic candour the Lord Mayor of Dublin has admitted that if the offence were proved he would not say the sentence was too great. But the Court had the proof before it, and passed a sentence, and it would be improper for this House to try the validity of an Order which might be appealed against next week. My hon. and learned Friend has said that if Dr. Tanner had been willing to give security he would have admitted the jurisdiction. But my hon. and learned Friend will not find a scintilla of authority to show that a man who has obeyed the order of the Court in a criminal case has waived his right to go into the Court of Queen's Bench next day, either by certiorari or habeas corpus. I do not intend to notice every point which has been raised. But I trust I have addressed myself to the points as to which hon. Members wish that I should say a word. I trust that nothing which has occurred this evening will lead anyone to the conclusion that the Court ought not to deal with the case on the evidence before it. If Magistrates are to listen to the protestations of innocence where no evidence is called, or are afraid to do their duty, there is an end of any bond fide administration of the law. Even my right hon. Friend will agree with me that the case having been adjourned, and Dr. Tanner, having declined to produce evidence, the Court had no option but to perform its duty, and to do so fearlessly.

MR. A. BLANE (Armagh, S.): I trust that the House will listen to the few words I have to say. We have it admitted that this assault alleged to have been committed on a policeman was not an ordinary assault. It was committed, if at all, while Dr. Tanner was in custody. That must not be forgotten. He had been sentenced to three months' imprisonment by a Resident Magistrate for an offence under the Coercion Act, and while he tunity of appeal from the sentence. I was surprised to hear the right hon. Gentleman say that it was Dr. Tanner's own fault in not finding surety. Why, if Dr. Tanner had done so he would have admitted the jurisdiction of the Court to make that order; and the jurisdiction has not been seriously defended by any single Member of the House. With regard to the refusal of the right of appeal in connection with the first sentence, I can only say that under the special circumstances of the case when Dr. Tanner had been deprived of the services of his counsel, I know not whether rightly or wrongly, owing to that gentleman having conducted himself in a manner which the Magistrates considered improper, and when the Magistrates were told that there was evidence which might put a different complexion on the case, it was their duty either to postpone the trial so that the accused might obtain other advice, or to inflict such a sentence as would enable Dr. Tanner to appeal to a higher Court. The Solicitor General for Ireland will not go further than to say that doubts have been entertained whether the Statute of Edward III. applies to a case like this. But when the Summary Jurisdiction Act prescribes a remedy and fixes the punishment of one week's imprisonment, the effect of that enactment is to prevent the Magistrates from inflicting any greater term of imprisonment. Otherwise, the Magistrates would be able to do indirectly that which they are prohibited from doing directly. The Secretary for Ireland repeated that he is determined to discharge his duty, and to preserve respect for the law in Ireland. But I tell him that events such as this, if what is stated is true, constitute a mockery and travesty of justice—the idea of giving three months for what the Magistrate is restricted to one week! These cases are calculated to destroy respect for law in Ireland.

*THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): It is a pity that my hon. and learned Friend, for whose opinions on all legal questions I entertain the highest respect, should have made a speech without acquainting himself with the facts. My hon. and learned Friend has said that if what is stated is true this trial has been a mockery and travesty of justice, and that Dr. Tanner is at that moment illegally imprisoned.

*SIR HORACE DAVEY: I did not say that.

*SIR R. WEBSTER: Then I do not understand what the hon. and learned Gentleman meant.

*SIR HORACE DAVEY: What I said, or at least intended to say, was that the Government were supporting an order made by Magistrates for three months' imprisonment.

*SIR R. WEBSTER: My hon. and learned Friend could not have made the statement he did if he had known the facts. Imprisonment has been inflicted for the disgraceful offence referred to for one month. At the end of that month any question with reference to the further sentence of three months can be raised. Now, what are the facts? My hon. and learned Friend and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton have attributed injustice to the Magistrates, because it is said that they acted in the absence of Dr. Tanner's counsel. My hon. and learned Friend further said that the Magistrates were told that there was other evidence, and that they ought to have adjourned the case. But my hon. and learned Friend seems to have forgotten that on the 2nd of July the hon. and learned Member for Longford appeared for Dr. Tanner and openly charged the Magistrates with being in a conspiracy against Dr. Tanner with the witnesses

Court would adjourn, thus doing the very thing which my hon. and learned Friend said they ought to have done. The Court was adjourned from the 2nd to the 26th of July, and since then Dr. Tanner has been in communication with many of his able and accomplished friends in the House, and, among them, with the Member for Bradford, as that right hon. *SIR B. WEBSTER: I am not able to make all my observations at the same time. No doubt I ought to have answered

the hon. Member for Dumfries first. I know of no case in which the Statute has been so used. On the other hand, I am very glad to know that the instances of such insults offered to Magistrates in the face of the Court are of very rare occurrence indeed. At any rate, the law books I am privileged to consult do not show many such instances. But this is not the proper tribunal for dealing with the case. With characteristic candour the Lord Mayor of Dublin has admitted that if the offence were proved he would not say the sentence was too great. But the Court had the proof before it, and passed a sentence, and it would be improper for this House to try the validity of an Order which might be appealed against next week. My hon. and learned Friend has said that if Dr. Tanner had been willing to give security he would have admitted the jurisdiction. But my hon. and learned Friend will not find a scintilla of authority to show that a man who has obeyed the order of the Court in a criminal case has waived his right to go into the Court of Queen's Bench next day, either by certiorari or habeas corpus. I do not intend to notice every point which has been raised. But I trust I have addressed myself to the points as to which hon. Members wish that I should say a word. I trust that nothing which has occurred this evening will lead anyone to the conclusion that the Court ought not to deal with the case on the evidence before it. If Magistrates are to listen to the protestations of innocence where no evidence is called, or are afraid to do their duty, there is an end of any bond fide administration of the law. Even my right hon. Friend will agree with me that the case having been adjourned, and Dr. Tanner, having declined to produce evidence, the Court had no option but to perform its duty, and to do so fearlessly.

MR. A. BLANE (Armagh, S.): I trust that the House will listen to the few words I have to say. We have it admitted that this assault alleged to have been committed on a policeman was not an ordinary assault. It was committed, if at all, while Dr. Tanner was in custody. That must not be forgotten. He had been sentenced to three months' imprisonment by a Resident Magistrate for an offence under the Coercion Act, and while he was being conveyed to prison it was alleged that he committed this assault. He, therefore, brought himself within the scope of the Prison Act of 1877, and under the rules the Governor of the prison or the Visiting Justices were the proper authority for trying him for the alleged offence. But that did not suit the purposes of the Government. They preferred to allow the term of imprisonment to expire and not to take any proceedings until Dr. Tanner had regained his liberty. I contend that this is an infringement of the Prison Act of 1877, and I cannot understand how any Member of the Government can get up and defend such a scandalous Act. I submit, also, that Dr. Tanner was quite justified in refusing to acknowledge the jurisdiction of the Magistrates.

MR. SCHWANN (Manchester, N.): I wish only to speak as to a question of fact. It has been stated that the language used in Court by the hon. Member for Mid Cork was unusual. I beg entirely to challenge that statement. Only a few weeks ago I was present at a trial of two Members of this House before two Resident Magistrates at Drogheda, and they were defended by Mr. Bodkin, who used towards the Magistrates much the same language as that imputed to Dr. Tanner. Mr. Bodkin stated that in his opinion the Magistrates had the sentence they were to pass already in their pockets, or that they would telegraph to Dublin for it. Therefore, the language that Dr. Tanner had used did not appear to be unusual in Ireland, and the argument based upon that statement falls to the ground.

The House divided :—Ayes 118; Noes 174.—(Div. List, No. 268.)

STANDING COMMITTEE ON TRADE &c. — LIGHT RAILWAYS (IRELAND) BILL.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Standing Committee on Trade, &c., do sit and proceed with the Light Railways (Ireland) Bill To-morrow, at One of the o'clock."—(Mr. Salt.)

MR. STOREY (Sunderland): I ob-of this Bill. Being absent from the House on account of ill-health at the commencement of the Session, I was not placed on any Grand Committee. I have taken a special interest in this Bill; and the least the Government could have done would have been to have given me, or some other Member for me, the opportunity of laying my views before the Committee. When a Bill comes from a Grand Committee it does not pass through Committee of the whole House, and on the Report stage the privileges of Members are circumscribed. I, therefore, appeal to the Government, and especially to the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary, who, I think, gave us if not an absolute promise at all events a tacit understanding that a certain number of gentlemen should be added to the Committee.

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The Committee of Selection reported the day before yesterday that they had added 15 Members to the Grand Committee. The 15 names are in the Votes.

MR. STOREY: Might I ask what the names are?

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I will read them. Mr. Biggar, Mr. Blane, Mr. Crilly, Mr. Edward Harrington, Mr. Maurice Healy, Mr. Macartney, Mr. Madden, Mr. Marum, Sir Joseph M'Kenna, Mr. Molloy, Colonel Nolan, Mr. O'Hea, Mr. Parnell, Mr. T. W. Russell, and Colonel Sanderson.

MR. STOREY: Well, Sir, I suppose it is too late to object to the names, but I can, at least, resist this Motion, and I shall do so because the names added are those of Irish Members who, with one or two exceptions, act on the principle of getting as much English money as they can. I do not think the Government have treated us quite fairly in this matter.

MR. TOMLINSON (Preston): I ask you, Sir, whether it is in order for the hon. Member to accuse the Government of having had any share in the nomination of these Members, it being, according to the Standing Orders of this House, the duty of the Committee of Selection to put the names in?

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER called on

Members have in season and out of season resisted this Bill in the interest of the taxpayers, and the least that could have been done in fairness was that some of these Gentlemen should have been put upon the Committee, so that they might be able there to state their views in regard to the measure. The Bill is of an extremely complicated character. The details are of the essence of it. In its present form it does not lay down any distinct plan upon which the money is to be spent. It may under the Bill be spent in Antrim, where they do not need it, or in Galway where they do. I think we could in the room upstairs give ample reasons why a considerable alteration should be made in the conditions and terms of the measure. I think that in the seclusion of that room we could convince the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary that before he took the money of his constituents in Manchester and agreed to spend it in Ireland, he should define in the Bill how and where he was going to spend it and to what extent as between province and province.

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER : The hon. Member is now discussing the Amendments. That is not in order.

*MR. W. H. SMITH : Let me appeal to the hon. Gentleman. I do not think it is in order that this Question should now be debated. The Motion is merely an intimation to the House that an arrangement has been made for the Committee to meet to-morrow. The Committee will meet without an order of the House.

MR. STOREY : I will not compete in knowledge or experience with the right hon. Gentleman, but I know that when Mr. Speaker puts a question from the Chair it is possible to debate it. I heard the question put, and I think I can urge reasons against the Motion. I want to appeal to the First Lord of the Treasury and the Chief Secretary. The opponents of that Bill have not been fairly treated. They have not had an opportunity of presenting their views in a quiet and calm Committee upstairs. I wish the Chief Secretary to come to some reasonable arrangement by which there shall be put on the Committee the hon. Member for Bristol, the hon. Member for Lanark, the hon. Member for Spalding, or myself. (Ironical Cheers.) There is no reason for cheering when I ask for a little work. I believe that legally I can move that this Debate be now adjourned, and I beg to do so.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."
—(Mr. Storey.)

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR : Of course we are anxious that the discussion in the Grand Committee should take place as soon as possible, but if the hon. Member is strongly of opinion that it should be delayed, I shall be ready to postpone the first meeting till next Tuesday. As to the constitution of the Committee, that is not merely technically but substantially outside the control of the Government. It would be a serious and a disastrous thing if the Government were to attempt to interfere with the discretion of the Committee of Selection. I have had no communication with that Committee, and am not a Member of the Grand Committee. If the hon. Gentleman will approach the Committee of Selection and lay his grievance before them, it is possible that some arrangement may be come to by which his demands will be met.

*MR. OSBORNE MORGAN (Denbighshire, E.): As I happen to have some experience in this matter, having acted as Chairman of one of these Grand Committees for the last two years, I may be allowed to support what has fallen from the right hon. Gentleman. The constitution of these Committees rests entirely with the Committee of Selection, and the Government has nothing to do with it.

*COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): When it was proposed to send this Bill to a Grand Committee I objected, on the ground that every opportunity would be taken to cause delay. The Chairman of the Committee was away a day or two, and, therefore, we did not sit yesterday or to-day, and now here is another proposal for delay. I object to the whole tactics of the hon. Member for Sunderland, which are tactics of delay. He has said he believes greatly in the power of talk in Committee. I do not object to his threatening to give us in Committee one long flow of wishy-washy talk, but I do object to his delaying the progress of this Bill. The Committee of Selection have added fifteen Members to the Grand Com-the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Belfast.

MR. STOREY: I think it is a very reasonable course. In asking leave to withdraw my Motion, I will only say I hope the Government will use their moral influence in favour of some representation of the opposition to the Bill being on the Committee.

Motion for adjournment, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question again proposed.

MR. SEXTON: I beg to move that Tuesday be substituted for to-morrow.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "to-morrow" in order to insert the words "upon Tuesday next." — (Mr. Sexton.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'to-morrow' stand part of the Question."

MR. STOREY: No; I think that is not the way of meeting the point. I think the Motion should be withdrawn altogether, because—

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I will withdraw the Motion altogether.

MR. STOREY: What I was going to point out is this: If the Resolution is passed and the Committee of Selection do not see their way to making any change in the Committee, then the Committee will meet in its present form on Tuesday. This I object to, and I desire that the Motion should now be withdrawn.

COLONEL NOLAN: I wish to point out that the hon. Member for Sunderland has not exactly risen at the proper time. He advocated one course, and I advocated one in a diametrically opposite direction. I am sorry to find myself in opposition to the hon. Member, but on this question of Light Railways we must agree to differ, except that I quite agree with him that these Light Railways should be constructed in Galway. My right hon. Friend the Member for West Belfast suggested that the hon. Member for Sunderland should withdraw his Motion, and that the Motion of the First Lord should be put in a modified form. We allowed the hon. Member for Sunderland to withdraw his Motion, we challenged no Division, but he now gets up and objects to the other part of the proposition of my right hon. Friend, which was to balance the other. Certainly I think the hon.

Member for Sunderland, having been allowed to withdraw his Motion, ought now to accept the other part of the advice of the right hon. Member for Belfast. We will use any influence we have to get his name added to the Committee; more we cannot do. The only pledge the Members of the Government could give would be as individual Members; but I can see there is an awkwardness about that.

*MR. OSBORNE MORGAN (Denbighshire, E.): This is a very important matter, as bearing upon future action. I feel certain that when once a Bill is referred to the Standing Committee no further order is necessary. Over and over again I, as Chairman of the Committee, have acted on that understanding, and I think it is introducing what may be a dangerous precedent to say it is necessary there should be a further order as to when the Committee should meet. I would suggest, therefore, that the proper course is for the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. W. H. Smith) to withdraw his Motion. As to the constitution of the Committee that is an entirely distinct matter.

*MR. BARING (London): It seems to me some Resolution of the House is necessary, because ever since the Committee on Trade has existed it has sat on Mondays and Thursdays, and a Resolution to the same effect was passed this year.

*MR. OSBORNE MORGAN: Of course the Committee having power proprio motu to fix, can also change, the day; there is no difficulty about that.

MR. COSSHAM (Bristol, E.): I have prepared a number of Amendments which I hoped to urge in Committee of the whole House, and which cannot be discussed if the Bill is referred to a Committee upstairs. I think it is unfair that those who have given notice of their objection to details of the measure should be precluded from the opportunity of ventilating their objections.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: Every Amendment of which any hon. Member has given notice on the Paper will be referred to the Committee. I desire to withdraw my Motion.

DR. CLARK (Caithness): This Order is not upon the Paper at all, and I do not know whether it is regular, whether it is convenient or necessary, but I wish to ask if the Motion is withdrawn will the Government take any steps to have the Committee meet on Tuesday? Otherwise the Committee may meet on Monday and proceed with the Bill before any change is made in the constitution of the Committee. Now there are some Members of the Committee who have paired for the Session, and it can easily be arranged that the Committee shall be supplemented by some of my hon. Friends who are prepared to wait until the end of the Session.

Mr. CRAIG (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): There was an agreement at the last meeting of the Committee that Members should only be called together after ample notice, both to allow of time being given to a fair and judicious examination of the Bill and Amendments as well as to allow of Members making their own arrangements. I hope this understanding will be carried out.

Mr. ORILLY (Mayo, N.): I hope the Government will resist these attempts at delay. Those hon. Members who have objections to the Bill have had ample time to prepare their Amendments. This Light Railways Bill has been before the House for a considerable period. An attempt is now being made by the hon. Member for Sunderland and his colleagues to defeat the Bill by delays, and I hope the Government will resist such an attempt. If I had my way I would have insisted as one of the new members added to the Committee on Trade on the observance of the notice on the card handed to me to-night in the Post Office, that a meeting of the Committee should be held to-morrow at 1, because the Session is drawing to a close, and if there is any merit in the Bill at all that can only be secured by the Committee proceeding with the Bill strenuously at once. I entirely agree with my right hon. Friend the Lord Mayor of Dublin that as the friends of the Bill have not, perhaps, had time to well consider their Amendments, it is desirable to meet on Tuesday, but I do trust that the Government will resolutely carry the Bill through, disregarding the efforts of my hon. Friends the Members for Sunderland and Cavan, who, I believe, want to kill the Bill for the Session. Mr. Justice and the Justice appeal to the Chief Secretary and the Solicitor General for Ireland to show the strength of their good intentions by using their influence to secure the meeting of the Committee on Tuesday to proceed with the Bill, irrespective of whether my hon. Friends the Members for Sunderland and Cavan have or have not sufficient representation on the Committee, because, so far as I can analyse the disposition of the 15 additional members placed on the Committee, I think they are pretty evenly divided for and against the measure.

Mr. PHILIPPS (Lanark, Mid): Is it too late to reconsider the question whether the Bill should be referred to the Committee on Trade at all?

Mr. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.): If the Motion is withdrawn do the Government intend that the Committee should proceed with the Bill on Tuesday or not?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir MICHAEL HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): The day for which these Committees are summoned depends not on the Government, but on the Chairman of the Committee. Notices have been given for the Committee to meet to-morrow, but obviously that cannot take place now. If this Motion is withdrawn the result will be, that as the days originally fixed for the meeting of the Committee were Mondays and Thursdays, the Committee would meet pro forma on Monday, and then decide to go on with the consideration of the Bill on Tuesday.

Mr. BIGGAR (Cavan, W.): The thing is practically settled in a sensible manner. I understand that the Committee of Selection will try to place upon the Grand Committee a certain number of English Members who are specially interested in the subject, and these will be reasonably prepared to go on with business on Tuesday.

Mr. E. HARRINGTON (Kerry, W.): I have not troubled the House for some time, and may be allowed a few words. I wish to put myself right in the position I take. I intend to support the measure, but certainly I do not think that the Radical Members who oppose it are under any animus towards us, and if I

*SIR MICHAEL HICKS BEACH rose in his place and claimed to move "That the Question be now put."

MR. A. O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.) : May I ask you, Sir, on a point of procedure, whether this is not the first time any such Question has been put from the Chair; and, whether if that is so, it may not be a precedent to rule all subsequent proceedings in regard to these matters?

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER : Similar questions have repeatedly been put from the Chair.

Question put, "That the Question be now put."

Question, "That the word 'tomorrow' stand part of the Question," put, and negatived.

Words "upon Tuesday next" inserted.

Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Ordered—

"That the Standing Committee upon Trade &c., do sit and proceed with the Light Railways (Ireland) Bill upon Tuesday next, at One of the clock."

PRINCE OF WALES'S CHILDREN BILL (No. 358.)

Considered in Committee.

(In Committee.)

Clause 1.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton) : I beg to move an Amendment with regard to this Bill, Clause 1, line 28, to leave out the words "Trustees hereinafter mentioned." Mr. Courtney, strong language has been used by Gentlemen opposite, and by some Gentlemen on this side of the House, against those who oppose this Grant, in pursuance of what we estimate to be our duty. But if this money is to be granted I cannot exactly see why we should interfere between the Prince of Wales and his children and a number of Trustees. We have more confidence than the Government in the Prince of Wales's honour and policy. It seems to me that this proposal involves the idea that if this money were left to the management of the Prince of Wales he would make away with it. We heard some very beautiful sentiments from the right hon. Gentlemen (Mr. W. H. Smith) about the family relations when he brought in this Bill, but when he comes to give effect to his own ideas of family, he actually wishes to make clear that this House is not prepared to trust the parent with the money. I always thought it would be more simple to vote the money directly to the children, or that the money should be voted to the Prince of Wales to be allocated in certain fixed ways amongst the children. But, then, what is the good of Trustees? They are an extra and perfectly unnecessary wheel of the coach. The father is the fitting trustee of the children, and it seems to me that the only plea and reason why, instead of voting the money directly to the children of the Prince of Wales we should vote it to the Prince of Wales, is to recognise in some sort of way his parental authority. His Royal Highness is not a young man. He is almost middle-aged, and this proposal really does seem a gratuitous insult on the part of the Government towards the Prince of Wales. We wish on this side of the House to free ourselves from any notion that we wish to impose such a condition on the Prince of Wales, or that we remotely or distantly imagine that the Prince of Wales is not to be trusted with the money that we vote to his children. It seems to me that those who advocate the passing of these Grants say that the Prince of Wales shall be nominally the holder of this money, but we will put half-a-dozen policeman around him to see that he does not make away with it. I think it is more consistent with the respect which this House entertains for the Prince of Wales, and its belief that he is a perfectly honest man, and that he would honestly administer this money, that we should do away entirely with these trustees. Of course, if this Amendment be carried it will be necessary to carry a certain number of consequential Amendments, although I do not think there is likely to be any discussion if this Amendment be carried. This Amendment recognises the Prince of Wales as the fitting guardian and trustee of his children, and objects to the interpolation of "trustees" because the Government chooses to distrust the honesty of the Prince of Wales.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 28, to leave out the words "trustees hereinafter mentioned."—(Mr. Labouchere.)

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the clause."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 147; Noes 47.—(Div. List, No. 270.)

*MR. STOREY (Sunderland): I now move the Amendment which stands in my name, by which I propose to strike out the words "thirty-six" in order to insert the words "twenty-one." I may say that I am quite prepared for the imputation of shabbiness from hon. Members on the other side of the House, or, if not from them, from the organs which represent or misrepresent them in the country. I care no more for imputations of shabbiness than hon. Members opposite care for imputations of wasteful extravagance. I would here venture to remark that we are to-night, or, perhaps, to-morrow, absolutely going to vote more money than Her Majesty has asked for. When Ministers come down and represent that it is necessary, in addition to the extraordinary large sums voted to support the dignity of the Throne, that more money should be voted, it was originally intended to ask for a sum of £13,000 per annum; but a Committee was appointed, and the result was that £23,000 a year more was asked for. I propose in some degree to remedy that exceedingly improper proposal by reducing the sum asked for to £21,000. I am not unwilling to admit that the elder son of the Prince of Wales should have £10,000 a year, and as the younger Prince would probably feel uncomfortable if he had much less than his brother, I am not unwilling to admit that he should have £8,000 a year. Nor do I object that the Princess just married, and whose happiness we all desire, just as we desire the happiness of every young bride in England, should have £3,000 a year. In that way I get at the sum of £21,000. What I want to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer is—where is the other £15,000 going to? Is the Prince of Wales to have it? Or is it to be spent for the other young

Mr. Labouchere

Princesses? If not, what is to be done with it? Is it to be accumulated and invested? If so I entirely resist and repel the notion that out of the public money any sum should be given to be invested and accumulated for future purposes. We live now in troublous days for Royal people. I believe that Napoleon when on the Throne of France invested large sums in English and American securities, so that when the inevitable issue came he might not be without resources. Can it be that our Royal Family think their position so insecure that they, too, wanted to make a bag, that when the inevitable change comes they may not be left without means? If this extra £15,000 is not spent on the Princesses, and if it is not to be spent by the Prince of Wales, and if it is not to be accumulated, what is to become of it? I suggest that the proper thing would be to keep it in the Public Exchequer. It is the people's money. It ought not to be reserved for the probabilities of the future; there ought to be no disposition to make insurance against the future. The ancient Constitutional practice of this country has been, year by year, to meet the necessities of the year, and so also should it be in the case of the Royal Family. I propose, therefore, that instead of paying £36,000 out of the National Exchequer we should pay £20,000. In Clause 2 of the Bill—if I may refer, for the purpose of explanation and elucidation, to further Amendments—I propose to give effect to my contention by providing that the annual sum which the Trustees hold under the Act shall be distributed in a certain statutory manner and not according to the notion of the father or grandmother. There have been cases in history where Kings have blessed favourite sons and cursed those they thought less of—when the money that the people had given for the support of the Royal Family was wasted on certain members of the Royal Family, while others were left in need. Therefore, I propose that the money should not be distributed according to the temporary wish or whim of the Trustees or anyone else, but that it should be distributed amongst the grandchildren of the Queen so as to relieve them from fear as to whether they will receive it or not. I propose that the eldest Prince shall receive five-twelfths of the £21,000; the second Prince four-twelfths, and the daughters one-twelfth each. In this way we shall guard against anything like a recurrence of that period in history when there was a King's Party and a Prince's Party, as happened in the time of George II., a state of things which might arise if the demise of the Prince of Wales should take place. The inevitable consequence of such a state of things would be that there would be dissensions, and that the Prince would depend upon others for what he received. I say that if this money is to be divided Parliament should say precisely how the division is to be made. Now, why do I fix on this sum of £15,000 to be saved to the public purse? I fix on it because it is almost exactly the sum that is saved at the present moment upon the gifts to the Queen under the Act of 1837. The Report of the Committee shows that between £15,000 and £16,000 a year, which is given for specific purposes, has not been applied to those purposes, but has been, instead, paid into the Privy Purse of the Queen and become her private property. So long as this £15,000 a year is saved, the Government have no right to come to this House and ask for a further Grant in aid. When I made my speech the other night I had the misfortune to be followed by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. Gladstone). It was not a misfortune for the House or the country, but it was an extreme misfortune for me, because the right hon. Gentleman's great authority, and influence, and knowledge were all exerted to prove that I was wrong, and that the Government were right. Well, I would put this point—which is extremely germane to the point I am urging—both to the First Lord of the Treasury and the Member for Mid Lothian, that there is no precedent in the whole history of England for the Ministry coming to this House and asking for a grant in aid whilst already the Sovereign had resources.

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): I did not catch the point of the hon. Member.

*MR. STOREY: What I say is, I have looked up authorities, and I find that in this country in the whole of the dealings between the King and his subjects on the matter of grants in aid there has never been an application made without a previous statement on the part of the Crown that the resources were exhausted, and that it was necessary to ask for more money. [A laugh.] I do not understand that laugh.

*MR. GOSCHEN: No such declaration has been made in recent years.

*MR. STOREY: No, and why? I will ask the right hon. Gentleman whether there has been any declaration made in recent years that the Queen had large savings? I want to know whether any declaration was made in 1882 or 1885, when we put questions to the Government on the subject of the savings on the Civil List. We were told that we have not to inquire into that. But I contend there is a necessity for such an inquiry, and that it is no answer to me to say that there has been no such declaration in recent years. It has been done during the whole of the time of the House of Hanover. The practice prevailed in the time of Elizabeth and in the reign of Charles I. I have here evidence to show that in the time of William III. such declaration was made. In the time before William IV. a demand for money for the support of the younger branches of the Royal Family was always preceded by the statement—

"Whereas His Majesty is restrained by the laws now in being from making provision for his younger children."

These were the wise days when the King was not permitted to own property, except such as fell to the State when he died. I submit there is no such statement now, because since that unfortunate Act of 1873, it is not impossible for the head of the State to provide for younger children. What I want to point out is, that the object to be attained is the same. The point of view of the people then was "The king has no more money; give him some more; long live the King." What is the point of view now? The Queen comes to us and confesses through her Ministers that she has enormous sums of money.

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): No.

*MR. STOREY: I suppose that to the right hon. Gentleman £824,000 is not enormous. It is to me. But I will not go into figures. I will say a great sum of money.

*Mr. W. H. SMITH: Not great.

*Mr. STOREY: Well, I should like to have it. I will not even insist on "great." It is not necessary to my argument. I will say the Queen has ample resources.

*Mr. W. H. SMITH: No.

*Mr. STOREY: Well, she has resources. If the right hon. Gentleman will get up and tell me that the Queen has no resources, then, Radical as I am, I will vote for the Grant. The other night I objected to the declaration that this demand is founded upon reason. The right hon. Member for Mid Lothian insisted upon it, and told us he was one of the old-fashioned order who stood upon precedent. I am prepared to state this to-night, and without fear of contradiction, that there never was a precedent in the history of England for an application from the Sovereign to Parliament without a preliminary statement, either in the Message itself or in the speech of a Minister, that the Queen had no resources for the purpose. I hold that the Queen at the present time has resources which she may fairly employ for the purpose in view. I was very much rebuked the other night for having made what was said to be a reckless statement about the savings of the Queen. That rebuke came from the noble Lord the Member for Paddington (Lord R. Churchill), and I must say that such an accusation comes with admirable grace from one whose name in the Parliament of 1880 was a synonym for all recklessness of speech and act. I make the same contention now. Until this £824,000 is exhausted there is not, according to the Constitution or precedent, any right in the Crown or any propriety in Ministers to come down to the House and ask for further Grants.

*Mr. SYDNEY GEDGE (Stockport): I rise to order. The hon. Gentleman is arguing that there should be no Grant at all, whereas the question before the Committee is the reduction of the Vote to Chancellor of the Exchequer, when I raised this point the other night, told me, if I looked at the Act of 1837, I should find a distinct declaration that the whole sum of £385,000, clear and certain income, had to be paid to Her Majesty. I have read the Act over and over again, and although I am no lawyer, or because I am no lawyer, I can read the common sense of the Act, and I say there is no such statement whatever in it. First, I must tell the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that Parliament did not give the Queen any money whatever. Parliament had had no experience of Her Majesty. If it had it would have been less jealous. But former Parliaments had had experience of former Sovereigns—experience of waste, extravagance, and constant running into debt—and, therefore, when the new Civil List was granted, not one penny was ordered to be paid to Her Majesty, except the sum of £60,000. The whole of the rest of the money was to be paid to trustees. Clause 3 of the Act says, "That for the support of Her Majesty's household, and of the honour and dignity of the Crown, and for the payment of the charges on the first, second, fourth, and sixth classes in the schedule, it is enacted that there shall be granted to Her Majesty during her life a net yearly revenue of £385,000, and the Lord Treasurer or the Commissioners of the Treasury are hereby authorised on and during every succeeding quarter to cause the said yearly revenue to be issued and applied from time to time, monthly, weekly, or otherwise, for the uses and purposes by this Act appointed."

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): The hon. Gentleman has omitted the important words, "Paid to Her Gracious Majesty during her life."

*Mr. STOREY: The right hon. Gentleman cannot suppose I would wilfully omit so obvious a thing as that. There can be no doubt that it is to be paid to Her Majesty during her life.

public funds or in satisfaction of those exceptional charges which, in consequence of her large family and of the considerable families of her children, have come on the Queen. If we had the £824,000 standing in the Exchequer, as we should have, there would be none of these demands on Parliament and none of these Debates. The money would have been there to be devoted to Her Majesty and her grandchildren, and we should have been called on for nothing. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, our leader, told me the other night that such a sum as I named could not have produced anything like a sufficient sum for the support of the Queen's grandchildren, and I admit it. The £824,000 or the £400,000 savings on Class 6, which I mentioned, would probably not produce a sum sufficient for the grandchildren. But that was not my contention. I dispute the right of any head of the State in England, under the present Constitution, to take the public money in order to make an accumulation. I say that under the ancient Constitutional principle of England, ever since the present Royal Family came to the Throne—a Constitutional principle which should now be insisted upon—there has been no contention on the part of Parliament that out of the public monies granted to Her Majesty she should be able to accumulate sums. The purpose has always been liberally and loyally to bestow sums on His or Her Majesty for the time being, with the intent that they should not be hoarded but Royally spent in supporting the dignity of the country and the honour of the Royal Family. On that ground I object to these accumulations, and make it my argument that, until this £15,000 or £16,000 a year is accounted for, and the £824,000 which has grown out of the accumulation of this £15,000 or £16,000 a year for 40 or 50 years are expended and accounted for, there does not remain in the Crown or its Ministers a right to come to the Representatives of the people and ask for more money. Now I have carried the argument so far, but, entertaining the objection that I still entertain, I do not pretend to state to the House that if they accept my Amendment, that will make the proposal of the Government more palatable to me. I think the original proposal was bad. I think my proposal a little better and therefore I am ready to accept a compromise. If I cannot get what I want, I will accept a compromise. But I do not say that the proposal will then be more palatable to me than it is now. I am, however, willing that £21,000 should be given instead of £36,000, simply for the sake of peace. I have now stated to the House as clearly as I could my contention that the savings on the Civil List under the Act should not go to the Crown or the Crown's Privy Purse, but should be retained by the First Lord of the Treasury and the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and if expended at all should be expended under the direct orders of Parliament. And I have endeavoured to support that contention by showing that the Act reads so, and that the purposes of the Act should be carried out. If I had that view before, I have been fortified ten-fold in my idea of its truth by reading the terms of the Bill now put into our hands. I can point out to the Committee that Clause 2 of this Bill, for the first time in the history of England since these Grants have been made, states that the Trustees shall hold the annual sum granted under the Act, and any accumulations of that fund. Why is that inserted in the Bill? I will tell the House it is inserted because under the stress of the discussions of last week, the Government recognise that under the Act of 1837 they had no such power. No such power exists in that Act. Therefore they have given the authority in the Bill that the Prince's Trustees should not only have the annual sum, but the accumulated money. I have put my first contention, no doubt, at some length, but still with all the brevity of which I am capable, before the House. I have put it seriously, and if the Front Bench will hold their tongues and let some Gentleman behind them reply to me, I shall be glad to hear any substantial objections to the points I have raised. I beg then, in conclusion, to propose that we should omit the words, "thirty-six," and insert "twenty-one."

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 1, to leave out the word "thirty-six," in order to insert the word "twenty-one."—(Mr. Storey.) to make the provision. The hon. Member still argues the question of savings, although the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian has declared that it is impossible to believe that the Sovereign has saved sufficient to enable her to provide for the children of the Prince of Wales. With regard to the hon. Member's actual Amendment to reduce the amount to be paid to £21,000, the hon. Member first objects to the form in which we propose to deal with the £36,000; he wishes it to be allocated by Parliament in certain fixed proportions. He desires that so many twelfths shall be allotted by Parliament to the sons and so many to the daughters. But the hon. Member not only voted, but told with the hon. Member for Northampton, who strongly contended that Parliament should not interfere at all, and that the whole matter should be left in the hands of the Prince of Wales. Now, the hon. Member entirely discards the view which he previously voted for, and contends that Parliament should retain the matter in its own hands. The hon. Gentleman thinks £36,000 is a great deal too much to grant, and suggests that we should grant £21,000. He would prefer, however, to deal only with the present emergency, and to give £13,000—namely, £10,000 to Prince Albert Victor and £3,000 to the Princess Louise of Wales, leaving the provision for other children to be settled hereafter. He thinks it is a gratuitous piece of profligacy on the part of the Government when they ask for £36,000. Yes; but we have been accused of shabbiness because we departed from our original proposition. Now, what are the facts? What we propose to grant is a sum which, properly arranged, will provide adequate incomes for the children of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales. Hon. Members below the Gangway say this sum of £36,000 is far in excess of the original proposition, and, therefore, ought not to be adopted by zealous guardians of the Public Purse. But hon. Members are in error. The hon. Member thinks it would be better for Parliament to keep the matter in its own hands, and he says this Bill is against precedent; but a Committee was appointed to lay down the principle upon which these Grants should be made in future, and the Committee reported that, in order to avoid repeated applications to Parliament and all these painful Debates, it would be desirable to make one arrangement with the Prince of Wales which should last during the present reign, and to give him a certain sum to provide for all his children, so that when once that matter was settled by Parliament further applications would be unnecessary. It is a question for the House to decide whether a lump sum of £36,000 a year to cover provision for all the Prince's children is a fair equivalent for the offer which was originally made. £21,000 would be as a permanent arrangement far below the mark, and would not supply those annuities which the hon. Member himself is not unprepared to give. Then the hon. Member asks how is the matter to be arranged, and whether there are to be accumulations? The general principle of the plan is that instead of giving a varying amount, which might rise to £49,000 a year, Parliament shall give a permanent Grant of £36,000 to meet all contingencies. In the first year the whole of the £36,000 will not be required. Then the hon. Member asks, will the balance be paid over to His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales? Certainly not. It will be held by the Trustees and invested, and form the basis of annuities, and the basis of dowries for Princesses, or other allowances. The calculation is that this sum of £36,000, if fairly invested during the present reign, will provide for all the children of the Prince of Wales. The suggestion is one which the Government adopted from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, but for which we do not wish to make him specially responsible, for it appears to us, as it appeared to him, that it is an equitable arrangement which will save much trouble to Parliament and much friction, and which will prevent these unseemly questions arising between the Crown and the Commons.

*MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM (Leamark, N.W.): In rising to support the Motion of the hon. Member for Sunderland, I must take exception to the phrase several times used by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He deprecated these "unseemly and painful" Debates. the Government take any steps to have the Committee meet on Tuesday? Otherwise the Committee may meet on Monday and proceed with the Bill before any change is made in the constitution of the Committee. Now there are some Members of the Committee who have paired for the Session, and it can easily be arranged that the Committee shall be supplemented by some of my hon. Friends who are prepared to wait until the end of the Session.

MR. CRAIG (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): There was an agreement at the last meeting of the Committee that Members should only be called together after ample notice, both to allow of time being given to a fair and judicious examination of the Bill and Amendments as well as to allow of Members making their own arrangements. I hope this understanding will be carried out.

MR. CRILLY (Mayo, N.): I hope the Government will resist these attempts at delay. Those hon. Members who have objections to the Bill have had ample time to prepare their Amendments. This Light Railways Bill has been before the House for a considerable period. An attempt is now being made by the hon. Member for Sunderland and his colleagues to defeat the Bill by delays, and I hope the Government will resist such an attempt. If I had my way I would have insisted as one of the new members added to the Committee on Trade on the observance of the notice on the card handed to me to-night in the Post Office, that a meeting of the Committee should be held to-morrow at 1, because the Session is drawing to a close, and if there is any merit in the Bill at all that can only be secured by the Committee proceeding with the Bill strenuously at once. I entirely agree with my right hon. Friend the Lord Mayor of Dublin that as the friends of the Bill have not, perhaps, had time to well consider their Amendments, it is desirable to meet on Tuesday, but I do trust that the Government will resolutely carry the Bill through, disregarding the efforts of my hon. Friends the Members for Sunderland and Cavan, who, I believe, want to kill the Bill for the Session. My desire, and the desire of North Mayo, is that the Bill should pass into law, and little as I like making such appeals, I do make the appeal to the Chief Secretary and the Solicitor General for Ireland to show the strength of their good intentions by using their influence to secure the meeting of the Committee on Tuesday to proceed with the Bill, irrespective of whether my hon. Friends the Members for Sunderland and Cavan have or have not sufficient representation on the Committee, because, so far as I can analyse the disposition of the 15 additional members placed on the Committee, I think they are pretty evenly divided for and against the measure.

MR. PHILIPPS (Lanark, Mid): Is it too late to reconsider the question whether the Bill should be referred to the Committee on Trade at all?

MR. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.): If the Motion is withdrawn do the Government intend that the Committee should proceed with the Bill on Tuesday or not?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir MICHAEL HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): The day for which these Committees are summoned depends not on the Government, but on the Chairman of the Committee. Notices have been given for the Committee to meet to-morrow, but obviously that cannot take place now. If this Motion is withdrawn the result will be, that as the days originally fixed for the meeting of the Committee were Mondays and Thursdays, the Committee would meet pro forma on Monday, and then decide to go on with the consideration of the Bill on Tuesday.

MR. BIGGAR (Cavan, W.): The thing is practically settled in a sensible manner. I understand that the Committee of Selection will try to place upon the Grand Committee a certain number of English Members who are specially interested in the subject, and these will be reasonably prepared to go on with business on Tuesday.

MR. E. HARRINGTON (Kerry, W.): I have not troubled the House for some time, and may be allowed a few words. I wish to put myself right in the position I take. I intend to support the measure, but certainly I do not think that the Radical Members who oppose it are under any animus towards us, and if I were an English Member—

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order, order! The Question is that "to-morrow" stand part of the Question.

Now His Royal Highness has occupied places, the emoluments of which have been added to the £12,000 per annum, and he has been permitted as a Royal Prince to draw large official salaries. The same rule has been followed in the case of the Prince of Wales, who is now colonel of a regiment for which he receives £1,500 per annum. The Duke of Connaught, too, enjoys a high position in the Army, while the Duke of Edinburgh has a high position in the Navy, and both receive large salaries. It seems to me that while we hold that the Princes of the Royal Family should have some adequate provision made for them, we are not prepared to say that they should do nothing for it. I believe that they are anxious to do something for the large sums which they receive, and the object of my Amendment is to recognise that desire on their part, and to provide that in the case of their occupying some place of emolument, the emolument they receive shall be merged in the amount of the annuity voted for them. As I have said before, I have the authority of Mr. Bright for this Amendment. We are told that we are getting more democratic every day. Do not let us go back, and do not let us be behind the Parliament of 1850. At that time there was only a majority of 59 against the proposal of Mr. Bright, and I do trust that this Committee, by the vote which it is about to give, will agree that this is a fair and reasonable proposal which I am making.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 3, after the word "preserve," to insert the words—

"Provided that, in case any son of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales shall at any time be in receipt of any sum or sums of money by way of salary or emolument attached to any office, place, or employment he may hold under the Crown, the whole amount of such sum or sums so received shall be deducted from the annual amount now granted, so long as the said salary or emolument shall be enjoyed."—(Mr. Labouchere.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I will only say a very few words in respect to this Amendment. It will be felt by the House and the country that it is very much to the advantage of the House and the nation that the Royal Princes should be employed in the Public Service, and they should be paid those sums which are befitting for the posts they occupy, and which, so far as I know, very rarely exceed the expense to which officers are put in the discharge of their duties. No greater misfortune could happen to the country than that these Princes should be induced, from any influence brought to bear on them, not to accept employment in the Public Service, because such employment qualifies them for the higher and more important duties which devolve upon them later in life.

MR. STOREY: Even supposing it is desirable that the Princes should enter the Public Service, why should they be treated differently from other public servants? If they take the pay attached to an office they ought to give up their pensions, in the same way as Ministers and other persons are required to do in the like case. But I join issue with the right hon. Gentleman, and say that, so far from being advantageous, it cannot but be of great disadvantage that those Princes should enter the Public Service. We have seen one Royal Prince after another entering the Public Service, and instead of attaining, after years of great anxiety and labour, the position which other men attain in that way, they are pitched into positions far above their deserts, without any advantage to the country. I am not afraid to give instances. Who believes that the Duke of Edinburgh, if he had been anybody else but a Royal Duke, would have been made an Admiral at the time he obtained that rank? Who believes that the Duke of Connaught, for serving in the second line at Tel-el-Kebir, would have been specially thanked by Parliament if he had not been the Duke of Connaught? For winning the paltry action of Tel-el-Kebir nine General Officers were thanked, about as many as were thanked for winning the Battle of Waterloo. The Duke of Connaught has since received one of the principal commands in India at a salary of about £5,000 a year and huge perquisites, thereby getting a position which ought to have been filled by some worthy veteran; and it may be that even in this House there are worthy veterans who are suffering from the injustice of this system. If the wholesome rule that the pension should be deducted from the salary had operated in the case of His Royal Highness the present Commander-in-Chief of the Army at home we should long ago have had a change that is desirable from many points of view. I do not believe that the addition of Royal personages to the great Services of the country has ever been of any use to the country, but it has many a time been productive of the greatest harm. I, therefore, beg to support the Amendment.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 54; Noes 188.—(Div. List, No. 272.)

It being midnight, the Chairman left the Chair to make his Report to the House.

Mr. Speaker resumed the Chair.

TECHNICAL INSTRUCTION BILL.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

*THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): Sir, I hope the House will pardon me for saying a few words in moving the Second Reading of this Bill. It deals with a question the importance of which is felt in every quarter of the House and in all the industrial centres of this country. We have only to look at the munificent gifts of the City Companies in furtherance of technical education and the enormous efforts that have been made in furtherance of that subject, to see the vast interest which is felt in the subject. This Bill is the outcome of the efforts to solve difficulties at which we have been labouring for two years, and it is because we have failed to reconcile the interests of Board and Voluntary Schools that I propose the Bill in its present form. The Bill is simple in its character, and is to give the Local Authority power to rate for the purpose of technical education. The Local Authorities will be the County Councils, the Borough Councils, and Urban and Rural Sanitary Authorities. It also provides two limitations which hon. Members will observe in the early part of the Bill. The first limit is in regard to pupils receiving instruction in the obligatory and standard subjects in elementary and primary schools, and the other has reference to the maximum rate which may be levied under it. I do beg hon. Members to remember that on my side of the House, at all events, there is very grave objection indeed to increasing local burdens. For myself, I believe, having studied the question, that an enormous amount of good will be done under this Bill in furthering technical education, if only to the extent of a penny rate. There is an important proviso in Clause 31, which provides that the Local Authority may appoint a Committee for the purpose of working out this plan. The Committee is to consist wholly or partly of members of the Local Authority. Of course, it is right that this Local Authority should be represented in the interests of the ratepayers; but it is hoped, if this Bill become law, that this Local Committee will also be composed of members who are strongly interested in technical education in our industrial centres and large towns. This Local Committee would be also empowered to appoint sub or minor Committees to carry out all the purposes of the Act; that is to say, where the Local Authority decides to take over any existing schools, or institutions, or science schools for the purpose of this Act, for it is desired, where possible, to avoid any expenditure on new buildings. I apprehend that this system of Committees will work in this way—that where the Local Authorities decide to apply this Act in regard to any institution, that such institution will be strongly represented on the Local Committee, which will really combine the representatives of the ratepayers and the Local Committee of Managers for the purpose of carrying out the objects of the technical school or institution. Where the Bill is applied to a Board or Voluntary School for the purpose of establishing evening technical schools or classes, I apprehend that the managers of the Board School and voluntary school will be represented on the Local Committee. I should like to put in a very earnest plea on behalf of this Bill, if only for the enormous impetus it must give for the introduction of evening continuation schools and classes in this country. I believe that the course of instruction which this Bill will initiate will be most popular, and that the evening schools and classes in our large industrial centres will be of enormous advantage to the various schemes of technical education. I know that one objection which will be made to this proposal is that it does not cover the whole ground, and that it does not deal with technical education in elementary schools. If hon. Members read the Report of the Royal Commission and the very careful Report of the London School Board, they will find that the curriculum in those schools is such as to leave very little available time for technical instruction, and this margin will be still further reduced by certain provisions of the New Code, which have been temporarily withdrawn, but which I hope will come into active operation next year. One other objection, I am aware, will be raised—that the Bill does not make the School Board the Rating Authority. I am prepared to say at once that any such proposal would be fatal to this Bill. It would be to again tread upon ground which had already proved so hazardous in endeavouring to promote the solution of this difficult and interesting question. If the School Board were to be the Rating Authority under this Bill, something like 9,000,000 of the population of England and Wales who are not hope hon. Members opposite will be merciful to us in regard to it. This question has now been before the House for two years, and I would remind the House, for example, that we have lately dealt with the question of intermediate education in Wales to the satisfaction of both sides of the House, and, Sir, I would say to hon. Members who feel strongly on the question of School Boards that in that Bill we have introduced the principle of a regular authority for educational purposes entirely outside the scope of the School Boards. I will not further detain the House, and will only commend the measure to the earnest consideration of the House in the hope that it may be so dealt with as to become a sound and beneficial measure.

*Mr. DIXON (Birmingham, Edgbaston): Considering the interest I have for many years taken in this question, I hope the House will allow me the opportunity of stating the reasons why I feel compelled to oppose this measure.

This is an Amendment that is obviously necessary in the public safety, and can, I think, give rise to no dispute. I have been, I may mention to your Lordships, delaying the progress of another Bill amending the Merchant Shipping Act of 1854—that which bears the title of “The Advance Notes to Seamen Bill,” which has already been through a Grand Committee—for the purpose of putting the clauses which are now contained in that Bill into this Bill, and thereby avoiding having two Bills amending the same Act passing through at the same time. I propose, if your Lordships give this Bill a Second Reading, to refer it to the Committee which deals with Bills relating to law. I now beg to move that this Bill be read a second time.

Bill read 2<sup>a</sup> (according to order), and committed to the Standing Committee for Bills relating to Law, &c.

POOR LAW BILL (No. 195.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

*LORD BALFOUR: I ask your Lordships to allow me to move this Bill on behalf of the noble Lord, Viscount Torrington. It is not by any means a long Bill or one difficult to understand. The first clause has reference to making certain provision for the case of children who, having been deserted by their parents, are brought up at the expense of the Guardians of the Poor. At the present time there is no sufficient or adequate protection for the interests of the children against being handed over to the care of their relatives or guardians if those relatives or guardians are obviously unfit to take charge of them. This Bill in no sense goes over the same ground as that which was the subject of discussion in your Lordships' House a few days ago, because before this Bill takes effect it is a condition precedent that the child concerned must be deserted by the parent, or must have been the subject of an immoral assault. The object of the first clause of the Bill is to extend the legal protection of the Guardians in the case of boys until they are 16 years of age, and in the case of girls until they are 18 years of age. There is obvious reason, in the case of girls, why the protection should be extended a year or two longer at that dangerous age. Your Lordships will, I think, see that there is no likelihood of the Guardians being unduly anxious to maintain the children at the expense of the rates if those who would otherwise have to maintain them are of sufficient character to discharge their duty; but, if any dispute arises, there are provisions in this clause whereby a Court of Summary Jurisdiction may decide between the parties upon any case brought before them. The second clause of the Bill codifies, and in some respects simplifies, the conditions under which money can be borrowed for permanent works by Poor Law Authorities, subject, of course, always to the discretion and approval of the Local Government Board. The third clause of the Bill entitles the Asylums Board to receive patients who are suffering from diphtheria. According to the present state of the law, they can receive patients suffering from smallpox or fever, and a legal difficulty has been raised as to whether diphtheria properly comes under the term “fever.” Another clause of the Bill entitles the Asylums Board to let for hire ambulances for taking patients who are suffering from fever from one place to another, even although they are not going to the hospitals under the Asylums Board. It is obviously for the public advantage that carriages which are used for fever patients should be used for no other purpose, and the ratepayers will not be in any way put to undue expense, if, as is provided by this Bill, the Asylums Board make reasonable charges for the services which they thus render. The Bill contains no other provisions than those which I have mentioned, and I ask your Lordships to read it a second time.

Moved, “That the Bill be now read 2<sup>a</sup>.”

*LORD NORTON: My Lords, I cannot pretend to know anything about this Bill, which has just come from the Commons, but I think the noble Lord should make a little further explanation. It seems to me that Bills on the same subject are started by different persons, some by Government and some by individual philanthropists or theorists of various kinds in the Lower House, while that House is occupied, or at least excited by more attractive subjects, and passed with very little connection or correspondence one with another. Here is a Bill, the first clause of which gives the Guardians power to deal with deserted children, and to take care of them till the age of 16 and 18. It seems to have occurred to the noble Lord who moved the Second Reading that this stands much on the same ground with another Bill now before us, called the Bill for the Better Protection of Children, which enables a Court of Justice to hand over a child abandoned by his parents to relations or to persons to take charge of it. The noble Lord said the two Bills were distinct, because in the Bill for the Better Protection of Children, or as it was first called the "Cruelty to Children Prevention Bill," the condition precedent was abandonment by the parent, whereas the condition precedent in this Bill is desertion by the parent. So far as there is a difference between abandonment and desertion, I do see some little distinction; but it really does seem to me that the Bills are so much of the same nature that they ought to be embodied in one measure. If the law on a subject of this sort is scattered about in different statutes, it is most confusing to Magistrates. Moreover, I would ask the noble Lord whether the Poor Law at this moment does not provide for Boards of Guardians taking charge of deserted children. I would also ask the noble Lord what would become of those children of whom the Boards of Guardians take charge, when they turn them out of doors? There is no provision whatever for the care of the children, or the placing them out in industries, or the putting them in the way of earning their livelihood. The method adopted by this Bill is similar to that which is contained in the other Bill before your Lordships at this moment—namely, that if there is found out to have been a total mistake the Magistrate may hand the child back to his parents. That is a very rough way of dealing. But what I think most important is for the noble Lord to say why these two Bills are not incorporated together into duced by the Government and the other by some philanthropic individual in the Lower House; but they certainly deal with the same subject, and there is a very great mischief in having two Bills on the same subject.

*LORD BALFOUR: I can only speak again by the indulgence of the House; but in answer to the question the noble Lord has raised, I can assure him that there is really no comparison at all between this Bill and The Adoption of Children Bill to which he refers. That Bill is not before Parliament just now, having been either withdrawn from the cognisance of or rejected by this House. I am not quite sure which; but that Bill proceeded entirely upon different lines.

*LORD NORTON: I beg the noble Lord's pardon, but the Bill I referred to was intituled The Cruelty to Children Prevention Bill, and is now intituled The Protection of Children Bill.

*LORD BALFOUR: This Bill is entirely different from that one, and has nothing at all to do with it, and does not cover the same ground. The noble Lord is under a misapprehension when he says that the law at the present time is adequate. The law at the present time is this: that no matter what has been the condition of the parent, no matter how completely a parent has deserted a child or left it to the charge of the Poor Law Authorities, the parent can at any time come to the Poor Law Authorities and claim that the child shall be handed over to him. Numerous instances occur of this sort of thing happening: a disolute parent absolutely deserts his child and it is maintained for years by the Board of Guardians at the expense of the ratepayers; as soon as that boy or girl comes to be of an age when his or her labour may be of use to the parent, or when in some way or other the parent can make money out of the child, then the parent comes to the Board of Guardians and demands that the child should be restored to him. Now, I venture to think that that is an obviously wrong and unfair thing in the interests of the child and in the interests of the State. If parents voluntarily discharge themselves of their obligations, and desert their children for a long period of years, and re-to make the provision. The hon. Member still argues the question of savings, although the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian has declared that it is impossible to believe that the Sovereign has saved sufficient to enable her to provide for the children of the Prince of Wales. With regard to the hon. Member's actual Amendment to reduce the amount to be paid to £21,000, the hon. Member first objects to the form in which we propose to deal with the £36,000; he wishes it to be allocated by Parliament in certain fixed proportions. He desires that so many twelfths shall be allotted by Parliament to the sons and so many to the daughters. But the hon. Member not only voted, but told with the hon. Member for Northampton, who strongly contended that Parliament should not interfere at all, and that the whole matter should be left in the hands of the Prince of Wales. Now, the hon. Member entirely discards the view which he previously voted for, and contends that Parliament should retain the matter in its own hands. The hon. Gentleman thinks £36,000 is a great deal too much to grant, and suggests that we should grant £21,000. He would prefer, however, to deal only with the present emergency, and to give £13,000—namely, £10,000 to Prince Albert Victor and £3,000 to the Princess Louise of Wales, leaving the provision for other children to be settled hereafter. He thinks it is a gratuitous piece of profligacy on the part of the Government when they ask for £36,000. Yes; but we have been accused of shabbiness because we departed from our original proposition. Now, what are the facts? What we propose to grant is a sum which, properly arranged, will provide adequate incomes for the children of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales. Hon. Members below the Gangway say this sum of £36,000 is far in excess of the original proposition, and, therefore, ought not to be adopted by zealous guardians of the Public Purse. But hon. Members are in error. The hon. Member thinks it would be better for Parliament to keep the matter in its own hands, and he says this Bill is against precedent; but a Committee was appointed to lay down the principle upon which these Grants should be made in future, and the Committee reported that, in order to avoid repeated applications to Parliament and all these painful Debates, it would be desirable to make one arrangement with the Prince of Wales which should last during the present reign, and to give him a certain sum to provide for all his children, so that when once that matter was settled by Parliament further applications would be unnecessary. It is a question for the House to decide whether a lump sum of £36,000 a year to cover provision for all the Prince's children is a fair equivalent for the offer which was originally made. £21,000 would be as a permanent arrangement far below the mark, and would not supply those annuities which the hon. Member himself is not unprepared to give. Then the hon. Member asks how is the matter to be arranged, and whether there are to be accumulations? The general principle of the plan is that instead of giving a varying amount, which might rise to £49,000 a year, Parliament shall give a permanent Grant of £36,000 to meet all contingencies. In the first year the whole of the £36,000 will not be required. Then the hon. Member asks, will the balance be paid over to His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales? Certainly not. It will be held by the Trustees and invested, and form the basis of annuities, and the basis of dowries for Princesses, or other allowances. The calculation is that this sum of £36,000, if fairly invested during the present reign, will provide for all the children of the Prince of Wales. The suggestion is one which the Government adopted from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, but for which we do not wish to make him specially responsible, for it appears to us, as it appeared to him, that it is an equitable arrangement which will save much trouble to Parliament and much friction, and which will prevent these unseemly questions arising between the Crown and the Commons.

*MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.): In rising to support the Motion of the hon. Member for Sunderland, I must take exception to the phrase several times used by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He deprecated these "unseemly and painful" Debates. What, I should like to know, is there of a painful nature connected with these discussions? Laying aside all cant, so far as it is possible to do so in any assembly of men, I try to look at the question on its own merits, and I think the word "painful" does not at all apply to this question. The Kings and Queens of this country are not Kings and Queens in the ordinary sense. They are the creatures of Parliament. Parliament placed them on the Throne, and has from the beginning regulated the amount of money which they are to take from the country; and in an extreme case, I presume that Parliament could unmake them altogether. I am, therefore, unable to understand the introduction of the phrase as applied to the discussion of the question as to whether the Grant should be £36,000 or £21,000. I do not intervene, as the House well knows, for the purpose of wasting time. I must say that this question of whether we should give a few thousands more or less to the grandchildren of the Queen is not to my mind a question of very great importance. I do not think the British exchequer will suffer greatly from the Grant of £15,000 more or less; but, I do hold again, in direct opposition to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that, rightly or wrongly, the working classes of the country take a very great interest in this question. The Chancellor of the Exchequer does not, I think, include a large number of the working classes in his constituency; but I think I understood him to say that the working classes generally are not averse to these Grants in principle. Well, it is a very curious thing if that is so, seeing the attitude that has been taken by so many of my hon. Friends who are undoubted representatives of working class constituencies. I appeal to them, and they can testify to the undoubted feeling of the working classes against the whole principle of these Grants. For further corroboration I would draw the attention of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to the votes of confidence received by the hon. Member for the Rhondda Division (Mr. Abraham), and he has spoken in this House on this subject in the name of his constituents. The Chancellor of the Exchequer disavows very strongly all that the hon. Member for Rhondda has said; but I do not admit his claim to be a better exponent of the wishes of the working classes of the United Kingdom than the hon. Member of the miners of Wales. However, leaving this aside, and coming more to what I have alleged before, that, rightly or wrongly, there is a strong feeling against these Grants, I may say we have often seen millions voted with more celerity than this sum will be granted, and I attribute this to the fact, and I know that it is a point of view in which I shall not get many Members to agree with me—I attribute it to the fact that large bodies of the working classes of the kingdom have got to dissociate themselves from these demands for ironclads, for armies, or for official expenditure; their interests do not seem to be touched by these matters, but this question somehow seems to them of great importance. Their attention is much directed to it, and undoubtedly in almost every part of the kingdom very strong expressions of opinion have been given in regard to it. Some very memorable words fell from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian in reference to this subject; so memorable that I venture to trouble the House with a repetition of them, for it almost seemed as if a revelation had descended upon the right hon. Gentleman, a revelation that I, for one, hail with exceeding joy, and I hope it will be confirmed and pressed inside and outside the House. The broad difference, the right hon. Gentleman said, between members of the Royal Family and other men of gigantic wealth, is that while in the case of the Royal Family large means are associated and even tied to the discharge of public duties, in the case of other wealthy men in the country, they are under no such obligation except to their own consciences. Very memorable words for an ex-Prime Minister; very memorable words from the Leader of the popular Party. I, for one, never have attacked the Queen or any Member of the Royal Family outside the House, and I do not come here, therefore, with any nauseous pretensions of sham loyalty.

THE CHAIRMAN: I must remind the hon. Member that the Question is that £36,000 stand part of the clause.

*MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: Certainly, Sir, I bow to your reminder. The question is whether we shall grant the smaller or the larger sum for the maintenance of the Royal State and the performance of their duties. I was about to urge, and I hope I shall not

Inspector supported by Fagan's solicitor accordingly applied that this case should likewise be adjourned. The Magistrates sitting on the Bench unanimously granted it. There is no foundation for the allegation contained in the second paragraph.

COLOUR BLINDNESS AMONG SEAMEN.

DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether it is the case, as recently stated in the Daily News, that Government have appointed a Departmental Committee to investigate the subject of colour blindness among the seamen of the Mercantile Marine; and, if this be so, whether the Report of the Committee will be laid upon the Table of the House before the end of this Session?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): The Board of Trade have referred the subject of colour blindness among seamen to a Departmental Committee, which will have scientific assistance in its inquiries into the matter. It will not be possible for the Report of the Committee to be laid on the Table of the House before the end of this Session.

DR. FARQUHARSON: I beg to give notice that I will take an early opportunity next Session of calling attention to this question, and to one or two other important questions connected with the Mercantile Marine.

'MR. CECIL ROCHE, R.M.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he has yet seen the reports in the Cork and Kerry papers of the proceedings at Killarney Court-house whilst a case was at hearing, during which Mr. Moriarty, the defendant's solicitor, was turned out of Court by Mr. Cecil Roche, Resident Magistrate; if he will state whether District Inspector Gray had any right to interpose a statement as to what a policeman told him, before the defendant's solicitor had finished with the witness; whether the latter was right in objecting to the Inspector doing so; was Mr. Roche, the Magistrate, right in preventing Mr. Moriarty from making this objection; and, in view of the circumstances of the case, will he order full inquiries to be made into the whole proceedings?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The newspapers do not, I understand, contain a full report of these proceedings. There were two solicitors for the defence—Mr. Colles and Mr. Moriarty. The witness was at the time of the incident not in the hands of either of these solicitors, but in the hands of the District Inspector who was prosecuting. The District Inspector was obliged to state his reasons for requesting that the witness's words should be taken down verbatim, and was proceeding to do so, when Mr. Moriarty interrupted him in a most violent manner, and continued to do so, although warned by the presiding Magistrate that the District Inspector was addressing the Court, and was perfectly in order. Mr. Moriarty defied the order of the Court, and was accordingly removed.

MR. FLYNN: Was not Mr. Moriarty within his legal right in objecting to the District Inspector interposing a statement during the examination of a witness?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Mr. Moriarty may have been justified in making observations upon the action of the District Inspector, but what he was not justified in doing was, when the Court ruled that the Inspector was in order, in persisting in violently interrupting the proceedings.

MR. FLYNN: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman if Mr. Cecil Roche is a magistrate of "whose legal knowledge and experience the Lord Lieutenant is satisfied."

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Yes, Sir; that is so.

ARMY CONTRACTS.

MR. HANBURY (Preston): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether Captain Stackpool paid an unexpected visit to Lincoln Barracks on 17th July, and when the contractor brought the meat into barracks examined and condemned it; what was the name of the contractor and the price per pound of the meat; what penalty is inflicted on the contractor in such cases; and whether, a contractor having undertaken to supply good meat at a certain price, the authorities have the power, and exercise it, to purchase meat of the proper quality and charge him with the difference?

for £40,000, than the Government at once threw over all their calculations and said "Yes, by all means let us make it £36,000"—a figure for which I am bound to say my right hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lothian adduced no sort of reason, and if he had I should have advanced reasons for a further reduction. Now, I take this sum of £21,000, and I find it would enable the Prince to give his eldest son £10,000 a year, his second son £5,000 a year, and his daughters £2,000 a year, which would be very handsome incomes for them all. We live in an age when the worship of the Golden Calf is getting daily more scandalous. We have all sorts of Nitrate kings and men who have become rich—Heaven knows how—becoming the darlings of Society. [Interruption.] Have hon. Gentlemen got shares in the Nitrate kingdom? These people raise the level of expenditure, spread abroad their wealth, and get somebody to invite people to their entertainments. [Interruption; Cry of "Question."] I know how the Nitrate shares were divided. But these worshippers of the Golden Calf are persons with whom I have no sort of sympathy. I think we might take this opportunity of establishing the principle that there is a family for whom we entertain great respect, and it is not necessary to command that respect that they should be excessively rich. I was reading the other day some letters of Sir William Temple. ["Divide!"] I may tell the hon. Member opposite that Sir W. Temple was a gentleman who lived in the time of Charles II., and he was sent over by Charles as Ambassador to Holland. In one of his letters he mentions that he went to visit the Grand Pensionary of Holland. ["Question!"] The hon. Gentleman says "Question!" How can I cope with such ignorance as that? I do not profess to be among the Gods, but the hon. Member reminds me of what Goethe says: "Against stupidity the Gods fight in vain." But to return to my Grand Pensionary. Sir W. Temple called upon the Grand Pensionary, and found him living upon the third storey with a single maid to look after him and open his door. Sir W. Temple contrasted the dignity and real importance of the Grand Pensionary living like that with the tinsel, gaud, and wretched position in Europe of his own master Charles II. I cite this instance to show that it is not necessary to endow heads of families or of States with large possessions in order that they may be regarded with respect. I think the sum proposed by the hon. Member for Sunderland is amply sufficient for Royalty to live not only in decent comfort but with reasonable splendour, and I shall support the proposal.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I now wish to insert at the end of this clause words which provide practically that if any son of the Prince of Wales is in receipt of any salary or emolument attached to any office, place, or employment under the Crown, the amount so received shall be deducted from the annual amount now granted. I regret to see that those two Kilkenney cats of Unionism—the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham and the noble Lord the Member for Paddington—are not present, because I believe that both of them would have been anxious and eager to support this particular Amendment. The noble Lord the Member for Paddington has been lecturing about the country, and has been prating a good deal about economy, while the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham has claimed to be an old Radical, and to have inherited in some special way the mantles both of Cobden and Bright.

An hon. MEMBER: He is here.

MR. LABOUCHERE: Oh! very well. Then I have no doubt I shall have his support, because this happens to be an Amendment of Mr. Bright's. In 1850, as the Committee will no doubt remember, there was a proposal made to grant a sum of £12,000 per annum to the Duke of Cambridge, and on that occasion Mr. Bright put down an Amendment which I have taken for my model, and it is practically the same as the Amendment which stands in my name. Mr. Bright said this—

"Let us at least arrange that this annuity of £12,000 shall be all that the Duke shall receive in all circumstances. Many persons in receipt of pensions have allowed them to be merged in the salaries of their offices, and why should not this principle be applied to the Duke of Cambridge?"

Now His Royal Highness has occupied places, the emoluments of which have been added to the £12,000 per annum, and he has been permitted as a Royal Prince to draw large official salaries. The same rule has been followed in the case of the Prince of Wales, who is now colonel of a regiment for which he receives £1,500 per annum. The Duke of Connaught, too, enjoys a high position in the Army, while the Duke of Edinburgh has a high position in the Navy, and both receive large salaries. It seems to me that while we hold that the Princes of the Royal Family should have some adequate provision made for them, we are not prepared to say that they should do nothing for it. I believe that they are anxious to do something for the large sums which they receive, and the object of my Amendment is to recognise that desire on their part, and to provide that in the case of their occupying some place of emolument, the emolument they receive shall be merged in the amount of the annuity voted for them. As I have said before, I have the authority of Mr. Bright for this Amendment. We are told that we are getting more democratic every day. Do not let us go back, and do not let us be behind the Parliament of 1850. At that time there was only a majority of 59 against the proposal of Mr. Bright, and I do trust that this Committee, by the vote which it is about to give, will agree that this is a fair and reasonable proposal which I am making.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 3, after the word "preserve," to insert the words—

"Provided that, in case any son of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales shall at any time be in receipt of any sum or sums of money by way of salary or emolument attached to any office, place, or employment he may hold under the Crown, the whole amount of such sum or sums so received shall be deducted from the annual amount now granted, so long as the said salary or emolument shall be enjoyed."—
(Mr. Labouchere.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I will only say a very few words in respect to this Amendment. It will be felt by the House and the country that it is very much to the advantage of the House and the nation that the Royal Princes should be employed in the Public Service, and they should be paid those sums which are befitting for the posts they occupy, and which, so far as I know, very rarely exceed the expense to which officers are put in the discharge of their duties. No greater misfortune could happen to the country than that these Princes should be induced, from any influence brought to bear on them, not to accept employment in the Public Service, because such employment qualifies them for the higher and more important duties which devolve upon them later in life.

MR. STOREY: Even supposing it is desirable that the Princes should enter the Public Service, why should they be treated differently from other public servants? If they take the pay attached to an office they ought to give up their pensions, in the same way as Ministers and other persons are required to do in the like case. But I join issue with the right hon. Gentleman, and say that, so far from being advantageous, it cannot but be of great disadvantage that those Princes should enter the Public Service. We have seen one Royal Prince after another entering the Public Service, and instead of attaining, after years of great anxiety and labour, the position which other men attain in that way, they are pitched into positions far above their deserts, without any advantage to the country. I am not afraid to give instances. Who believes that the Duke of Edinburgh, if he had been anybody else but a Royal Duke, would have been made an Admiral at the time he obtained that rank? Who believes that the Duke of Connaught, for serving in the second line at Tel-el-Kebir, would have been specially thanked by Parliament if he had not been the Duke of Connaught? For winning the paltry action of Tel-el-Kebir nine General Officers were thanked, about as many as were thanked for winning the Battle of Waterloo. The Duke of Connaught has since received one of the principal commands in India at a salary of about £5,000 a year and huge perquisites, thereby getting a position which ought to have been filled by some worthy veteran; and it may be that even in this House there are worthy veterans who are suffering from the injustice of this system. If the wholesome rule that the pension should be deducted from the salary had operated in the case of His Royal Highness the present Commander-in-Chief of the Army at home we should long ago have had a change that is desirable from many points of view. I do not believe that the addition of Royal personages to the great Services of the country has ever been of any use to the country, but it has many a time been productive of the greatest harm. I, therefore, beg to support the Amendment.

The Committee divided :—Ayes 54 ; Noes 188.—(Div. List, No. 272.)

Mr. Speaker resumed the Chair.

Resolution reported—

"That it is expedient to authorise the payment, out of moneys to be provided by Parliament, of all costs, charges, and expenses incurred by the Postmaster General in carrying into effect any Act of the present Session, to authorise the transfer of the site of the Cold-bath Fields Prison, in the County of Middlesex, to Her Majesty's Postmaster General."

MARRIAGES (BASUTOLAND, &c.) BILL [LORDS]. (No. 352.)

As amended, considered; to be read the third time to-morrow.

TECHNICAL INSTRUCTION BILL.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

*THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): Sir, I hope the House will pardon me for saying a few words in moving the Second Reading of this Bill. It deals with a question the importance of which is felt in every quarter of the House and in all the industrial centres of this country. We have only to look at the munificent gifts of the City Companies in furtherance of technical education and the enormous efforts that have been made in furtherance of that object, to see the vast interest which is felt in the subject. This Bill is the outcome of the efforts to solve difficulties at which we have been labouring for two years, and it is because we have failed to reconcile the interests of Board and Voluntary Schools that I propose the Bill in its present form. The Bill is simple in its character, and is to give the Local Authority power to rate for the purpose of technical education. The Local Authorities will be the County Councils, the Borough Councils, and Urban and Rural Sanitary Authorities. It also provides two limitations which hon. Members will observe in the early part of the Bill. The first limit is in regard to pupils receiving instruction in the obligatory and standard subjects in elementary and primary schools, and the other has reference to the maximum rate which may be levied under it. I do beg hon. Members to remember that on my side of the House, at all events, there is very grave objection indeed to increasing local burdens. For myself, I believe, having studied the question, that an enormous amount of good will be done under this Bill in furthering technical education, if only to the extent of a penny rate. There is an important proviso in Clause 31, which provides that the Local Authority may appoint a Committee for the purpose of working out this plan. The Committee is to consist wholly or partly of members of the Local Authority. Of course, it is right that this Local Authority should be represented in the interests of the ratepayers; but it is hoped, if this Bill become law, that this Local Committee will also be composed of members who are strongly interested in technical education in our industrial centres and large towns. This Local Committee would be also empowered to appoint sub or minor Committees to carry out all the purposes of the Act; that is to say, where the Local Authority decides to take over any existing schools, or institutions, or science schools for the purpose of this Act, for it is desired, where possible, to avoid any expenditure on new buildings. I apprehend that this system of Committees will work in this way—that where the Local Authorities decide to apply this Act in regard to any institution, that such institution will be strongly represented on the Local Committee, which will really combine the representatives of the ratepayers and the Local Committee of Managers for the purpose of carrying out the objects of the technical school or institution. Where the Bill is applied to a Board or Voluntary School for the purpose of establishing evening technical schools or classes, I apprehend that the managers of the Board School and voluntary school will be represented on the Local Committee. I should like to put in a very earnest plea on behalf of this Bill, if only for the enormous impetus it must give for the introduction of evening continuation schools and classes in this country. I believe that the course of instruction which this Bill will initiate will be most popular, and that the evening schools and classes in our large industrial centres will be of enormous advantage to the various schemes of technical education. I know that one objection which will be made to this proposal is that it does not cover the whole ground, and that it does not deal with technical education in elementary schools. If hon. Members read the Report of the Royal Commission and the very careful Report of the London School Board, they will find that the curriculum in those schools is such as to leave very little available time for technical instruction, and this margin will be still further reduced by certain provisions of the New Code, which have been temporarily withdrawn, but which I hope will come into active operation next year. One other objection, I am aware, will be raised—that the Bill does not make the School Board the Rating Authority. I am prepared to say at once that any such proposal would be fatal to this Bill. It would be to again tread upon ground which had already proved so hazardous in endeavouring to promote the solution of this difficult and interesting question. If the School Board were to be the Rating Authority under this Bill, something like 9,000,000 of the population of England and Wales, who are not represented at all upon the School Boards, would be shut out at once from the scope of the Bill. I am not going to detain the House longer. I deeply regret that the time at my disposal is so short, and that I can do so little justice to the subject. But, as regards this question of the School Board, I hope hon. Members opposite will be merciful to us in regard to it. This question has now been before the House for two years, and I would remind the House, for example, that we have lately dealt with the question of intermediate education in Wales to the satisfaction of both sides of the House, and, Sir, I would say to hon. Members who feel strongly on the question of School Boards that in that Bill we have introduced the principle of a regular authority for educational purposes entirely outside the scope of the School Boards. I will not further detain the House, and will only commend the measure to the earnest consideration of the House in the hope that it may be so dealt with as to become a sound and beneficial measure.

*MR. DIXON (Birmingham, Edgbaston): Considering the interest I have for many years taken in this question, I hope the House will allow me the opportunity of stating the reasons why I feel compelled to oppose this measure.

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! I understand the hon. Gentleman to oppose the Bill, and in that case the measure cannot be further proceeded with at the present moment.

some by Government and some by individual philanthropists or theorists of various kinds in the Lower House, while that House is occupied, or at least excited by more attractive subjects, and passed with very little connection or correspondence one with another. Here is a Bill, the first clause of which gives the Guardians power to deal with deserted children, and to take care of them till the age of 16 and 18. It seems to have occurred to the noble Lord who moved the Second Reading that this stands much on the same ground with another Bill now before us, called the Bill for the Better Protection of Children, which enables a Court of Justice to hand over a child abandoned by his parents to relations or to persons to take charge of it. The noble Lord said the two Bills were distinct, because in the Bill for the Better Protection of Children, or as it was first called the "Cruelty to Children Prevention Bill," the condition precedent was abandonment by the parent, whereas the condition precedent in this Bill is desertion by the parent. So far as there is a difference between abandonment and desertion, I do see some little distinction; but it really does seem to me that the Bills are so much of the same nature that they ought to be embodied in one measure. If the law on a subject of this sort is scattered about in different statutes, it is most confusing to Magistrates. Moreover, I would ask the noble Lord whether the Poor Law at this moment does not provide for Boards of Guardians taking charge of deserted children. I would also ask the noble Lord what would become of those children of whom the Boards of Guardians take charge, when they turn them out of doors? There is no provision whatever for the care of the children, or the placing them out in industries, or the putting them in the way of earning their livelihood. The method adopted by this Bill is similar to that which is contained in the other Bill before your Lordships at this moment—namely, that if there is found out to have been a total mistake the Magistrate may hand the child back to his parents. That is a very rough way of dealing. But what I think most important is for the noble Lord to say why these two Bills are not incorporated together into one Bill. I suppose one has been introduced by the Government and the other by some philanthropic individual in the Lower House; but they certainly deal with the same subject, and there is a very great mischief in having two Bills on the same subject.

*LORD BALFOUR: I can only speak again by the indulgence of the House; but in answer to the question the noble Lord has raised, I can assure him that there is really no comparison at all between this Bill and The Adoption of Children Bill to which he refers. That Bill is not before Parliament just now, having been either withdrawn from the cognisance of or rejected by this House. I am not quite sure which; but that Bill proceeded entirely upon different lines.

*LORD NORTON: I beg the noble Lord's pardon, but the Bill I referred to was intituled The Cruelty to Children Prevention Bill, and is now intituled The Protection of Children Bill.

*LORD BALFOUR: This Bill is entirely different from that one, and has nothing at all to do with it, and does not cover the same ground. The noble Lord is under a misapprehension when he says that the law at the present time is adequate. The law at the present time is this: that no matter what has been the condition of the parent, no matter how completely a parent has deserted a child or left it to the charge of the Poor Law Authorities, the parent can at any time come to the Poor Law Authorities and claim that the child shall be handed over to him. Numerous instances occur of this sort of thing happening: a dissolute parent absolutely deserts his child and it is maintained for years by the Board of Guardians at the expense of the ratepayers; as soon as that boy or girl comes to be of an age when his or her labour may be of use to the parent, or when in some way or other the parent can make money out of the child, then the parent comes to the Board of Guardians and demands that the child should be restored to him. Now, I venture to think that that is an obviously wrong and unfair thing in the interests of the child and in the interests of the State. If parents voluntarily discharge themselves of their obligations, and desert their children for a long period of years, and remain of such a character as to make it

*MR. W. H. SMITH: It is intended to take Class IV. of the Estimates on Monday. The hon. Member can therefore form an estimate for himself as to whether it is likely to reach the Pilotage Bill in sufficient time to secure its consideration. I hope that it may be possible.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

PRINCE OF WALES'S CHILDREN BILL.

(No. 358.)

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1.

MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E): I beg to move, in line 5, after "thereof," to insert—

"Or from such sums as may become available from the discontinuance or abolition of offices in Class 2 of the Civil Service List, and which may be at the disposal of Parliament during the present reign."

In moving this Amendment, I shall carefully avoid anything like making a Second Reading speech. It is necessary to explain, however, that the subject of my Amendment has been under the consideration of Parliament for several years, and that my hon. Friend the Member for Dundee (Mr. E. Robertson) has constantly directed attention to several matters connected with the Crown. But the Government have refused to listen to the representations made to them, and now we have the present Bill, which seems to have been drawn for the purpose of foreclosing the Civil List during Her Majesty's reign. I do not begrudge in any way the allowance to Her Majesty or to the Heir Apparent to the Throne; but my complaint is not that £36,000 additional should be granted, but that it should be granted upon the understanding that the Civil List shall remain in statu quo during Her Majesty's reign. I believe that the feeling of the country upon this subject is exceedingly keen, but the irritation which exist is not due to the Grants to Her Majesty and the Prince of Wales for the purpose of maintaining the dignity and splendour of the Monarchy, but to the realisation of the fact that there are around the Throne a number of persons receiving nearly £20,000 a year in pensions, and many thousands of pounds more in salaries, which are attached to sinecure offices. The people will remain dissatisfied with the Civil List until these parasites are removed and the sinecure offices abolished. They protest against paying a number of persons who do no service whatever to the State, and simply live upon the industry of the taxpayers. I am afraid that it will be in vain to attempt to allay this feeling of irritation until the long-promised Committee shall have been appointed and shall have reported. We have no objection to maintain the Monarchy in dignity and splendour, but we do object to maintain it for purposes which we think are pernicious and inimical to the best interests of the State. I beg to move the Amendment.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 5, after the word "thereof," to insert the words—

"Or from such sums as may become available from the discontinuance or abolition of offices in Class 2 of the Civil List, and which may be at the disposal of Parliament during the present reign."—(Mr. Esslemont.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. Goschen, St. George's, Hanover Square): The Government are unable to accept the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman. The purport of the Amendment is that a revision of the Civil List should be undertaken with a view of seeing whether any saving can be made, and if so of applying such saving to an allowance for the Prince of Wales' children. It has been clearly Bill read 2<sup>a</sup> (according to Order), and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

QUESTIONS.

IRELAND—NON-PAYMENT OF POOR RATE.

MR. BLANE (Armagh, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland how many inhabitant householders in Gweedore, County Donegal, who are rated under £4 5s., are objected to in the lists of voters by the clerk of Dunfanaghy Union, by reason of non-payment of poor rate, for which the landlord is liable under the 1st and 2nd Vic., chapter 56, as immediate lessor; if any efforts have been made to obtain payment from the landlords before causing the disfranchisement of the tenants; and, if the Local Government Board will take the matter into consideration?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (MR. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I find that it will take a few days to obtain the information necessary to enable me to answer this question. I must therefore ask the hon. Member to postpone the question until Tuesday, or any subsequent day.

THE OLPHERT ESTATE.

MR. BLANE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland how many tenants there are on the estate of Mr. Wybrants Olphert, County Donegal; how many of these have had a fair rent fixed in Court; and how many have had a fair rent, out of Court, under pressure of circumstances?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I understand that on the estate of Mr. Wybrants Olphert, County Donegal, there are 450 tenants. Of these, 320 have had a fair rent fixed in Court and 40 out of Court. But it appears not under pressure, as alleged. The remaining 90 tenants had served originating notices to have fair rents fixed, but failed to appear when their cases were called in Court.

In reply to a further question by Mr. BLANE,

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said: I do not think that any of the tenants were prevented from appearing by the action of Mr. Olphert.

MR. MAHONY (Meath, N.): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that a number of the tenants have been evicted because they were unable to appear in Court?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No, Sir; and if they have been evicted I am afraid it must have been their own fault.

CHARGE OF ASSAULT AGAINST AN ORANGEMAN.

MR. BLANE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland whether he is aware that a summons was issued on the 22nd day of July 1889, at Keady, in the County of Armagh, wherein a Catholic named Bernard Fagan charged an Orangeman named William Morrison with assaulting and beating him on the evening of the 12th July last, and that at the Petty Sessions held at Keady, in County Armagh, on the 25th instant, Captain Preston, R.M., the presiding Magistrate, refused to hear complainant, although both plaintiff and defendant were present and represented by their respective solicitors; and whether this is the same Captain Preston who was removed some time ago from Armagh for partiality to Messrs Warnock and Bell, who were charged with stabbing two Catholics near Armagh?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It appears that the facts are not accurately represented in the question. The presiding Magistrate did not refuse to hear the complainant. The case in question formed part of other cases in which Fagan was a defendant, and which were unavoidably adjourned. The District

Inspector supported by Fagan's solicitor accordingly applied that this case should likewise be adjourned. The Magistrates sitting on the Bench unanimously granted it. There is no foundation for the allegation contained in the second paragraph.

COLOUR BLINDNESS AMONG SEAMEN.

DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether it is the case, as recently stated in the Daily News, that Government have appointed a Departmental Committee to investigate the subject of colour blindness among the seamen of the Mercantile Marine; and, if this be so, whether the Report of the Committee will be laid upon the Table of the House before the end of this Session?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): The Board of Trade have referred the subject of colour blindness among seamen to a Departmental Committee, which will have scientific assistance in its inquiries into the matter. It will not be possible for the Report of the Committee to be laid on the Table of the House before the end of this Session.

DR. FARQUHARSON: I beg to give notice that I will take an early opportunity next Session of calling attention to this question, and to one or two other important questions connected with the Mercantile Marine.

'MR. CECIL ROCHE, R.M.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he has yet seen the reports in the Cork and Kerry papers of the proceedings at Killarney Court-house whilst a case was at hearing, during which Mr. Moriarty, the defendant's solicitor, was turned out of Court by Mr. Cecil Roche, Resident Magistrate; if he will state whether District Inspector Gray had any right to interpose a statement as to what a policeman told him, before the defendant's solicitor had finished with the witness; whether the latter was right in objecting to the Inspector doing so; was Mr. Roche, the Magistrate, right in preventing Mr. Moriarty from making this objection; and, in view of the circumstances of the case, will he order full inquiries to be made into the whole proceedings?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The newspapers do not, I understand, contain a full report of these proceedings. There were two solicitors for the defence—Mr. Colles and Mr. Moriarty. The witness was at the time of the incident not in the hands of either of these solicitors, but in the hands of the District Inspector who was prosecuting. The District Inspector was obliged to state his reasons for requesting that the witness's words should be taken down verbatim, and was proceeding to do so, when Mr. Moriarty interrupted him in a most violent manner, and continued to do so, although warned by the presiding Magistrate that the District Inspector was addressing the Court, and was perfectly in order. Mr. Moriarty defied the order of the Court, and was accordingly removed.

MR. FLYNN: Was not Mr. Moriarty within his legal right in objecting to the District Inspector interposing a statement during the examination of a witness?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Mr. Moriarty may have been justified in making observations upon the action of the District Inspector, but what he was not justified in doing was, when the Court ruled that the Inspector was in order, in persisting in violently interrupting the proceedings.

MR. FLYNN: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman if Mr. Cecil Roche is a magistrate of "whose legal knowledge and experience the Lord Lieutenant is satisfied."

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Yes, Sir; that is so.

ARMY CONTRACTS.

MR. HANBURY (Preston): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether Captain Stackpool paid an unexpected visit to Lincoln Barracks on 17th July, and when the contractor brought the meat into barracks examined and condemned it; what was the name of the contractor and the price per pound of the meat; what penalty is inflicted on the contractor in such cases; and whether, a contractor having undertaken to supply good meat at a certain price, the authorities have the power, and exercise it, to purchase meat of the proper quality and charge him with the difference?

Mr. A. J. Balfour

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): On the occasion referred to the meat was condemned as bull beef. The contractor was Mr. J. Gillett. It is not customary to state publicly the contract prices; but the price under this contract was about the average.

MR. HANBURY: What is the average?

MR. E. STANHOPE: That is just what it is not customary to state publicly. In this case the contractor is liable for the inspector's travelling expenses and also for any loss incurred in replacing the rejected meat. The authorities do possess and exercise the power referred to in the last clause of the question.

SOCIALIST MEETINGS.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if it is a fact that meetings of Socialists have been suppressed in Archer Street, Westbourne Grove, by the police; if it is a fact that religious meetings are held on the same spot and are not disturbed; if any charge of riot, intimidation, or obstruction has been brought against the promoters of the aforesaid Socialist meetings; and if any of the householders in the district have complained of these meetings?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): I am informed by the Commissioner of Police that two meetings of Socialists were held, or attempted to be held, near Archer Street. As such meetings caused obstruction and disorder in the thoroughfare, the police dispersed the first meeting and moved on those who attempted to hold the second. Small religious meetings, not causing obstruction or disorder, have been held at the same place for years, but latterly I am informed that they have been discontinued owing to the action of the Socialists. The police did not bring any charges against the Socialists, as the meetings dispersed quietly. There has been no complaint from the householders. The police must judge, according to the circumstances of each case, whether obstruction is caused or not.

THE RIVER LEE.

SIR JOHN COLOMB (Tower Hamlets, Bow): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether his attention has been recently drawn to the foul condition of the River Lee, and to the fact that a boy's death from typhoid fever has been ascribed as the result of bathing in this pestilential water; whether the West Ham Corporation or the Lee Conservancy, or both, are to blame; and whether he will at once take steps necessary to enforce the abatement of a great nuisance?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): The Local Government Board yesterday received a letter from the Poplar Board of Works containing a statement to the effect of that in the first part of my hon. Friend's question, but I have no further information as to the facts. I am not in a position to say whether the West Ham Corporation or the Lee Conservancy, or both, are to blame. In the letter of the Poplar Board of Works it is said that the West Ham Corporation are allowing their sewage to flow into the river at all states of the tide, and I will cause inquiries to be made as to this.

CRETE.

MR. SUMMERS (Huddersfield): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he is able to give the House any information with regard to the origin and nature of the disturbances that are reported to have recently taken place in the Island of Crete?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSSON, Manchester, N.E.): The present disturbances in Crete are stated to be due to the quarrels of political factions in the Island. Members of these factions have attacked, and in some cases murdered their rivals, causing panic in unprotected localities, and the flight of defenceless people to the places occupied by their friends. Demands have been made upon the Turkish Government for reforms, and by one party for the removal of the Vali, but there does not appear to be anything amounting to an insurrection against the authority of the Sultan.

money, there must be some close proportion between the services that are rendered and the money that is paid for them. It was not so, I grant, at the commencement of the present reign. Fifty years ago the persons who were the depositories of political power were not shocked at such salaries as those which are paid to the Duke of Portland and Lord Coventry; but 50 years have made a mighty difference. The people have now a voice in the management of affairs, and those who are responsible in matters of this kind would do well to take heed of the warning which has been given them, not only by these Debates, but still more by the significant Divisions which have taken place upon this Bill, and to apply their minds to removing what, in the minds of the great mass of the people, is one of the great objections to Royalty. Hon. Members must remember that the large majority of voters are persons who are paid between 15s. and 35s. a week, and that the great majority of these are at present making less than £1 a week. A man who has to work an hour in order to earn 6d. or 8d. has a realising sense of the value of a penny, and the amount of labour and suffering it represents, which those in a more fortunate position in life cannot appreciate. It is said it is impossible to give effect to this Amendment, for technical reasons, in connection with the supposed compact established by the Civil List Act at the commencement of Her Majesty's reign. I do not think there is much profit or advantage in discussing at this time of day what is the true meaning of the Act establishing the Civil List. But if the framers of that piece of legislation had intended that the savings of Class 2 should go to the Privy Purse, they employed peculiar language for the purpose. If that was the intention, why did not the Act say so? It provides that any surplus may be transferred from one class in aid of another, which seems to imply that it is only to be done when there is less than £385,000 a year. But whatever view we take of these matters, I think it ought not to be beyond the power of Her Majesty's Ministers to provide even at the latest moment for the abolition of offices which throw an unnecessary burden on the taxpayers of the country. I am certain that while the great mass of the people appreciate the advantages of the Monarchical form of Government as it now exists in this country, and are quite prepared to pay all necessary sums for its maintenance, they will nevertheless set their faces against the whole principle of Class 2, against the principle of honorary or titular or nominal offices bestowed upon rich men and highly paid at the expense of the State. Under these circumstances I shall certainly support the Amendment.

MR. WALLACE (Edinburgh, East): I do not think the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury criticised with his usual fairness the language of my hon. Friend when he seemed to charge him with reflecting on the conduct of Her Majesty. If my hon. Friend had done so, he would have been guilty of a transgression which must have brought upon him the censure of the Chair. All my hon. Friend could have meant was that the propositions of Her Majesty's Government were of such a nature that they presented the Sovereign in the aspect referred to. It is perfectly impossible that the Sovereign can be spoken of in a sinister manner by any person with a knowledge of the Constitution. The King can do no wrong. A Constitutional Sovereign, who follows the advice of her Ministers, must always be Constitutionally right. We know that the Ministers have placed the Sovereign in a false position; but, at the same time, I know Her Majesty is in a true and right position, because she is doing whatever she is advised by her Ministers. I rose, however, to offer a humble contribution to the discussion on the argument that the application of the French Government has recently appointed a French Resident and Council at St. Pierre, and whether the right to make such appointments is given under any Treaty; and whether the French Government has the right to let on lease or otherwise dispose of any portion of the so-called French shore of Newfoundland?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: In reply to Paragraph 1 and 2 of the hon. Member's question the Islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon were ceded to France in 1763 in full right, but on the conditions stated, and further in 1783 without those conditions being mentioned, but with the declared purpose of affording harbours of refuge for fishermen. We have heard that some guns are mounted at St. Pierre, and no doubt there is a considerable population. We do not know what is the constitution of the Local Authority; but as these islands are undoubtedly French Territory there must be some such Authority. The only rights ceded to France on the coast of Newfoundland are those of erecting scaffolds and huts for the purpose of catching and drying fish.

COMMON GRAVES AT BOW CEMETERY.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department is he aware that there are in the City of London and Tower Hamlets Cemetery, at Bow, several hundreds of common graves without the proper means of identification (red posts). And, this being a violation of Clause 6a in the Order in Council of 9th September, 1884, does he propose taking legal steps to enforce obedience in this matter?

MR. MATTHEWS: I am informed by the Inspector that he has no reason to doubt that the company are replacing the posts which are from time to time destroyed. The company have from the first experienced great difficulty in keeping the graves properly marked owing to the crowds of persons who trample over the graves at largely attended funerals. I have requested the Inspector to visit the cemetery again at his early convenience, and to report to me on the matter.

CONVEYANCE OF LETTERS BY RAILWAY COMPANIES.

MR. DAVID THOMAS (Merthyr Tydvil): I beg to ask the Postmaster

General whether he can yet state the results of the inquiry of the Departmental Committee appointed early last Session to consider the question of the conveyance by Railway Companies of letters that have not passed through the post; and, whether he has arrived at a satisfactory settlement of the legal difficulties attending the question?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, University of Cambridge): This subject was carefully inquired into by a Departmental Committee who made a Report to me recommending the adoption of arrangements to meet the object in view. As a result of this Report, the Inspector General of Mails has been in communication with the Railway Companies; and as soon as I am in possession of their views, I hope to be able to come to a satisfactory conclusion in the matter.

LOCAL TAXATION LICENSES.

MR. DAVID THOMAS: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether, having regard to the fact that the proceeds of local taxation licenses are handed over to the administrative county in which the licenses are taken out, and not necessarily to the county in which the licensee resides, he will afford facilities for the issuing of such licenses by post offices that are not money order offices, so as far as possible to enable persons to obtain them near their residences, and within the counties in which they live, and towards the rates of which they may be contributing?

*MR. RAIKES: Such a course as the hon. Member proposes would be really equivalent to altering the rank of the smaller post offices. This would, I fear, involve considerable expense, as bonds would have to be given and daily accounts instituted. But I am willing to investigate the matter further before arriving at a final decision.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR REPORTS.

MR. THOMAS E. ELLIS (Merionethshire): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether there exists in the Foreign Office a subject-index of the published Reports from Her Majesty's Diplomatic and Consular Officers abroad on subjects of commercial and general interest, and on the manufactures, commerce, &c. of the Consular districts; and, if so, whether a copy could be placed in the Library of the House?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: We do not possess such an index; but a very industrious member of the office has been for some time occupied in the preparation of one. It involves a good deal of work, and I cannot anticipate its speedy completion. The hon. Member will see that a List of the Reports on questions of general interest and their subjects is given with each Report that is published.

MR. T. E. ELLIS: Can the right hon. Gentleman hold out any hope that the Report will be ready before the beginning of next Session?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I will look into the matter. If it can be presented it shall be.

THE NAVAL MANŒUVRES.

MR. TOMLINSON (Preston): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether any part will be taken by the Military Forces in the forthcoming Naval Manœuvres, which may be expected to include a threatened or actual attack on the coasts of the United Kingdom by hostile vessels?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: The Military Forces will not combine with the defending squadrons for the defence of the coast during the manœuvres. Such a combination would carry with it no practical lesson unless the Land Forces were mobilised; and, even if the law gave power for mobilization in a fictitious emergency—which it does not—the expense and disturbance of industry would be far too high a price to pay for such an operation. We hope, nevertheless, to derive considerable instruction from these manœuvres. The Naval Authorities who control the Coast-guard, the actual watchers round the shores of the United Kingdom, will telegraph to the Military Commanders of districts notice of the approach of hostile vessels. These notices will be recorded, as will the steps that would have been taken on the instant if the forces had been mobilised and actual warfare had existed. Much valuable information will be obtained in this way. At the same time, if points are threatened where defensive works exist, and at which a military muster of forces actually on the spot can take place, the firing of a few rounds will be permitted as evidence that the attack is observed and met.

MR. COSSHAM (Bristol, E.): Will the right hon. Gentleman take care that the trade of ports is interfered with as little as possible?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: I am afraid I have no control over the movement of Her Majesty's ships.

MR. TOMLINSON: The right hon. Gentleman has indicated the possibility of the Local Forces taking part in the manœuvres. Will travelling allowances be made?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: No, Sir; there will be no travelling allowances.

GOVERNMENT STOCKS AND POST OFFICE SAVINGS BANKS.

MR. OCTAVIUS V. MORGAN (Battersea): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he is aware that the public are not generally informed of the fact that facilities are given for the purchase of Government Stocks through the agency of the Post Office Savings Bank; and, whether he will give instructions that at every Post Office Savings Bank a permanent notice shall be exhibited in a prominent place that "Government Stocks may be purchased at this Office, and full particulars as to terms of purchase obtained?"

*MR. RAIKES: In reply to the hon. Member's question I have to state that notices are already issued for exhibition at Post Offices giving information as to investments in Government Stocks through the Post Office Savings Bank, but I will consider whether such information can be given in a more conspicuous form.

GREYSTONES HARBOUR.

MR. WILLIAM CORBET (Wicklow, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether his attention has been called to a Report just made by the County Surveyor of Wicklow to the Grand Jury with reference to Greystones Harbour, in which he says:—

"The pier protects the harbour from gales varying from north-east to south-east. Before its construction any shingle that travelled from the north was caused to travel back again by gales from the south-east, but now the pier shelters the beach from these winds, so that it has been raised by successive deposits of shingle, and the accumulation over a large portion of the bed of the harbour is now enormous. . . .

INTERMEDIATE EDUCATION (WALES) BILL.

MR. THOMAS ELLIS: I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether he will direct the preparation of a Welsh version of the measure dealing with Intermediate and Technical Education in Wales; and, if so, whether steps can be taken to have it published well before the date of the commencement of the Act?

SIR W. HART DYKE: I am in communication with the Treasury on the subject, and will see that no time is lost in the production of a Welsh version of the measure in question as soon as it receives the Royal Assent.

THE SHOREDITCH VESTRY.

MR. JAMES STUART (Shoreditch, Hoxton): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is aware that the Chairman of the Shoreditch Vestry, which held a meeting on Tuesday last, when the Chief Secretary for Ireland visited the Shoreditch Town Hall, requested the assistance of the police to protect the members of the Vestry against the aggressive attitude of persons in the crowd; whether six policemen arrived at the Town Hall, in response to the written request of the Chairman of the Vestry and the Vestry Clerk, and were sent away by the Inspector of Police present at the Hall without coming and reporting to the Chairman of the Vestry; and, whether it is or is not the duty of the Metropolitan Police, when called on by a Vestry to protect its members, to afford the protection required?

MR. MATTHEWS: I am informed by the Commissioner of Police that police assistance was asked on the occasion in question, and that, accordingly, six constables were sent. They were not allowed by the Superintendent who was present to go inside the building, but they patrolled outside. These orders were in accordance with usual practice, and I cannot see that the Metropolitan Police failed to afford the required protection.

IRELAND—ALLEGED ORANGE OUT- RAGE IN COUNTY ARMAGH.

MR. BLANE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland whether he has been informed that, on the evening of the 12th July last, a number of Orangemen coming out of an Orange Lodge at Tullynamallogue, near Keady, County Armagh, cursed the Pope, attacked some Catholic boys and girls, and fired guns and revolvers at them; whether Mr. Starkie, the District Inspector, has issued summonses against a number of Catholics, charging them with assaulting William Morris and others of the attacking party on that occasion; and whether any summonses have been issued against the Orange party, who were the aggressors; and whether this is the first time that the Catholics of this district have been prosecuted by the Constabulary for defending themselves when similarly attacked?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Constabulary Authorities report that an affray took place about one mile from Keady, between some Protestants and Roman Catholics on the night of the 12th July. Evidence has been obtained against three of the former and five of the latter, against whom summonses have accordingly been issued for hearing at the next Petty Sessions. No person was summoned for assaulting Morrison, nor am I able to say which party were the aggressors, this being a matter which the Court no doubt will determine. A similar party affray occurred in the Keady district in February last. Members of both sides were prosecuted, and the cases stand adjourned to the middle of this month in order to see how the accused would in the meantime behave themselves.

THE ASHBOURNE ACT.

MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.): I beg to ask if representations had been made to the Government in favour of the extension of Lord Ashbourne's Act to Scotland?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (MR. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): I have received information to the effect that representations have been made to the Secretary for Scotland's Office as to the extension of the Crofters Act in regard to land purchase. Those representations will receive consideration, although I cannot hold out any expectation that it will be in the power of the Government, without the most serious consideration, to extend the

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

PRINCE OF WALES'S CHILDREN BILL.

(No. 358.)

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1.

MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E): I beg to move, in line 5, after "thereof," to insert—

"Or from such sums as may become available from the discontinuance or abolition of offices in Class 2 of the Civil Service List, and which may be at the disposal of Parliament during the present reign."

In moving this Amendment, I shall carefully avoid anything like making a Second Reading speech. It is necessary to explain, however, that the subject of my Amendment has been under the consideration of Parliament for several years, and that my hon. Friend the Member for Dundee (Mr. E. Robertson) has constantly directed attention to several matters connected with the Crown. But the Government have refused to listen to the representations made to them, and now we have the present Bill, which seems to have been drawn for the purpose of foreclosing the Civil List during Her Majesty's reign. I do not begrudge in any way the allowance to Her Majesty or to the Heir Apparent to the Throne; but my complaint is not that £36,000 additional should be granted, but that it should be granted upon the understanding that the Civil List shall remain in statu quo during Her Majesty's reign. I believe that the feeling of the country upon this subject is exceedingly keen, but the irritation which exist is not due to the Grants to Her Majesty and the Prince of Wales for the purpose of maintaining the dignity and splendour of the Monarchy, but to the realisation of the fact that there are around the Throne a number of persons receiving nearly £20,000 a year in pensions, and many thousands of pounds more in salaries, which are attached to sinecure offices. The people will remain dissatisfied with the Civil List until these parasites are removed and the sinecure offices abolished. They protest against paying a number of persons who do no service whatever to the State, and simply live upon the industry of the taxpayers. I am afraid that it will be in vain to attempt to allay this feeling of irritation until the long-promised Committee shall have been appointed and shall have reported. We have no objection to maintain the Monarchy in dignity and splendour, but we do object to maintain it for purposes which we think are pernicious and inimical to the best interests of the State. I beg to move the Amendment.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 5, after the word "thereof," to insert the words—

"Or from such sums as may become available from the discontinuance or abolition of offices in Class 2 of the Civil List, and which may be at the disposal of Parliament during the present reign."—(Mr. Esslemont.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. Goschen, St. George's, Hanover Square): The Government are unable to accept the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman. The purport of the Amendment is that a revision of the Civil List should be undertaken with a view of seeing whether any saving can be made, and if so of applying such saving to an allowance for the Prince of Wales' children. It has been clearly established in the course of the Debates that not only do the Government not propose to disturb the Civil List during the present reign, but it is admitted pretty generally that that is a step that ought not to be taken at present. Therefore, both on account of the compact which has existed between the Crown and Parliament during more than 50 years, and on account of the general inexpediency of undertaking a revision of the Civil List at the present moment, the Government feel that they cannot accept the Amendment.

SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy): I concur with my hon. Friend as to the desirability of reducing surplus Court appointments, which are a means of corruption at the disposal of the Government of the day. A large number of excellent young men, heirs to large estates, are captured and taken political prisoners by a Lord in Waitingship or something of that kind. But although I concur with my hon. Friend I cannot give him my vote, because in the whole of this matter I am publicly pledged to follow the declarations and the lead of my right hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. Gladstone.) Her Majesty having taken upon herself the burden of providing for the junior members of the Family, Parliament ought not to try to make money out of the Civil List, money which may fairly be taken by Her Majesty to enable her to discharge that very great burden. I am not well up in my knowledge of the Royal Family, but I find from Whitaker's Almanack that Her Majesty has had nine children. The children of four of them have already been provided for, but there are the families of three daughters who still require to be provided for. Her Majesty has taken upon herself that great burden, and it therefore seems to me that we ought in no way to interfere with the Civil List.

MR. COSSHAM (Bristol, E.): I contend that the compact alluded to by the Chancellor of the Exchequer has been observed only on one side, and I support the principle of the Amendment, by which my hon. Friend does not mean in any way to diminish the income of Her Majesty, but to utilise any savings that can be effected in the Civil List. I am afraid that there is nothing that tends to bring Royalty more in conflict with the feelings of the people than votes of this kind for persons who hang on to the skirts of Royalty. On that ground I shall support the Amendment of my hon. Friend, although as I have paired I cannot vote for it.

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster: I wish to assert most emphatically, in contradiction to the statement of the hon. Member, that the compact of 1837 has been observed by Her Majesty to the very letter from the very beginning until now, and the applications made to Parliament from time to time have been made by responsible Ministers of the Crown upon their own sense of their duty to Parliament, the Crown, and the country, and in full recognition of the compact originally made.

*MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): I hope that the hon. Gentleman who moved the Amendment will not go to a Division upon it. I am quite in favour of the abolition of many of the offices provided for under Class 2 of the Estimates, but I am not aware that any of those offices will be at the disposal of Parliament during the present reign without some specific enactment. Therefore the Amendment does not in terms apply to what the hon. Member wishes.

*MR. C. J. DARLING (Deptford): In my opinion the Amendment is entirely nugatory, because if money comes to be at the disposal of Parliament it would come into the Treasury in natural course, and need only be left there.

*MR. STOREY (Sunderland): In 1844 a number of these offices were abolished, but the money did not come to Parliament at all. It was retained in the hands of Trustees and handed over to Her Majesty. I contend that every application to Parliament for an increase of the amount to the Royal Family has been a breaking of the agreement of 1837. ["No!"] I shall be glad if the hon. Member who says "No" will endeavour to prove it. The other night it was said that no intimation had ever been made to the Crown that any additional application for a Grant to Members of the Royal Family should not be made, and that no Minister had ever intimated to Her Majesty that none was expected to be made. The First Civil List for a whole reign on the new plan was that of William IV. It included the pensions then borne upon the Consolidated Fund—£50,000 a year for Queen Adelaide.

THE CHAIRMAN: I do not see how the hon. Member can make these observations relevant to the Amendment.

*MR. STOREY: The proposal of my hon. Friend is that any savings that may be made hereafter shall be retained for public purposes, and it is contended on the other side that that would be a breach of the compact entered into in 1837. I wish to show that, as a matter of fact, no such compact exists. My only object was to call attention to the remarks of the Chancellor of the Exchequer in November, 1837 (Mr. Spring Rice), in which he clearly pointed out that the Civil List were to be regarded as final, and that there were to be no further applications to Parliament for additions. All the engagements which this House has entered into were, I maintain, fulfilled when the Civil List was fixed at £385,000, and that no further contribution in excess ought to be imposed upon the people.

MR. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Mid Lothian): While the Bill has been in Committee, I have thought that I should best promote the progress of Public Business by not taking part in the discussion, the principle and provisions of the Bill having been largely expounded and, as I think, thoroughly understood by the House. But when the statement is made, no doubt in perfect good faith, by the right hon. Gentleman that the compact between the Crown and Parliament has been broken by subsequent applications for Grants to members of the Royal Family, as one who had something to do with the original settlement I do not think I ought to remain entirely silent, and I must frankly adopt the statement of the First Lord of the Treasury. It appears to me that Her Majesty has in the strictest and most absolute manner possible conformed to the declaration which was made in the Civil List when she came to the Throne. In regard to the non-possession of means by the Crown, the state of the case is this—that when the Government in the time of Lord Palmerston considered the question of provision for the children of the Queen they looked at the question as a whole. I think, if I remember the figures correctly, that, including the Prince of Wales, the total sum to be provided would have been above £150,000, and excluding the Prince of Wales £100,000 a year. It was the opinion of Her Majesty's advisers at that day that whether the Queen had or had not certain savings on the Civil List—and I am glad she has had them, as Parliament is going to be considerably benefited from them—Her Majesty had no savings and no means at her free disposal which could have enabled her to face such a demand as that for £100,000 a year. With respect to the Amendment immediately before the House, I am unable to support it for reasons which are extremely patent. I take it to be perfectly clear in law and according to the equity of the case that if any inquiry should be made which should result in savings being made in the present Civil List by the abolition of certain offices, those savings will be absolutely in law and in honour the property of Her Majesty, with which Parliament ought not any more to interfere, and with which I do not believe Parliament will interfere, than with any other absolutely established and universally recognised right. I must repeat the opinion mentioned by my hon. Friend the member for Kirkcaldy (Sir G. Campbell) just now that Her Majesty is about to assume a very heavy burden, and if Her Majesty can be aided by any such savings as those intended in the present Amendment, I would be extremely glad if she could be assisted by any economies which it is in her power, and not in that of Parliament, both in law and in equity to make. To lighten her burden would be the natural, honourable, and only legitimate application of these funds.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): Many of the questions raised in these Debates are questions upon which much may be said on either side. I do not think it is necessary to go into the question whether there was a compact with Her Majesty which precludes Her Majesty from asking any additional aid for her children or grandchildren, but I should like to point out to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian that when he says that if Her Majesty were to do away with a considerable number of household offices she would have a right to acquire the salaries, he can hardly remember that the Civil List Act was based on a Report of a Committee. That Committee went into all these details and made alterations in regard to the amount to be paid during the reign of William IV., and the Act was founded on that Report, just as the present Bill is founded on the Report of the Grants Committee. It seems to me that if by an Act of Parliament it has been agreed to give Her Majesty £385,000 a year, which Act was based on the Report of a Committee which said so much shall be given to A, so much to B, and so much to C, it would be hardly fair and reasonable, if the salaries were suppressed, that Her Majesty should enjoy the amount saved. These salaries are supposed to be paid in the interest of the maintenance of the honour and dignity of the Crown, and if they are suppressed, the money ought to remain in the Treasury. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has said that it would be unfair to insist upon Her Majesty, in the autumn of her life, making great changes in her household. There is a certain amount of force in that, but the Amendment does not insist that Her Majesty should do so. All it says is that if Her Majesty should do so the amount should go in aid of the sum which it is proposed should be given towards the support of the Prince of Wales, and therefore that the taxpayer should be relieved to that extent. I ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether very lately Lord Spencer and Sir Reginald Welby have not gone into the question whether any of these salaries could be suppressed, and whether the result was not that the office of Clerk held by Lord Alfred Paget was not filled up upon the death of that gentleman. With respect to the Amendment, however, unless my hon. Friend consents to an amendment in its form it will be rather difficult to vote for it. The Amendment speaks of funds "which may be at the disposal of Parliament during the present reign," but the funds to which it refers are not at the disposal of Parliament, but at the disposal of the Treasury.

MR. ESSLEMONT: I mean the Treasury; and am quite prepared to consent to the Amendment suggested.

MR. LABOUCHERE: Then I have nothing more to say except that I hope the Committee will adopt the Amendment with the alteration.

MR. ESSLEMONT: I cannot consent to withdraw the Amendment, but I will accept the amendment which has been suggested. I have great respect for the Leader of the Opposition, and have given great weight to all he has said as to this Amendment, but I feel that it is part of the duty of Parliament and the Treasury to reform these sinecure offices, and not burden the country with them. We are asked to pass this Bill, and practically to shut up every avenue to economy with regard to Royal Grants during the present reign. I believe the constituencies are not prepared to have this question foreclosed.

*MR. BRADLAUGH: I beg to move to omit from the Amendment the words "and which may be at the disposal of Parliament during the present reign."

Amendment proposed to the proposed Amendment, to leave out the words "and which may be at the disposal of Parliament during the present reign."—(Mr. Bradlaugh.)

Question, "That the words 'and which may be at the disposal of Parliament during the present reign,' stand part of the proposed Amendment," put, and negatived.

Question, as amended, proposed.

MR. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.): I think the Amendment of my hon. Friend hits, from a popular point of view, the great blot in this Bill. The people perceive that there are vast numbers of enormously paid officials whose services are purely nominal. Lord Coventry, the Master of the Buckhounds, receives £1,700 a year. and the Duke of Portland, the Master of the Horse, is paid £2,500 a year. It is these things which shock the moral sense of the community. These men are very rich, and they render no service to the country or to the Queen—I mean no service to the country proportionate to the sums they receive. If there is one instinct of the democracy which is stronger than another—if there is one principle that they will enforce upon the House sooner or later—it is the principle that, with regard to the expenditure of public money, there must be some close proportion between the services that are rendered and the money that is paid for them. It was not so, I grant, at the commencement of the present reign. Fifty years ago the persons who were the depositories of political power were not shocked at such salaries as these which are paid to the Duke of Portland and Lord Coventry; but 50 years have made a mighty difference. The people have now a voice in the management of affairs, and those who are responsible in matters of this kind would do well to take heed of the warning which has been given them, not only by these Debates, but still more by the significant Divisions which have taken place upon this Bill, and to apply their minds to removing what, in the minds of the great mass of the people, is one of the great objections to Royalty. Hon. Members must remember that the large majority of voters are persons who are paid between 15s. and 35s. a week, and that the great majority of these are at present making less than £1 a week. A man who has to work an hour in order to earn 6d. or 8d. has a realising sense of the value of a penny, and the amount of labour and suffering it represents, which those in a more fortunate position in life cannot appreciate. It is said it is impossible to give effect to this Amendment, for technical reasons, in connection with the supposed compact established by the Civil List Act at the commencement of Her Majesty's reign. I do not think there is much profit or advantage in discussing at this time of day what is the true meaning of the Act establishing the Civil List. But if the framers of that piece of legislation had intended that the salaries of Class 2 should go to less than £385,000 a year. But whatever view we take of these matters, I think it ought not to be beyond the power of Her Majesty's Ministers to provide even at the latest moment for the abolition of offices which throw an unnecessary burden on the taxpayers of the country. I am certain that while the great mass of the people appreciate the advantages of the Monarchical form of Government as it now exists in this country, and are quite prepared to pay all necessary sums for its maintenance, they will nevertheless set their faces against the whole principle of Class 2, against the principle of honorary or titular or nominal offices bestowed upon rich men and highly paid at the expense of the State. Under these circumstances I shall certainly support the Amendment.

MR. WALLACE (Edinburgh, East): I do not think the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury criticised with his usual fairness the language of my hon. Friend when he seemed to charge him with reflecting on the conduct of Her Majesty. If my hon. Friend had done so, he would have been guilty of a transgression which must have brought upon him the censure of the Chair. All my hon. Friend could have meant was that the propositions of Her Majesty's Government were of such a nature that they presented the Sovereign in the aspect referred to. It is perfectly impossible that the Sovereign can be spoken of in a sinister manner by any person with a knowledge of the Constitution. The King can do no wrong. A Constitutional Sovereign, who follows the advice of her Ministers, must always be Constitutionally right. We know that the Ministers have placed the

if they choose. I do not object to that reading of the law. I shall not dispute the position that any savings in Class 2 may be properly enough devoted to the charges on the Privy Purse, which is Class 1 of the Civil List. I ask whether the maintenance of the children of the Royal Family is a personal and private matter, as is the case in other families, or is it a matter connected with the maintenance of the dignity and honour of the Crown? If it is a duty of a personal and private capacity, I ask what could be a more natural distinction of private and personal funds? I take it that whether the savings go to the maintenance of the family or to the maintenance of the honour of the Crown, they are equally to be contemplated as devoteable—if I may coin a word—to the purposes of the maintenance of the Royal Family. I do not like the way in which Her Majesty's Ministers continue to speak of the bargain or compact which they say exists between the Queen and the nation. In the strict sense of the word there can be no contract between the Queen and her people, because there is no authority by which it can be enforced. The Preamble of the Civil List Act is founded on relations of affection between Sovereign and people. All the difficulty and painful feeling and misunderstanding of this matter at the present moment has been produced by the unwise conduct of Her Majesty's Government in not coming forward and plainly and honestly telling us, the Representatives of the people, that Her Majesty cannot conveniently support all the members of her Family in that style which is consistent with the maintenance of her Family.

*Mr. GOSCHEN: I am glad to have the opportunity of doing so. I say distinctly that the Queen has not the means of providing for all her children and her grandchildren in a manner befitting their station and dignity. I make that statement in the fullest sense.

Mr. WALLACE: If I rightly understand the right hon. Gentleman I accept his statement with confidence. I desire, however, that there should be no misunderstanding with regard to the matter. I have listened too carefully to the debate—I will not say to be taken in—but to be misled by generalities. Does the right hon. Gentleman intend to convey to the House that Her Majesty's means from all sources, both public and private, are not sufficient to enable her to maintain her children and grandchildren in becoming dignity?

*Mr. GOSCHEN: If the hon. Gentleman will allow me, as he has further pressed me upon the subject, I will make the matter absolutely plain. What I mean is that if the Queen devoted the whole of her fortune to the children of the Prince of Wales and to her other grandchildren it would not suffice to make that provision for them which I believe the House thinks necessary for their proper support.

Mr. WALLACE: Then I must say that in the face of that declaration any opposition on my part to this Grant is entirely disarmed.

*Mr. STOREY: I do not know that I need press the next Amendment, but I will formally move it, in order to elicit from the right hon. Gentleman the reason why a particular date has been put in the Sub-section 2 of Clause 1. This sub-section provides that the first quarterly payment shall be made on the 5th October, and as this is the 2nd August, I think the first payment ought not to be made until November or December.

Amendment proposed, Clause 1, in page 2, line 7, to leave out the word "October" and insert the word "November."—(Mr. Storey.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'October' stand part of the Clause."

*Mr. W. H. SMITH: The reason for the insertion of this date is obvious. In these matters it has been customary to make the allowances date from the day on which the House has taken Her Majesty's Message into consideration. In this case Her Majesty's Message came down on the 2nd of July. The 5th of October is the first quarterly pay-day after that date.

*Mr. STOREY: Then all I can say is I hope a similar course will be adopted with reference to other persons to whom grants are made. My opinion is that the payment should only date from the date when Parliament authorises the grant. I will not, however, press my Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

*Mr. STOREY: In order to give some of my friends who were prevented from voting on the second reading an opportunity, I shall divide against the clause. I will only refer to the answer given by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, which appears to have driven my hon. Friend the Member for South Edinburgh out of the House. Her Majesty's Government have assured the House that the total sum under the control of Her Majesty is not sufficient to enable her Majesty to make provision for her grandchildren. That is a most extraordinary statement to be made at this stage of the proceedings. I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer if that statement was made to the Committee upstairs? Did he furnish the Committee with any figures which enabled the Committee to judge of the reasonableness of the statement? Did he satisfy the hon. member for Northampton?

Mr. LABOUCHERE: No.

*Mr. STOREY: Did he satisfy the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle? Did he give him figures which justified him in coming to the conclusion that Her Majesty's resources were not sufficient for the purpose in view? I am not quite of the same temper as my hon. Friend the Member for South Edinburgh, who runs away the moment he hears a Ministerial statement capable of 50 interpretations. I have heard too many to be taken in with a bald statement of that kind. I will tell the right hon. Gentleman what, in my opinion, would have been a judicious course for him to take. He should have given the Committee information, and enabled them to form an opinion, and then come down to the House with an explicit statement on the point. I shall take the opportunity of dividing against this clause.

Mr. LABOUCHERE: What was done in Committee was this—a statement was made as to the amount of Her Majesty's fortune at the present moment, and we were told to treat that as a private communication, and of course have done so. Everybody can form his own opinion as to whether the amount of accumulations at the present moment would be sufficient to enable Her Majesty to provide for her grandchildren at her death. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has recently said that the amount is not sufficient to provide for the grandchildren, whereupon a Scotchman, in rather a weak-minded way, immediately walked out of the House and said he would not vote. I am perfectly convinced of this—and I am not going to state the figures—that if the amount of Her Majesty's fortune was known to the House, every single Scotchman—for they are a careful and economical people—would be of opinion that there is amply sufficient, from the actual savings, to give what may be termed a reasonable fortune to each of the grandchildren. What is called the appanage of an Austrian Archduke is something between £1,500 and £2,000 a year. I hold that the sum of £2,000 per annum, with such a capital sum as would produce that sum, to be left to his children, is sufficient for each grandchild of Her Majesty. In my opinion, there is sufficient to provide for all the grandchildren, exclusive of the children of the Prince of Wales. Her Majesty is, however, now receiving a larger revenue from the Duchy of Lancaster, and a far larger income, than she received for her private use when she came to the Throne and the Civil List was established; and I contend that out of the accumulations all the younger children can be provided with an ample fortune, and that out of the excess of the private revenue over expenditure an ample amount—a sum greater than £36,000 a year—might without any curtailment in necessary expenditure be granted to the children of the Prince of Wales during Her Majesty's life.

Mr. GLADSTONE: My hon. Friend has just said that he is convinced every Scotchman would agree with him that the savings of Her Majesty were amply sufficient for her grandchildren.

Mr. LABOUCHERE: I consider the right hon. Gentleman as belonging to the United Kingdom and not to Scotland.

Mr. GLADSTONE: I am much obliged to my hon. Friend, but I may tell him that we hold in Scotland that belonging to the United Kingdom makes us not still less but still more Scotchmen than we were before. I have not a single drop of blood which is not Scotch nor a single blood relation except those who are Scotch. I wish to accept the challenge of my hon. Friend, and I must say, having thought over the matter from my own point of view, before the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer was made, that I respectfully differ from my hon. Friend. I am convinced that if the vast majority of the House examined into the question they would come to a conclusion in conformity with the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer with respect to the insufficiency of the accumulations. I am not speaking of the large and splendid figures with which we have been accustomed to deal in this House in providing £25,000 a year for the Royal Princes; but, forming the best estimate I can as to what is necessary for sustaining the burdens of life only on the footing of a gentleman—which is surely a very moderate estimate to form as to the mode of life of the immediate descendants of Royalty—I think that the Chancellor of the Exchequer was right, and that the means at the disposal of Her Majesty are not sufficient to make provision for her descendants. I cannot see that the hon. Member for Edinburgh was in the least to blame because he was disposed to attach weight to the responsible judgment of a Minister of the Crown. It is said that that statement was made at a late moment, but I may point out that it was not called for before. It should be borne in mind that the Committee has distinctly reported that all the information deemed by them needful to the objects of the inquiry was fully and freely laid before them by Her Majesty.

Mr. HALLEY STEWART (Lincolnshire, Spalding): I appeal to both Front Benches in this matter to enable us to form a judgment for ourselves. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer tells us if we were in possession of the facts we should agree that the sum at Her Majesty's disposal is not sufficient to maintain the Royal grandchildren with proper dignity. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian not only confirms this but adds that it is not sufficient to maintain them properly in the station of private gentlemen. Will right hon. Gentlemen tell us what sum they would deem to be sufficient? That is the essence of the whole question. If I am to give a blind vote, I would rather do so following my leader into the Lobby; but I intend to say it is a blind vote given in the absence of definite information. I approve of the position taken up by the Member for South Edinburgh.

Clause 2.

*MR. STOREY: The Amendment I have to propose is that the words from "Act" in the nineteenth line to "otherwise" in the following line be omitted. I move it for the purpose of recording my protest against a system under which Parliament is required not merely to make Grants to persons, but also to enable a fund to be formed by accumulations, which fund will be entirely out of the control of Parliament. I make no speech upon it because the matter has been discussed again and again, but I move the Amendment.

Amendment proposed, in line 19 to leave out from the word "Act" to the word "otherwise" in line 20, inclusive.

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause," put, and agreed to.

*MR. STOREY: With regard to the next Amendment I may say it is intended to place a limit upon the now unlimited control the clause gives to the Prince of Wales and certain officials to distribute the sum in any way they may think best. My Amendment prescribes the amount that shall be paid to each child in the following proportion, five-twelfths to the elder son, four-twelfths to the younger son, and to the daughters one-twelfth each. I have a very simple reason for proposing this. Anybody who reads history knows quite well that there have been in times past serious conflicts arising from differences of opinion in the Royal Household, and I can conceive circumstances under which internal differences may affect the distribution. The official persons will always be very much under the influence of the Prince of Wales and will do pretty much as he desires, and the appointment may be made according to favouritism and used as a means of punishment or reward. I simply say this that my intention may be recorded though I will not put the Committee to the trouble of a Division.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member does not move?

*MR. STOREY: No.

MR. LABOUCHERE: Upon the point to which the next Amendment which stands in my name is directed, perhaps the First Lord of the Treasury or the Chancellor of the Exchequer can give me some enlightenment. What is to happen in the event of there being accumulations of unexpended funds? I need not go into this elaborately, but it is very evident as I read the clause that there may be considerable accumulations. For instance it is intended to give certain annuities to the daughters of the Prince of Wales and also £10,000 down. Well, suppose one of the younger daughters should die before the demise of the Prince of Wales, and that the sums are allowed to accumulate, and there should be a change in the Sovereignty of the country; then you have a fund hung up high and dry, a fund voted for a specific purpose, and this fund not being required for that purpose ought surely to be paid back to the Treasury.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 29, at the end of the Clause, to add the words—

"But should the trustees have in hand any unexpended accumulations of this sum six months after the death of Her Majesty, whom God long preserve, then such accumulations shall be paid into the Public Exchequer."—(Mr. Labouchere.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The hon. Gentleman will not be surprised to hear that we cannot accept this Amendment.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I am surprised.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: We regard this as a Grant to make provision for the family of the Prince of Wales. The trustees to be appointed are official trustees—namely, the First Lord of the Treasury and the Chancellor of the Exchequer for the time being, and they will be bound to see that the fund is properly distributed. It is obvious that provision may not be required to be made for some members of the family for a year or two, but when it is required there is the provision made by the Bill. That there will be accumulations to any considerable amount, for, say, eight or ten years is highly improbable in every sense of the word. The utmost we can hope is that there may be some accumulations during the earlier years that will enable His Royal Highness and the trustees to make such provision for his children as may be necessary and reasonable. Assuming even the possibility of accumulations, then these will be known to Parliament, and will be an element to take into consideration when a new Civil List comes to be settled. Under the circumstances I cannot see there is any necessity for the Amendment.

MR. LABOUCHERE: It is very evident, and every hon. Member who has paid attention to the point must see it, that I am right and that the right hon. Gentleman is wrong. The fact is, he did not think of this point, and I have thought of it. The right hon. Gentleman does not want a Report stage of the Bill, but I do not share his view. I should rather like a Report stage, for we have a little more to say upon these matters. But I can perfectly understand why the right hon. Gentleman does not wish for this additional stage of the Bill. He has admitted I am right, for he says the matter will have to be re-considered in the event of the demise of the Sovereign. But surely we ought to consider it now; surely we have had sufficient discussion upon these accumulations; surely we ought to have it perfectly clear that if, on the demise of the Queen, there are accumulations, and the children of the Prince of Wales become the children of the Sovereign, then the money in the hands of the trustees for the benefit of the children of the Prince of Wales and not of the children of the Sovereign should be repaid by the trustees into the Treasury.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 42; Noes 175.—(Div. List, No. 275.)

MR. LABOUCHERE: Perhaps I may be more fortunate in inducing Her Majesty's Government to accept the next Amendment I have to propose. The point is this: supposing, first—I sincerely hope it may not be the case—but suppose the two sons and the two younger daughters of the Prince of Wales should die to-morrow, should there be granted to the Duchess of Fife £36,000 a year during the time she remains the grandchild of the Sovereign? Surely that is not the intention. We want to make a fair and adequate allowance of the £36,000. It is not probable that all the children will die except one, and I trust that none of them may die; still one may die. Supposing, after the allowance is given to the elder son and to the three daughters, the second son were to die. So far as I understand it, it is assumed that the second son will have £15,000 if he marries. Let us suppose he dies, and his wife dies, where is the £15,000 to go to? The elder son is to have £25,000, which is thought amply sufficient. On this happening, is he to have £40,000, or are the daughters to have additions made to their allowances on the death of their brother? It is a bungling arrangement, I have always thought, giving the sum to the Prince of Wales and leaving him to divide it; I have always thought it would be much better to give a specific sum to each of the children; still, we have made the arrangement by this Bill, and I only want to carry out what I believe to be the intention of the Bill that each of the children shall have her or his fair proportion of the sum, and shall not have more if one or two or three of the children should unfortube a fair composition, taking all the chances into consideration, between our original proposal and the proposal subsequently made? The sum of £36,000 was agreed upon, although it scarcely provides the necessary margin. We are not prepared, under the circumstances, to say that in the unfortunate event of the death of one of the Prince of Wales's children any change should be made in the amount of the annual Grant. The House, as representing the taxpayer, is making an arrangement with the Prince of Wales, by which His Royal Highness's family, in all contingencies, will receive the sum now proposed, which sum is smaller than that originally proposed.

*MR. STOREY: The position of things is this—£36,000 a year is given for the five children, and my hon. Friend has put the hypothesis that it may go to one of the children. I will not put such an extreme hypothesis, I will take the less extreme hypothesis that two of the children might die, and in that case the whole of the £36,000 would go to the other three, though the Government themselves agree that £36,000 is ample for the five. The Government would never have come here with a proposition which they did not think ample. They would have thought £49,000 a little better, but they do not think £36,000 insufficient. What I say is more or less in a spirit of hostility to the Royal Family. But this Amendment ought to commend itself to the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the First Lord of the Treasury, because it is based upon the solid principle of finance that it is the duty of the House, as the guardian of the public purse, to know in what manner the money voted by it is expended. There is another reason that must have been present to the mind of every hon. Member during these Debates, and that is that if one thing has been more prejudicial to the interests of the Royal Family than another it is the element of mystery which has surrounded these arrangements. It is this element which has created such a great amount of feeling out of doors. There is an idea—which may be dispelled, to some extent, after to-day's Debate—that the savings of the Crown have been exceedingly large; and it is this element of mystery that is so difficult to get rid of. We have had an assurance to-day that these savings have not been as large as some of us believe; but I want to prevent that feeling of dissatisfaction in the popular mind that there are great accumulations being made for the future. Though this Amendment would not prevent the feeling arising in the future, so far as the main sources of the income of the Royal Family are concerned, it would prevent it arising in the future so far as this Grant of £36,000 a year is concerned. We must remember that this Bill is an entirely new development in the matter of Royal Grants. I believe it is absolutely the first time that money voted by Parliament has not been specifically allocated to the person to whom it is granted. This money is allocated to five persons, but in what way the House does not know, and I think the House is entitled to know it. It is likely that the daughters of the Prince of Wales will receive a lump sum, and if that is so, I think it desirable that the House should know it. We should none of us like to see them inadequately considered, and the tendency is to give the sons more than the daughters. The public want to have a guarantee that the daughters will be fairly treated, even though they marry rich men. I trust I am only following the original proposal in asking that the public may know how the money goes. We are face to face with a complete change of policy on the part of the Government. So far as I am concerned, it is a change I regret. We should know what we are proposing for each child and let the matter rest there. Then we are asked to place a discretionary power in the hands of unknown persons to a considerable extent. Her Majesty and the Prince of Wales will, no doubt, have the main voice in the disposal of this money, but we are also putting it in the hands of official trustees, and we do not know what views they may take of the manner in which the money is to be allocated in the future. We may reasonably assume that whilst the Queen and the Prince of Wales will naturally exercise the most influence, other views will also be consulted. The Bill is expressly framed on the supposition that there will be accumulations. The right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury has said it is extremely improbable that at the end of eight or ten years there will be any accumulations. He believes there will be accumulations for a few years in order that larger sums may be given subsequently. I do not dispute the right hon. Gentleman's statement. I have no means of knowing whether it is likely to be right or not. But if there are to be no accumulations I shall be all the better pleased. In that case the country ought to know the manner in which the money is disposed of. If the money had been allocated in the manner originally intended by the Government this Amendment would have been unnecessary, because Parliament would have known how it went. Now that we are voting a lump sum, I think it is necessary that we should ask for an annual return to Parliament. It would be the more necessary in the unfortunate event, which we hope is not likely to occur, of the demise of one of these five children. If one of the Princesses should unfortunately die, the amount of money set free would be, comparatively speaking, small, but if it should be one of the sons, a large amount would be set free for distribution. I contend that, on sound financial considerations, the House is entitled to know whether the money is allocated in a way that the House and the country would approve of, and I cannot conceive why the Government should refuse to accept this Amendment.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 29, at the end of the clause, to add the words—

"The Trustees shall make an annual Return, to be presented to both Houses of Parliament, stating the manner in which they have dealt with the sum granted to them, and showing the amount of the accumulations, if any."—(Mr. W. M'Laren.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I have listened with great interest to the speech of the hon. Gentleman, and he will forgive me if I say that he has failed altogether to realise the object, and spirit, and intention of the Bill, which is to enable the Prince of Wales, with the sanction of the Queen, to make provision for his own family. The assistance of official trustees, in the persons of the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the First Lord of the Treasury, for the time being, is secured, but any of those contingencies to which reference has been made could not by any possibility happen. What does the hon. Gentleman desire to do? He desires to give Parliament power to review the discretion exercised by the Queen and the Prince of Wales in dealing with the affairs of their own family.

*MR. M'LAREN: My Amendment does not imply that. The Bill is absolutely clear in stating that the Prince of Wales and the Official Trustees may allocate the money in any way they may think fit.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: But the hon. Gentleman made use of words to the effect that the country ought to know whether the money was allocated in a way of which they approve, and therefore it would be open to the House of Commons and the country to raise a discussion as to whether proper discretion had been exercised. I believe there is a general desire throughout the country that we should not have these discussions in Parliament, and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. Gladstone) only gave expression to that feeling when he said that the opportunities for discussions of this character should be made much less frequent. There can be no doubt that the provision will be made with due regard to the claims of the Heir Presumptive to the Throne, and of the next in succession, and the Princesses. We have stated our view that the Princesses should receive a portion of £3,000 a year, with a Grant of £10,000, and this has to be taken in connection with the provision now made. The House of Commons and the country have had indications of the proportions which the Government thought it right to propose, and the proposition of the Government will no doubt have effect given to it in any appropriation made by the Prince of Wales with the sanction of the Queen and the Trustees. I do not think there is any dissatisfaction in the country with the Grant proposed. I think the proposal has been received with very great satisfaction, except by the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Storey), and I dispute his authority to represent the people of the country, although no doubt he represents a large number of his constituents. The principle has been laid down that power should be placed in the hands of the Prince of Wales to make provision for his children with the sanction of the head of the family, the Queen, and with the concurrence of the responsible Ministers, and from that principle the Government cannot depart. The hon. Gentleman says we do not know who the future Official Trustees will be, but I think he may rest assured that as they are to hold the responsible positions of Chancellor of the Exchequer and First Lord of the Treasury they are not likely to sanction any arrangement which is not fully justified by the circumstances of the case. I could not undertake to place before the House of Commons information which would afford the opportunity which I expressly deny to be in the public interest—that is to say, of discussing the discretion exercised by the Prince of Wales with the sanction of the Queen and Trustees, and I therefore cannot accept the Amendment. No doubt hon. Gentlemen know how these Grants are made. ["How?"] They can obtain the information, for hon. Gentlemen seem to know a great many facts as regards this subject.

*MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton); This seems to me a reasonable Amendment, and the Return for which it asks does not necessarily mean review.

Many Returns are made to this House in which the House is powerless for review. The Amendment would have a good effect in preventing mystery about the administration of these funds. The right hon. Gentleman will pardon me for saying that I have not the confidence in Official Trustees which he seems to have. I will give him an illustration. By two Acts of Parliament two sums of money were put in the hands of Trustees, £600,000 in the hands of five Trustees, one of whom was the First Lord of the Treasury for the time being, and £330,000, in the name of five other Trustees, of whom the First Lord of the Treasury was also one. The only First Lord of the Treasury who concerned himself at all was Lord Palmerston; and as to the other sum the First Lord of the Treasury was absolutely unaware that any duties were imposed upon him. Neither did his predecessors appear to have taken any active notice of the matter. That was put in evidence before the Committee which sat in relation to perpetual pensions. While I have no doubt whatever that if the official Trustees were possessed with a sense of the duty imposed upon them, they would fulfil that duty; I think sometimes that official trusteeships of that character become very little regarded as a matter of practice. I think this Bill establishes a dangerous precedent by saying that lump sums may be allocated to the parents for Grants to the children, without Parliament having any knowledge of how those lump sums are applied. Of course, I know that we are utterly powerless as against the expression of opinion by the Government. I had refrained from speaking on these Amendments, but I must, in this case, not only give my hearty support to the Amendment, but I hope the mover will press it to a Division, so that our protest may at least be recorded.

Mr. HALLEY STEWART: It is perfectly true, as the First Lord of the Treasury has said, that in terms this is a Grant to the Prince of Wales, but it is in reality a Grant to the individual children of the Prince of Wales. Why should we take all this trouble of appointing trustees if in reality the Grant is not made to the Prince of Wales? There is a wide gulf between the demand of the Amendment and the interpretation put upon it by the First Lord of the Treasury. All we wish to secure is that we shall have the healthy moral control of public opinion over the allocations made. We do not want to come here from year to year to find fault with those who will have to report the allocation of money. All we want is to bring to bear that publicity which, as everyone knows on both sides of the House, is the best security for the wise distribution of the funds placed at the disposal of the trustees.

*Mr. STOREY: The Government have persistently not listened to our arguments nor accepted an Amendment to this Bill. We are equally persistent, and you shall not get an inch of this Bill without commentary and Division. I oppose the clause because of what it contains, and what it does not contain. I oppose it because it introduces a new method of dealing with public money. Arrangements are to be made for handing over to trustees money which is to accumulate, and to be allocated in proportions which we do not know. I resist the clause still more strongly because the right hon. Gentleman most unwisely refused the proposal on which we have just divided the House. The right hon. Gentleman seemed to think that if he gave us information it would cause less discussion. But the reason I want information, and I make no secret about it, is that there shall be more discussion. I think there is an enormous disproportion in the Grants to Royal persons, and they should be discussed again and again until the people outside compel Parliament inside to take more reasonable views of these matters. On these grounds I resist the clause, and I will take the liberty of dividing the House.

Mr. LABOUCHERE: As will be perceived by this time, I am entirely opposed to the principle of the Bill, but when a Bill does leave Parliament, as a Member of the House of Commons I want to see it drafted in a respectable fashion. I have done my best to alter this clause, and to make it reasonable. I have failed. Just let me point out to the First Lord of the Treasury what he and his draftsman have done. The clause as it stands now is a monstrous and most unnatural clause. And I will tell the right hon. Gentleman why. The right hon. Gentleman will admit that it is possible that the second son of the Prince of Wales may die. He may have married and had a child; yet this amount of money which is allocated to him, call it £10,000 a year, would go to his brothers and to his sisters, and under no possibility by this Act could one shilling of the sum be handed over to his child. That, Sir, is what the right hon. Gentleman has done with his clause. He cuts off the child from the benefit in favour of the brothers and sisters. I really do think that it is unnecessary to say anything more against the drafting of this clause.

*MR. GOSCHEN: The only thing we have to say in reply to the hon. Member is that he is mistaken in his reading of the clause.

MR. LABOUCHERE: The right hon. Gentleman boldly makes the assertion that I am mistaken. I defy the right hon. Gentleman to prove that.

*MR. GOSCHEN: All I can say is that we have taken the best legal advice on the subject. The matter has been fully considered, and the Bill was drafted by a very able lawyer, and others whose legal ability the hon. Member will not question, have been consulted on the point, and the clause was so drafted as to meet the very objection which the hon. Member raises grandchildren of Her Majesty. I ask the Committee to look at the scope of the Bill. It seems to me that the words of the Preamble go beyond the title of the Bill, which is "A Bill to make provision for the support and maintenance of the children of His Royal Highness Albert Edward Prince of Wales." It astonishes me that exception was not taken to these words of the Preamble on the Second Reading of the Bill, and the opinion of the Speaker taken as to whether they were in order. I believe they are not, and I hold that the Bill lays down a principle which ought not to be laid down, because the Bill has nothing to do with the children of the younger children of Her Majesty the Queen. I object to any prejudging of what may happen in a future reign. Possibly in a future reign there may be a Civil List that will cover such allowances; but I want to leave the whole matter to the Parliament which will be called together in a future reign. Beyond this, I am against the "finality" of the right hon. member for Newcastle, and do not wish to prejudice the judgment and action of future Ministers. These words go beyond any principle laid down in the Report of the Committee, and beyond all that was contemplated by the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian. We have heard that right hon. Gentleman lauded to the skies by Gentlemen opposite for the speech he made on their behalf and for the votes he has given this evening and yesterday evening for the Government proposal; and I do not complain of daughters of your Majesty will be made during your Majesty's reign."

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Preamble."

*MR. GOSCHEN: I think the hon. Member has read in these words more than they meant or were intended to mean. They have no reference to the children of the youngersons or daughters of Her Majesty. The words were taken literally from the Report of the Committee, and I have every reason to believe they met with the approval of the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian, who believed them to be valuable as a precedent.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I do not pretend to understand the legal English of words in Acts of Parliament, which very often are not English at all; but I think that any layman reading the words I have referred to will agree with me that there is no limitation to the children of the Heir Apparent, but that they apply equally to the children of all the children of the Sovereign, whoever and wheresoever they may be. The word "children" is used as extending to Her Majesty's family.

*MR. GOSCHEN: As I read the words they mean that where provision is made for children it shall be made in this way—not that provision shall be made for all.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I think the right hon. Gentleman will admit that the principle is doubtful, but at any rate, although that may be his view, he did not draft the Bill. If the draftsman says the provision was meant to be restricted to the children of the Prince of Wales I am ready to accept that; but I contend that these words do not make such a limitation. Will the right hon. Gentleman make the suggested alteration limiting the Grants to the children of the Prince of Wales? All I want is that this limitation should be inserted in the Bill in clear language.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I want the Committee to take note that Her Majesty does not wish to press her claim on behalf of the children of her daughters; but in the Preamble of the Bill we have a reference made to "Her Majesty's family," and I understand the family to be Her Majesty's children and grandchildren. With regard to the Amendment of the hon. Member for Northampton, I think he had better take care, as his words are to my mind very dangerous words. He uses the words "During your Majesty's reign," and as I understand it Her Majesty does not desire that the provision should go beyond her reign; and this was the view of the Committee. We have done with the families of the younger children of Her Majesty, but if we insert the words "during Her Majesty's reign" we may be opening the way for future claims.

*MR. STOREY: What is objected to here is that the words we desire to get rid of would establish a principle for provision to be made out of Grants for this purpose which have been assigned to the parents. You thus lay down a principle which will be a guide to future Parliaments and would be quoted as a precedent in future reigns for the new Parliament in regard to such provision. Now, suppose the Queen should die, and a new Monarch should come to the Throne, that Monarch having children; the Prince of Wales has children already, some of whom are now married and all of whom may marry and have families. Under these words of the Preamble of this Bill, the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister of a future day might come to Parliament and say, "It is your duty not only to make provision for the new King, but also for his family and their families." These words, in fact, make a wider application of the public money than was ever made before, and will in effect be the laying down of a principle that will enable future Governments to provide not only for the children of the Sovereign but for the families of the children of the Sovereign. I should be glad if the right hon. Gentleman will consent to insert a limitation which will make the meaning which he himself assigned to the words clearer than they are at present. Will he allow the clause to read thus:

"To establish the principle that where provision is made for the children that provision shall be made out of the Grants that are made to the parents."

If he will do that I will not take advantage of his goodness and fairness on the Report. I believe my hon. Friends will say the same.

MR. LABOUCHERE: No.

*MR. STOREY: Then I will speak for myself. But if my hon. Friend will not make the promise, I do not see any hope of prevailing on the Chancellor of the Exchequer to make the slightest change in the Bill. As far as I am concerned I think that this alteration would be an important improvement.

*MR. M'LAREN: I would suggest to the Government that if they cannot accept this Amendment, they should put in words on the Report to make the meaning more plain.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I am really unable to give any pledge, as I really do not know what I shall think on Monday when the Bill passes through Committee. I shall devote Sunday to reading the Bill.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The Government are laying down a principle which may be applied on a future occasion, when the necessity arises that a provision for children should hereafter be made out of Grants to their parents. I cannot hold out any hopes that the words which have been adopted in the Committee by a large majority will be modified.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I am satisfied that the words as they stand are all that can be desired. The provision for the children is "to be made, not out of Grants which might be, but which have been, assigned to their parents."

*MR. STOREY: Will the right hon. Gentleman say whether these words cover the case I have put?

*MR. GOSCHEN: It has been laid down for the guidance of a future Parliament that the proper course would be to make provision, not for each child, but for children generally by Grants to the parents.

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question," put, and agreed to.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 17, to leave out from the word "Family," to the word "have," in line 20.—(Mr. Storey.)

Question put,

"That the words 'and to establish the principle that the provision for children shall hereafter be made out of Grants adequate for that purpose which have been assigned' stand part of the Preamble."

The Committee divided: Ayes 146; Noes 42.—(Div. List, No. 279.)

*MR. STOREY: I will not occupy the time of the House many minutes with the next Amendment, but I do hold it is extremely important that there should be a clear and energetic protest on record which may be quoted hereafter, when in a new reign demands are made upon Parliament under cover of the words which are to be inserted in this Bill. It is impossible for us to resist this being paid, but it is not impossible for us to indicate the views of the minority of this House, which may be quoted hereafter, and if the principle is to be laid down its application ought to be limited to the children of the Sovereign and of the Heir Apparent. Therefore I propose the omission of the words "their parents," with the object of inserting afterwards, "to the Sovereign and the Heir Apparent." The Preamble will then read so as to establish the principle that the provision made by the Grant shall be confined to the children of the Sovereign and the Heir Apparent. These words enable us to indicate clearly what we mean.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, lines 19 and 20, to leave out the words "their parents," and insert the words "the Sovereign."—(Mr. Storey.)

Question put, "That the words 'their parents' stand part of the Preamble."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 134; Noes 38.—(Div. List, No. 280)

THE CHAIRMAN: The next Amendment, which stands in the name of the hon. Member for Northampton, to omit the word "cheerfully," cannot be put without an instruction from the House, as it is part of the framework of the Bill, and it is of so grave importance that it could not be put without special instruction from the House. The Question is that this be the Preamble of the Bill.

MR. LABOUCHERE: But I object to the Preamble on account of the word "cheerfully" which it contains.

THE CHAIRMAN: It is not part of the Preamble. It is part of the granting and enacting words of the Bill, which are not put in Committee at all, and which cannot be modified without an instruction authorising it.

MR. LABOUCHERE: But I object to the enacting portion of the Bill. I am not cheerful.

THE CHAIRMAN: It is part of the framework of the Bill, which is common to all Money Bills, and I say that it cannot be touched without authority from the House. The Question is that this be the Preamble of the Bill.

A Division having been challenged, and the House cleared for a Division, DR. CLARK (sitting with his hat on): What are the words before the enacting portion of the Bill?

THE CHAIRMAN: "Granting and enacting" are the special words which are used in all Money Bills.

*MR. STOREY: Is it possible to move to re-commit the Bill?

THE CHAIRMAN: That is not relevant to the Question now before the Committee.

Question put, "That this be the Preamble of the Bill."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 129; Noes 88.—(Div. List, No. 281.)

Bill reported, without Amendment; to be read a third time upon Monday next.

COINAGE (LIGHT GOLD) (EXPENSES).

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Resolved, That it is expedient to authorise the payment, out of moneys to be provided by Parliament, of any expenses incurred by the exchange of, or payment for, gold coins, under the provisions of any Act of the present Session to amend "The Coinage Act, 1870," as respects Light Gold Coins.

Resolution to be reported upon Monday next.

REVENUE BILL (No. 315.)

As amended, considered; Bill read the third time, and passed.

PAYMASTER GENERAL BILL (No. 348.)

Considered in Committee, and reported, without Amendment; Bill read the third time, and passed.

gress, and ask leave to sit again. I wish to have this Bill referred to the Grand Committee on Law, which seems to me to be the proper body to deal with it. This is one of the Bills which was slipped through last Wednesday without discussion, and the Government did not even take the trouble to explain its nature. I have an objection to it, but I suppose I should not be allowed to make it at this stage.

THE CHAIRMAN: The House has charged the Committee of the Whole House with the Bill, and it must, therefore, deal with it.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I will move, then, that the Order be discharged.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! That Motion is not in order.

Clause 1 to 11 agreed to.

Clause 12.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I am not prepared to go into the details of the Bill. I object to the Bill, and my suspicions have been aroused by the fact that the lawyers have not moved any Amendment to it. If the state of the law which the Bill proposes to consolidate had not been a good one for the lawyers there would have been plenty of Amendments proposed.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! That does not arise on this clause.

Question, "That Clause 12 stand part of the Bill," put, and agreed to.

Bill reported as amended; to be considered on Monday next.

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. PHILIPPS (Lanark, Mid): I notice that Clause 3 of this Bill raises a question of great importance involving, as it does, the safety of trains and railway passengers, and in order to secure increased safety for the traffic, I hold that the hours of labour should be shorter, and when we are in Committee on this Bill I shall move an Amendment placing the limit at eight hours instead of 12. I hope the President of the Board of Trade will see his way to accept that Amendment.

Dr. CLARK (Caithness): This is one of the Bills thrown on the Table of the House without explanation. I have been looking at it, and I must say I think it is very unfair for the Government to pitchfork into this House an important Bill of this nature without any explanation. They ought at least to tell us what their intentions are in regard to it. I am glad the hon. Member who spoke last has given notice that, in Committee, he will move to amend the third clause by inserting eight hours for 12. I see, however, that all the Bill proposes to do in this respect is to call on the companies to make a Return of all of their employés who work more than 12 hours, and I should like to see the Bill amended so as to render it illegal for any railway servant to work over 12 hours in one day. It is not right that the safety of the hundreds of thousands of persons who travel should be left in the hands of men who are working more than 12 hours a day. Now, railways are a monopoly, and I consider that Parliament should have more control over them, and that it should step in and prevent men being compelled, through the competition in the labour market, to work longer than is desirable in the interests of the public safety. Clause 4 raises the question of tickets, and I should like to see the Government modify the existing regulations as to return tickets with a view to allowing passengers to use an out-of-date return half on payment of a sum which would make up the difference in price between the return and the single ticket. In Committee we will try and amend this Bill in the interests of the travelling public. But I repeat that I object to this system of throwing a Bill before us without explanation.

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. Hicks Beach): I think the accusation of the hon. Member is most unfair. Hon. Members who have given attention to this subject know very well that this is the second Bill introduced this Session, and that in moving the first I explained its provisions and effect. Since then I have been in communication with various persons in the country, and have found there would be so much opposition to some of its clauses that it would be impossible to pass it this Session. I therefore withdrew that Bill and introduced this, a modified Bill, carrying out certain important provisions with regard to public safety, to which I believe no objection can be taken. With reference to the observations of the hon. Member for Mid Lanarkshire, it may be well to omit the figure 12 and leave the number of hours beyond which cases of overtime should be returned to be fixed by the Board of Trade from time to time. Any attempt to limit the work of railway servants to eight hours a day and no more would, in my opinion, be not only an impossibility, but would be hurtful, if it could be carried out. What would happen if a man had been at work eight hours and an accident happened? Is he not to remain in order to give what help he can because he would be breaking the law? If the hon. Member for Caithness presses his view the only result will be to make it impossible to carry the Bill this Session. I would further say that there are provisions in the Bill of great importance to the public safety at which the hon. Member has not apparently even looked. The first clause, for instance, provides that the Board of Trade may from time to time order a railway company to do within a time limited by the order any of the following things:—To adopt the block system on all or any of their lines, to provide for the interlocking of points and signals on all or any of their lines, and to provide for all their trains carrying passengers continuous brakes, complying with certain requirements. Let me state briefly to the House some of the facts which appear in the Report to the Board of Trade upon the accidents which have occurred on railways in the United Kingdom during the year 1888, which Report will shortly be in the hands of hon. Members. I find that these accidents are separated under several heads. Head C relates to accidents from trains entering stations at too great speed. The Report says that of these one accident might have been avoided had there been a continuous brake upon the train; that in another accident the automatic action of the vacuum brake prevented any rebound or consequent injury to the passengers; and that in a third the non-automatic vacuum brake failed to act on the connecting pipe becoming detached, which could not have occurred had the brake been automatic. Under another head, E (Collisions at junctions,) the Report says:—

"Of two of these collisions a proper system of block working would probably have prevented the occurrence, and one collision, had the whole instead of a third of the vehicles been fitted with continuous brakes, might have been entirely prevented or its effect lessened."

The accidents at sidings were 16 in number, and three of them were due to the want of absolute block working, two to want of an efficient continuous brake, and in two instances attention was drawn to over long hours of work. Under the head of collisions between engines or trains meeting in opposite directions there were eight accidents. One of these was due to an improper mode of working the block system; one to a disregard of the rules for working, and the absence of block working; one to a want of proper interlocking arrangements. In one instance the continuous brake appeared to have done good service. With regard to the terrible accident at Armagh, by which 78 persons were killed and 260 injured, the official Report to the Board of Trade says:—

"This terrible collision would in all human probability have been prevented had the excursion train been fitted with an automatic continuous brake instead of (as it was) with only a non-automatic continuous brake. . . . Had the block system been in operation the ordinary train would have been standing at Armagh platform, . . . and the results of the collision would have undoubtedly been much less serious."

I think I have said sufficient to show the House the importance and necessity of provisions contained in the Bill which will enable the Board of Trade to enforce upon recalcitrant railway companies regulations which experience has shown to be necessary to safety, and I trust that hon. Members will do their best to aid me in passing the Bill into law.

*MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): I am sure that we who have followed the history of this question will entirely acquit the President of the Board of Trade of a desire to smuggle the Bill through the House or in any way to disguise the nature of its provisions. The proposals now before the House have been repeatedly discussed, and at some length by myself and other Members of the House. There are certain points in regard to this Bill to which I should like to draw attention.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

*MR. CHANNING continued: The hon. Member below the Gangway (Mr. Philipps) has drawn attention to the question of overtime and to Returns proposed in the Bill, and I should like to call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman and the House to the fact that the wording of the clause does not correspond with the overtime Returns to which the Board of Trade consented, and which were moved for in another place by Lord De La Warr. These included a column, giving the number of instances in which railway servants, after having been more than 12 hours on duty were called upon to resume work without an interval of nine hours' rest, and giving the number of hours of rest before they were sent out again. I wish to suggest to the right hon. Gentleman that this should be made quite clear in Clause 3. I am glad to hear he is willing to make the rule for the number of hours an elastic one; and I heartily support the view that anything like a compulsory eight hours' clause would be an impossibility for railway work, and, in fact, the majority of railway servants are against it, and I sincerely hope no hon. Member will imperil the Bill by the attempt to carry such a clause. In these observations, which I desire to make brief, I cannot help expressing my very great regret that certain portions of the original Bill as introduced by the right hon. Gentleman have, owing to the difficult position in which we are placed by the approaching close of the Session and the strong objections raised by some hon. Members, been withdrawn. I am especially sorry the right hon. Gentleman has not seen his way to retain the clause in reference to coupling. Of course I should not be in order in discussing the clauses now, but I should like to say that the Executive Committee of the principal organisation of railway servants have expressed very great regret that this question of couplings has not been dealt with. I think, if the President of the Board of Trade had introduced a coupling clause more in the form in which I dealt with the subject when I had a Bill before the House, and which merely demanded a certain standard of safety in the matter of couplings, instead of drawing the clause in a way that excited special opposition, it is probable the objections might have been met. But I refer to that and to other points more with the view of emphasising them, that they may be dealt with in the future. I do not understand that the right hon. Gentleman admits in the least that he was wrong in introducing these provisions in the original Bill. I believe he does not abandon the principle of dealing with the danger of men going between the buffers of the wagons, and does not abandon the possibility of dealing with this question in the future. I would say the same in regard to another clause omitted from this Bill, the provision as to subways. Upon this very strong feelings have been expressed by groups of people in many parts of the country who have been in communication with myself, and whose views I have felt it my duty from time to time to bring before the notice of the House and the Board of Trade by the best means in my power. It is a subject I sincerely hope the right hon. Gentleman has not dismissed from his mind. I am sure he must be as aware as I am of the great importance of providing for the safety of the public at any rate at crowded junction stations. The right hon. Gentleman naturally bases his Bill on the terrible accidents that have occurred owing to the use of non-automatic brakes, and the partial failures of companies to carry out the "block" system. I have given as much attention perhaps as any Member of the House to the very careful, the admirable Reports of the Inspectors of the Board of Trade, and I think the railway companies do themselves injustice when they quarrel with these Reports. These Reports are most fair to the companies, while the real cause of an accident is indicated with scientific accuracy. A railway company which has distinguished itself by its admirable safety arrangements,—the Brighton Railway Company,—two years ago issued a return of the number of instances in which the automatic brake had prevented serious accidents on their line. Now when we have a company voluntarily coming forward and giving this testimony, and when we have these Reports of Inspectors as to the value of automatic brakes, the case for the present Bill is greatly strengthened. I am sorry that there is no provision in reference to communication between passengers and driver and guard. I will not trouble the House with instances, but there are many in which accidents might have been prevented or mitigated by electric or other means of rapid communication. I mention these matters simply to express the hope that the right hon. Gentleman will, if he has not the opportunity now, give some undertaking with regard to them in Committee, that he will deal with them, meeting the objections of the companies as far as possible, but insuring the safety of the public and railway servants. Meanwhile I support the Second Reading of the Bill most heartily, and hope it will pass unanimously.

Sr M. Hicks Beach

*MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): I do not intend to discuss the Bill now, as the right hon. Gentleman has intimated his intention of considering Amendments to Clause 3. I only wish to say that in the returns furnished of the number of hours of employment, day and night work should be distinguished, because the night work involves the greater strain, and also the intervals of rest between the periods of employment should be marked. I desire also to express regret that anything like opposition to the Bill should have been offered from this side of the House, and my opinion that it would be unwise for Parliament at any time to impose restriction on the hours of labour.

MR. MOLLOY (King's County, Birr): I sincerely regret that the Bill was not introduced sooner. As to the appearance of opposition from this side, I can only say that, so far as I know, there will be none that will impede the passage of the Bill into law. There are some points of the Bill that I would like to criticise in a friendly spirit, but I will not do so now because we shall have another opportunity for doing so.

But I think the right hon. Gentleman if he looks at Clause 1 again, will see that it is somewhat confined and limited in its character to special kinds of brakes. I should like to see powers taken by the Board of Trade to enable them to introduce such rules and regulations as would cover future inventions for the same purpose. I am sorry to note the absence from the Bill of any attempt to deal with what I must call something more than the convenience of third-class passengers. This class of passengers are the mainstay of the whole railway system of the country, but they have to undergo sufferings upon long journeys, such as those in a better position are hardly aware of. I think it is monstrous that these, the strongest supporters of the railway companies, should be treated in the way they are. I will not go into details with which perhaps the right hon. Gentleman is well acquainted. I will confine myself to a general allusion to sanitary arrangements, and when the proper time comes will endeavour to introduce legislation for the better treatment of those who are compelled to travel long distances by cheap and slow trains. I seize the present opportunity of giving public notice that next Session I shall oppose the introduction of every railway Bill, private or otherwise, which does not contain provisions for the better accommodation of third-class passengers. I hope that an honest attempt will be made to secure humane treatment to persons who are compelled to go long distances third class by slow trains.

*MR. M'LAREN (Cheshire, Crewe): I wish to express my acknowledgments to the right hon. Baronet for having introduced this Bill, and I hope he is determined to press it should it meet with opposition. I cannot, however, but express my regret that the coupling clause has been omitted. No doubt the clause as it stood was too stringent, but it is a most important question, and involves the lives of many of the servants of railway companies. The coupling clause was the one clause which made the Bill valuable to railway workers, for there are a sad number of men killed every year by being crushed between the buffers of goods trucks. It is a matter for consideration whether one ought not to try even in the Committee stage to obtain a clause on this subject. I should be sorry to do anything to imperil the Bill, but if the right hon. Gentleman could see his way to introduce some more moderate clause than that which was originally in the Bill, or to accept some moderate suggestion from an independent Member, I am sure it would meet with little resistance—so little resistance that it would in no way endanger the passing of the Bill. If the Government choose to pass the Bill they can do it, as everything depends on the place they put it on the Paper as an Order of the Day. Though I think the original coupling clause was too strong, and gave the Board of Trade too much power, I think a modified clause might be carried without much opposition. But even if the Government do nothing as to coupling in this Bill, I earnestly hope it is the intention of the right hon. Baronet to deal with the matter in some satisfactory manner next Session. It is not right that a few interested persons—not railway companies so much as owners of private railway wagons—should be allowed to stop legislation which is so essential to the working men of the country. I do not think the majority of the House would approve of such opposition as that to which I refer, but even should there be strong opposition, I do not think the Government could spend its time more advantageously to the interests of the country than in pressing forward such Bill. I did not hear the speech of the right hon. Baronet in moving the Second Reading of the Bill. Probably he referred to this matter, but if he did not, perhaps he will be kind enough to take note of what I say, and will deal with the subject, if not this Session, at all events next year.

MR. BRUNNER (Cheshire, Northwich): I do not know how it may be with Gentlemen who differ from me in regard to this matter, but I must say for myself that I was altogether unable to understand the observations of the hon. Member behind me (Mr. Molloy.) It would be a very serious thing if the Government in its attempt to protect the lives of passengers by rail, and the lives of working men, should take on itself to decide what form of carriage what form of coupling and break, is the proper form for railway companies to use. I am of opinion that the lives of passengers and railway men will be safer in the long run, if these matters are left in the hands of those who understand them best. I cordially approve of the pressure of public opinion being applied, through this House or through the Press, to railway managers, to compel them to consider both the safety of the public and the safety of their men; but if we endeavour in this matter—as we have, in my opinion, sadly too often endeavoured in the past—to give Government officials the power to decide what is the precise form of appliances which shall be used in connection with railways, we shall not be providing for the safety of the public or the safety of railway servants. I am glad now to miss from the Bill the clause providing that the form of the carriage shall be such as is approved by the Board of Trade, and with regard to Clause 4, which may possibly lead to a little confusion, I should like to ask a question. Clause 4 proposes that a passenger by a railway shall either produce a ticket or pay his fare, or give the officials his name and address. The bye-laws of a good many companies provide that if a passenger is found in a railway carriage without a ticket he shall be compelled to pay the fare from the point at which the train started. I do not think it ought to be put in the power of the Railway Company to demand this as a matter of right. The officials ought to be in the possession of evidence on the subject, and if they are not I think they ought to be left to suffer from the consequences of their default. At any rate, it does frequently happen that a passenger without a ticket has not in his possession, and probably has not in the whole world, the amount of money necessary to pay the fare from the point at which the train started. I do not know whether it will be convenient or even possible to clear this matter up on this clause, but if it can be done it should be done. I trust that Parliament will do this act of justice, and will prevent railways for the future from making this claim.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Monday next.

FACTORS BILL [LORDS.] (No. 310.)

As amended, considered.

*SIR J. LUBBOCK (London University): I should generally be very chary of proposing to alter any Bill which has gone through the Grand Committee; but, as a matter of fact, when the clause to which I take exception was under discussion in the Committee, several of those who were interested in the question happened to be absent, and the Committee was by no means full. I would ask the Committee to look at the clause. It says—

“When a mercantile agent is with the consent of the owner in possession of goods or documents of title to goods, any sale, pledge, or other disposition of the goods made by him” should be valid. Now, surely, this is sufficient. But if the words “when acting in the customary course of his business as such agent” are retained, they will impose on the purchaser the additional obligation of proving that the sale or pledge is in the usual course of business as such agent, and throw an additional obligation on the purchaser or lender. I have consulted several mercantile Members of the House, and the hon. and learned Members for Inverness and Dumfries, both of whom think that these words ought to be omitted. I am sorry that they are not present. But it was not expected that the Bill would have come on so early. I believe that the words would open the door to endless litigation, and I hope the Attorney General will consent to omit or modify them.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, lines 5 and 6, to leave out the words “when acting in the customary course of his business as such agent.”—(Sir John Lubbock.)

*THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): The hon. Baronet brought this question before the Grand Committee, and I stated at the time that, so far as I could judge of such a technical matter, I thought the clause an exact representation of the law as it stands. I have consulted Lord Herschell and my learned Friend the hon. Member for Inverness. Perhaps the substitution of the words “when acting as a mercantile agent" will meet the views of the hon. Member. If he will withdraw his Amendment I will move to insert those words.

*SIR JOHN LUBBOCK: I am much obliged to the right hon. Gentleman, and will accept his suggestion.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 5, to omit the words "customary course of his business as such agent," in order to insert the words "ordinary course of business as a mercantile agent."—(Sir R. Webster.)

Amendment agreed to.

Bill read the third time, and passed.

MARRIAGES (BASUTOLAND, &c.) BILL [LORDS.] (No. 352.)

Order for Third Reading read.

*MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): It is quite understood, I think, that the point raised by me rather informally on this Bill yesterday will be dealt with?

*SIR R. WEBSTER: We are prepared to provide for instructions to the High Commissioner not only as to the particular point raised by the hon. Member for Northampton, but also as to the other conditions as to notice, and the application being made by the survivor of a marriage.

Bill read the third time, and passed.

COUNCIL OF INDIA BILL (No. 281.)

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [25th July]. "That the Bill be now read a second time."

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

*SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy): I consider this Bill to be one of great importance, and I must express my surprise at the Government having tried for months, without sufficient discussion, to pass the Bill after 12 o'clock at night, when those who are opposed to it happen to be away. Not only I, but many Members who sit on the Benches opposite, have a good deal to say about this question. The Bill is a most important one, and I must say I think we have been hardly used in having had the Bann Drainage Bill put down before it.

Sir R. Webster

It was only by accident that I found out that the Bann Drainage Bill was not to be proceeded with, and it is only because I happened to intimate to several Members who are interested in this Council of India Bill what I had discovered, that anyone at all interested in it is present to discuss the measure. In the few words which the Under Secretary for India addressed to the House at five minutes to 12 the other night, he spoke of the Bill as intended to effect an economy in connection with the Council of India. Well, in my opinion, if this be a matter of economy, that economy might be effected in another way by a reduction of the salaries of the Members, instead of a reduction of their numbers.

MR. T. C. BARING (London): I rise to order. To the best of my knowledge, the hon. Member has already spoken on the Motion.

*SIR G. CAMPBELL: The hon. Member is entirely wrong. I was speaking at 12 o'clock the other night, when the Debate stood adjourned, and I think it very wrong on the part of the hon. Member to attempt to burke discussion. I am sure that the gentlemen serving on the Council would be willing to serve at reduced salaries of £800 instead of £1,200, most of them having either pensions, annuities, or other employments. I said the other night that I believe a large reduction in the number of members of the Council means the beginning of the end—the beginning of the attempt to get rid of an independent Council and the approximating of the body to the position of mere Civil servants. I doubt whether the Council is as efficient as it ought to be, and I think we ought to make it efficient or get rid of it altogether. The burning point of this most important question is whether we are to have a real Council to control the Secretary of State for India and to act as a buffer between Parliament and India, or to have a limited number of councillors whose advice the Secretary of State may take or leave. I say you ought not to make the change now proposed without a full and complete inquiry, but limited to the machinery in this country for controlling the Home Government of India. That is an inquiry which was promised by the noble Lord the Member for Paddington when he was Secretary of State for India. That promise has been repeatedly made to us by different Secretaries for India. We have been repeatedly promised inquiry into the Home Government of India, but no less than 31 years have elapsed since we formally took over the Government of India, and yet the long-promised inquiry has not come. It has always been acknowledged that inquiry is absolutely necessary in regard to the control of the finances of India. The Act regulating the matter has been open to a variety of constructions, and has led to great differences in practice, and the question is whether we are to have a Council entrusted with real power of controlling, or a mere body of expert advisers to the Secretary of State. The intention of Parliament by the Act of 1858 was to make the Council analogous to the Board of Directors of the old East India Company, which acted as a kind of buffer between Parliament and the Indian Government. One of the clauses of the Act is to the effect that the Council is, under the general direction of the Secretary of State, to transact the business in the United Kingdom in relation to the Government of India. No doubt subsequent clauses give the Secretary of State power in exceptional cases to overrule the Council, but that is a very different thing from governing by the Secretary of State advised by the Council. The power of the purse is a very great power. Who controls the purse controls the country. By another clause of the Act of 1858 the Secretary of State has no power in financial matters to overrule the Council, and in such matters he can do nothing without the consent of the majority at a meeting of the Council. That seems to me a very strong provision indeed, and one that puts the Council in a very independent position. And I have authority for that saying. I find that the Under Secretary for India, who, always ready enough and successful enough in claiming for his Department whatever authority was its due, when pressed as to the question of finance asserted that the House had carefully divested itself of control over the finance of India. But notwithstanding this declaration, it was different in the India Office. British Ministers who had held office as Secretaries and Under Secretaries of State did not like to be controlled at all, and therefore they did all they could to whittle away the control over the finances intrusted to the Council of India by Parliament. The doctrine that had been held by several Secretaries of State was that the finances were not controlled at home, but that they were controlled by the Government of India; and attempts had been made successfully to restrict the control of the Council to petty grants of money made in this country. If Her Majesty's Government wish to weaken or destroy the Council of India let them do so fairly in the light of day by a measure aiming at its object directly and frankly explained to Parliament, and not by a measure of this character, attempted to be rushed through its stages at midnight and at the far end of the Session. Let the country have a fair opportunity of considering all that was involved. We must remember that India is an enormous empire with an enormous income, great provinces, and a vast population whose interests there must be great difficulty in representing. As a matter of numbers I do not think 10 is sufficient. For years there has been no representative of Bengal, with its 70,000,000 of people, nor of Assam, and the Central Provinces, and Burmah. These are great departments which are not represented, and which ought to be represented. My hon. Friend, who is likely to second this Motion, has a Motion on the Paper which seems to be very reasonable, and which suggests that there is no representation of the medical department, to which India owes so much, and to which, in future, I hope we will owe a great deal more. I think it is most desirable that on the Council of India you should have a representative of medical men. And I believe it is not so much a matter of money if you desire to establish a Council which shall control the Secretary for India, for there are plenty of Anglo-Indians of great experience and ability, who seek not so much for money as for honourable employment in connection with India; and many admirable men, both paid and unpaid, would render most excellent service to the country. For my part, I very strongly object to that part of the Bill which does not directly diminish the number of he Council, but leaves to the discretion of the Secretary of State for the time being whether he will do so. Seeing the period of the Session at which we have arrived, I do not think we ought to hurry the matter. At the present time there is only one vacancy in the Council. It might be filled temporarily, and the Government might grant a limited inquiry, not going into the whole question of the Government of India, which I grant is far too large. ["No!"] That is my opinion. I should be very glad if we could get it to be a large inquiry; but I ask for the limited inquiry which the noble Lord the Member for Paddington promised. This Bill only deals with the Home Government of India, and I want the inquiry before anything is done. I hope, therefore, that the Government will not press this Bill too hurriedly at the fag-end of the Session, but that they will take a little time, and give the inquiry promised, and then, if necessary, bring in a Bill next year.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words, "This House, while approving of any economy or reduction of salary that may be possible, does not approve of a serious change in the Council of the Secretary of State without a full inquiry into the constitution and working of the official body in this country by which the Government of India is supervised."
—(Sir George Campbell.)

Question proposed "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

*SIR W. GUYER HUNTER (Hackney, Central): Mr. Speaker, I find by the rules of the House that I am precluded from submitting the Amendment which I have on the Paper, in consequence of one having been proposed by the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy, and I can, therefore, only express approval of its terms—

"That no change in the constitution of the Council of India will be accepted which does not make provision for a medical officer being placed on that Body."

I think the Council of India is not a sufficiently representative body. It was established in 1858, on the transference of the Government of India from the East India Company to the Crown. By the Act of 1858 it was settled that the Council of India should consist of not less than 15 members. By Clause 10 of that Act it is provided that the major part of the Council shall be composed of persons who have served or resided in India 10 years. Clause 16 states that after its first formation the supplying of vacancies in the Council shall rest with the Secretary of State. How is it, then, I would ask, that during all those years between 1858 and the present time there has not been an Indian medical officer appointed to the Council? If the Council it is to be a representative body, surely it is only reasonable and just and fair that a medical officer of Indian experience belonging to one of the largest Departments of the Government of India should be entitled to a seat on it. Since the Indian Council was instituted there have been many Indian medical officers who have received the fullest confidence of the Government, and were decorated by the Crown on account of the way in which they have carried out the important duties confided to them. Statistics of the greatest importance affecting the health, welfare, and prosperity of 250 millions of people are received from the Medical Department in India every year by the India Office; and yet there is not an officer on the Council of India who is, in my opinion, in a position to deal with them. Clause 10 does not in any way preclude a medical officer from being appointed, and I therefore ask how it is that a medical officer has never yet been appointed to deal with these huge statistics received every year from India? The present Bill contemplates a reduction of the Council from 15 members to 10 at the option of the Secretary of State; but before such a power is conferred on the Secretary of State, I think some inquiry ought to be made into a matter which is of such grave importance to the people of India. I trust that the House will take into serious consideration the Amendment of the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy, and not pass the Bill until there has been a full inquiry into the constitution of the Indian Council.

*MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): Sir, I have no intention to oppose this Bill, which is a small one. I suppose the Government will at once say that it is difficult enough to get a small Bill through this Session, and that a large one would be impossible. But I have some justification for making one or two observations. Very early this Session I obtained a first place in the Ballot for a Motion relating to the Government of India at home and abroad. I am deprived of that by the Government. I obtained afterwards a second place, and was deprived of that, too. The difficulty of those who consider the Indian question is that there is no occasion with you in the Chair, Sir, on which it is possible to be sure of any discussion relating to Indian affairs. The hon. Member for Kirkcaldy has moved an Amendment, which, if it became the substantive Motion, I should ask to amend, because I utterly differ from him in thinking that any such limited inquiry as he proposes would be sufficient or useful. The reason why I do not oppose the Bill is that it is better to have some economy than none at all. But the economy is not made certain by this Bill. It is in the discretion of the Secretary of State for India for the time being, and there is a very strange peculiarity of change in the wording of the Bill, so far as it deals with these appointments. I do not know whether it is a draftsman's peculiarity, or whether there is a hidden meaning in it. The Bill speaks of these appointments by Her Majesty; but, for some reason or other, the Secretary is substituted for Her Majesty. I quite agree, if the appointments are to be on Ministerial responsibility. There is the difficulty, in relation to the Secretary for India, that we have no means of objecting to him. In the case of every other Member of the Government, the salaries being paid out of the Votes, we have some opportunity of dealing with the various questions which arise. The whole cost of the Indian Home Government is paid by the people of India; the House has no control over it; and there is no manner of means by which we can make the Secretary for India or the other Indian officers amenable to this House, except in direct Vote of Confidence in the Government, which it would be almost impossible to get anyone to listen to. I object that there is much greater need of the general reform of the Legislative Councils than the reduction of the India Council. I object that there is no evidence that the Council of the Secretary of State for India keeps itself in rapport with the Indian people. And it is perfectly certain that there are no sort of relations between it and the English Parliament. The only thing the Secretary for India does, in answer to questions he may be presented with from different portions of this House, is to give us as little information as he possibly can and when it is of comparatively little use to us. If that is all that the Council for India does, I say there is no justification for its existence. I understand the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy to be putting in a sort of plea in forma pauperis for a number of estimable gentlemen connected with the Government of India, with a view to their employment here. That is not a view which commends itself to my mind. There is no evidence, as far as the House of Commons can deal with the matter, that the Council is of the slightest help to the Government of the country. It is suggested that people of India regard it as standing between them and many legitimate reforms, and that they are therefore opposed to its continuance in its present form. When next Session comes, if it ever arrives, I propose to try and submit a scheme of reform for the Council of India, and I can only now express my deep regret that the Government should bring in this amending Bill not dealing with the whole affairs of India, but limited to such a small matter, withholding at the same time all information concerning it. Apparently, the Under Secretary for India has made no inquiries into this matter. If he has, he has kept the result to himself; but I do suggest that the answers he has given in the House this Session have shown his utter incapacity with regard to it.

*GENERAL SIR LEWIS PELLY (Hackney, N.): I notice that whenever an Indian question comes before the House a certain number of hon. Members are anxious to have a count, while the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy is always ready to extend the subject of the Debate. On this occasion the question before us is exceedingly limited, and it is contained within one clause. There is a great deal to be said for what the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy has stated as to the necessity for some inquiry to be made in regard to a certain Constitutional matter; but that is not the business before the House, and we must confine ourselves to discussing the provisions of this clause. Now, I see it is provided that the Secretary of State, if he thinks fit, shall place on record his intention to abstain from filling up any vacancy on the Council. Supposing, however, that a vacancy occurs on the Council, and the Secretary of State does not record "his intention to abstain from filling any vacancy in the Council of India," it is possible that the vacancy might remain for an indefinite period, and I think that such power should not be left to the Secretary of State. There should be some sort of proviso introduced into the clause stating that such intention shall be recorded within a specified period so as to render it obligatory on the Secretary of State either to fill the vacancy or record his opinion within a short period of time. There are many other points concerning the India Council which I should like to deal with, but I fear they do not fall within the scope of this Bill. It has often occurred to my mind that we might have fresher blood in the India Council. There is no reason why men serving in India and passing from appointment to appointment should not pass, say, five years in England and then resume their careers in India. In such a case the man appointed would not remain long enough in England to forget his Indian work, or to deviate from the rules and traditions of the Indian Service, while his experience in both countries would be fresh and valuable to both. As the India Council is merely a consultative body, it might also be of advantage to introduce two, or probably more, experienced, trained, and highly-placed natives of India on it, so as to more amalgamate the Home and Eastern opinions into that Indian Empire, which is after all, as Mr. Disraeli said, a matter of considerable importance to this country. I think also that a consultative body of Indians might advantageously be constituted in India. One great defect in India as compared with this country is the Empire lacks a great and expressive body of upper middle class, and middle class; while we in England are a compact, well-organized body right through the social system from the Sovereign to the masses. There should be a sort of Council in

India somewhat resembling our Privy Council, on which Indian gentlemen of the highest positions could be called up to serve when the Viceroy should chose to receive them. Such a Council would, I think, enable the Viceroy to consult Indian opinion, and to receive suggestions on any great or delicate question of taxation or political change, and thus to render this Body a channel for communicating with the taxpaying population of India.

MR. J. G. SWIFT MACNEILL (Donegal, S.): I do not think I should be justified in forcing a Division on this Bill, although I must confess that I am opposed the principle which it embodies. I look upon it as a feeble attempt to change the administrative system of India, while I cannot help thinking that any effort to grapple with the reform of Indian Administration ought to be complete, final, and far-reaching. Now, Sir, this is a proposal to reduce the number of members of the India Council from 15 to 10. What is this Council? I have no hesitation in saying that the India Council, whether designedly or not, is so afraid that it screens from the eyes of the people of this country the true nature of our Indian Administration, which is a despotism, pure and simple. The India Council is one of the many contrivances—and some of them are of astonishing ingenuity—by which the people of this country are kept unenlightened on Indian Government. Mr. Disraeli, in 1851, asked what is the Government of India? Now, Sir, I do not know in whom the Government of India lies or on whom to fix the responsibility, but I say that this Council of 15 men is one of the many screens by which the responsibility of officials to this House is kept in the dark. John Bright once compared the Government of India with that of Russia; he said that both were precisely the same, only that the population of India was three times that of Russia. I imagine that hon. Members who have preceded me in this Debate will agree that any true and effective reform of this Council ought to lie in the direction of placing it in touch with the people of this country as well as with the people of India; to make it, in short, a truly representative Council. I do not think that at the present time there could be an absolutely elective Council, but I do say that the representative element might be gradually introduced both as regards India and as regards the people of this country. I think the introduction of this Bill is a striking testimony, small as it is, to the efforts of the earnest men, among whom the junior Member for Northampton stands foremost, who have in season and out of season pressed the subject of India on the attention of this House. I do not, however, think the Bill will do much good; on the contrary, it is rather calculated to do harm, but it is significant as showing at all events that the Government are conscious of what is happening there; it shows that they are keenly alive, first of all, to the growing interest and sympathy of the people of this country with India; secondly, to the rise of public opinion in India itself; and, thirdly, to the necessity of making special provision for the great calamities and famines which occur there. This Bill is really a kind of concession to the feeling in England that something must be done—a kind of salve to the national conscience. But, after all, what is proposed is a poor remedy. To reform the Government of India by knocking five men off the present number of the India Council is simply to give a shabby coat of moral whitewash to the sepulchre of corruption and misgovernment in India. I think the term "Indian experience," as applied to members of the Council, is too vague; it might cover the case of an hon. Member who has travelled for a few months in India.

An hon. MEMBER: Ten years' residence in India is the qualification.

MR. MAC NEILL: I thank the hon. Member. That point had escaped my notice in the examination of the Indian statutes. After all, what do the members of the Council do? what power have they? They have a right to enter a protest, if they do not approve of the action of the Secretary of State; but as a fact, from 1858, when the Council was established, down to the present time, there is no record of a single protest on their part, and we are utterly in the dark as to what goes on in the Council. Should all the 15 object to the action of the Secretary for India, they have no power to stop him; he will carry the day in spite of them.

In fact, they seem to do nothing but receive their salary. The Government of India is an irresponsible Government, and I agree that there should be a complete and thorough investigation into affairs connected with Indian Administration in this country. The proper method of reform is not to reduce the number of the members of the India Council by five, but to modify its constitution and introduce the representative principle. We want this country to take into its own hands the direct responsibility for Indian Government; we want the Indian Government to become directly responsible to Parliament. An Act was proposed during the Premiership of Lord Palmerston, which provided that the Secretary of State for India should be assisted by nine officials, and it was very bitterly opposed. Then came Mr. Disraeli's Act, which proposed that the Council of India should consist of 18 people, nine to be nominated by the Government, and the remaining nine to be obtained by some system of election; for instance, four were to be nominated by English natives in India, and five were to be elected in great commercial centres—such as London, Liverpool, Manchester, Glasgow, and Belfast. That, however, was not carried. I do suggest that instead of initiating reform by reducing the number of the India Council, it would be better to introduce the elective principle as far as regards five of the members, of whom two might be elected by the English population in India, for one of the bitterest complaints of Englishmen in India is that they have no voice whatever in the management of the affairs of that country. There is a still stronger objection to the Bill, and that is that the Council of India as it stands is a complete reversal of the system under which it was established, and any change in the Council at the present time would be to endorse that reversal. I am sorry there is no one of Indian experience on the Treasury Bench to

MR. R. N. FOWLER (London): The Secretary for War is here.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL: Move the adjournment of the Debate.

MR. MAC NEILL: I hope the natives of India will see how their interests are treated in this House by the Government of India. I have the interests of the natives at heart; I have the interests of suffering humanity at heart. I have taken the trouble to go into these matters; I make certain charges against the Government of India; and if those charges are wrong then they ought to be refuted. Why is the responsible Minister of the Crown not present to-night? Again, I repeat that this Council is one of the many contrivances for concealing from the people of England the true nature and the despotism of the Indian Government. I will take the hint of my hon. Friend and move the adjournment of the Debate, on account of the Under Secretary of State for India not being in his place, or perhaps I had better do it at the conclusion of my speech. I charge the Indian Government with having reversed their policy since 1870. I say the original arrangement was that all Government measures should be initiated by the Indian Government and reviewed by this Council of 15 gentlemen, and that, finally, the Secretary for India should either approve or veto the Bill. But that is now all reversed. This Council is a mere gingerbread organisation. I ask the House to bear this in mind, and to attempt to realise the sufferings of the 200 millions of their fellow-subjects in the far East. Let it exercise its great powers on behalf of these people, let it appreciate its vast responsibilities towards them. For whom does this Council legislate? Whom does it advise? The State income of India which these gentlemen have the power of dealing with, is almost an incalculable sum. It amounts to £77,000,000, and of that amount not one penny is contributed by the free will of the people. In 1837 the income of the United Kingdom was £30,000,000 less than that of India is now. I have always found that Gentlemen on the opposite side of the House, when their instincts as gentlemen and Christians and human beings are appealed to are ready to respond to the appeal, and I ask them to look at the facts of this case in the interests of humanity, and not to allow matters of this kind to be rushed through the House of Commons at the fag-end of the Session with only a few Members present and the Under Secretary of State absent.

Mr. Mac Neill

Any reform of this Council should in my opinion be based on the elective principle. If there were only 15 members elected even by the English speaking people of India, would the Under Secretary stay away now? Of course he would not. His 15 members are simply Gentlemen who will envelope him in a cloud of irresponsibility. My hon. Friend the Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir G. Campbell) has said he is glad Indian affairs are not administered on a Party principle. Theoretically he is right, but I am sorry in some respects, for I think that if this were a mere Party question we should have numbers of men present on both sides of the House. It being a question which affects the happiness of millions, we have not a responsible Minister of the Crown present even to read what his Indian instructors tell him. Fox, in 1797, went out of power, and lost wealth and many friends on account of an Indian principle. I was recently reading some of Fox's private correspondence at the time the Debate was coming on that was to crush him, and he said—

"I do not care for myself. I do not care for my future career. I have felt it incumbent on me, and my imperative duty when so many millions are, I know, dependent on my exertions, to do my best for them."

Where, I ask, is that feeling now? Are we to abandon these people? Certainly, as far as I have power in this House I will not do it. I will now move the Adjournment of the Debate.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I think the Motion is quite justified. I listened attentively to the speech of my hon. Friend. It showed not only deep feeling for the people in India, but a close acquaintance with the facts bearing on their condition, and I think it is not considerate to the House, and not fair to the people of India themselves, that the Minister who ought to attend to this business should not pay my hon. Friend the ordinary respect of being present during the Debate. By way of emphasizing the complaint of my hon. Friend, I beg to second his Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Mr. Mac Neill.)

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): The Government are not able to assent to this Motion for Adjournment, and I am surprised that, of all people in the world, the hon. Member for Donegal should have made it. He has made a speech to which he expects the Government to reply, and, in order to give them the opportunity of replying, he moves the Adjournment of the House, and so prevents them replying. I am quite sure that on second thoughts he will see that it is much better to afford us an opportunity of replying to his arguments. I am sorry that my hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for India (Sir John Gorst) is not present. His absence is unavoidable, but I think he is one of many who were not aware that this Bill was likely to come on at this time. It is quite true that my hon. Friend represents the Government of India, but it is also true that the Government of India is represented by Her Majesty's Government as a whole. I do not allow for a single moment that India is represented solely by my hon. Friend. Every Member of the Cabinet is as responsible, and much more responsible, than my hon. Friend the Under Secretary.

Mr. SEXTON: As the right hon. Gentleman undertakes to reply himself, and explains the absence of the Under Secretary, I hope my hon. Friend will withdraw the Motion for the Adjournment.

Mr. MACNEILL: I beg to withdraw the Motion.

*Sir R. N. FOWLER: I would remind the House that my right hon. Friend the Secretary for War was, during three years, Under Secretary of State for India, and during the five subsequent years represented the Conservative Party on Indian questions on the Front Opposition Bench, so I think the House will feel that it will not suffer by the Government of India being represented on the present occasion by my right hon. Friend.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question again proposed.

*Sir R. LETHBRIDGE (Kensington, N.): I must say I share very strongly the regrets that have been expressed that the Government have felt it to be their duty to press on this unfortunate Bill at the fag-end of the Session, and at a period when so many hon. Members who take an interest in the question are absent from the House. The hon. Member for Donegal (Mr. MacNeill) laid much stress on the fact of the absence of my hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for India. I do not attach much importance to that fact, though I am quite sure my hon. Friend will regret very much that he was not present when he knows that this Bill has come on. In support of what was said by the hon. Member for the City of London (Sir R. Fowler), let me say that there is, perhaps, no Member of the House unconnected officially with India, whose words are more thoroughly accepted upon Indian questions, than the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War (Mr. Stanhope). I regret the course Her Majesty's Government have felt it their duty to take, all the more because I am convinced that my noble Friend the Secretary of State for India and my hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State are, in pressing on this Bill, animated by admirable motives in themselves. I have no doubt that the motive that they have put before the House prominently—namely, that of saving £5,000 a year to the taxpayers of India, is the real and sincere motive which influences them, but behind them are those who have motives other than that very excellent one. I say that is an excellent motive; and any proposal that tends to cut down the home charges of the Government of India deserves the full and most careful attention of the House. The reduction of the home charges of the Government of India is in my opinion what ought to be the key-note of every Indian financial reformer; but surely it will be admitted by the Government that some sort of inquiry as to the best form of reduction of expenditure ought to be instituted before rushing through a Bill of this character almost without explanation, merely on the ground that it does save £6,000 a year. After all, what is £6,000 when we consider the enormous charges that are placed on the taxpayers of India for the sustenance of the India Office year after year?

It is a mere bagatelle; and, therefore, I think the House before it assents to the proposition to make this infinitesimal reduction in the expenditure in the India Office, might fairly demand to be informed whether there are not other means of saving which would save a great deal more, and do no greater harm to the efficiency of the administration of India. I maintain that this reduction of expenditure begins at the wrong end. It is almost generally admitted that the power of the Secretary of State is rather too large than too small. It is universally admitted that his knowledge of the special wants of India must rather be too little than it can ever be too great, and that the only check or control over the despotic power of the Secretary of State in exercising the supreme ultimate power over the affairs of India is the advice of this consultative Body, the Council of India. I do not wish to attribute ignorance of Indian affairs to the noble Lord who now rules at the India Office, because I am aware he has given his best attention to, and endeavoured to inform himself of, every concern of the great dependency of India; but it is almost in the nature of things necessary that the supreme ruler of all the India Office, the Secretary of State, should be, to a large extent, ignorant of the special circumstances of the various provinces of India. I maintain that to diminish the number and the authority of those who constitute a check on the despotic power of the Secretary of State is clearly to maim and to injure that check; it is clearly to quench the sources of light to which the Secretary of State can alone look to obtain a correct appreciation of the various facts that are put before him. This Bill might fairly be called a Bill to render the Secretary of State absolutely despotic, and absolutely independent of Indian public opinion. Probably it will be said that ten is a number sufficient to attain the objects for which the Secretary of State's Council is constituted. Before we can assent to the proposition that the number of 10 is sufficient, and that the number of 15 is therefore redundant, it is only fair the House should obtain from Her Majesty's Government some information as to the present constitution of the Secretary of State's Council, and as to how far it is representative of the various countries that form that great Empire, and of the very numerous and divergent interests that have to be considered in India. In the first place, I would ask Her Majesty's Government to inform the House whether there has been any attempt made to obtain upon the Council of the Secretary of State any representation, whether adequate or inadequate, of the opinion of the natives of India. I would ask, are there any representatives of the Princes and the Chiefs of India, those whose hereditary rank or present position there entitles them to consideration in these matters? It will not do for the Government to tell us they could not induce these Princes and Chiefs to come over here. Why, in the Distinguished Strangers' Gallery of this House we sometimes see these Chiefs. We meet them at various social functions in the City of London. We know, as a fact, that they do come and reside for long periods of time in this country, and I do think that if the Government were to make the attempt there would be very little difficulty in obtaining some adequate representation of the Princes and Chiefs of India in the India Office at Westminster. I ask, has there been any attempt made to obtain a representation of the opinion of the English educated natives of India—that class which is sometimes called, I hope not opprobriously, the Baboos of India? I am convinced there is not a single official connected with the Government of India who would not gladly welcome some opportunity of consulting that opinion and of knowing what are the wishes of that increasing and important class in India. The junior Member for Northampton (Mr. Bradlaugh) attempts to speak on behalf of the English educated natives. He speaks with great ability, great intelligence, and great industry; but, of course, he does not speak with that authority that would attach to the utterances of an Indian gentleman speaking in the Council Chamber at the India Office. Then, again, my hon. Friend the Member for Hackney (Sir Guyer Hunter) has already laid before the House the claims to be represented in the Council of India of that great Medical Service which, from the earliest period in the history of our connection with India, has taken a most important and honourable share, not only in their own scientific and technical work, but in the general administration of the Empire. There are also many other great scientific and technical Departments, to which allusion is often made in the House of Commons, and which are sometimes known as the Unconvenanted Departments. The members of these Departments are more numerous than those of the regular Civil Service, and yet, never in the history of India, has a single representative of these bodies ever found a place in the Secretary of State's Council. Now, let us consider for a moment whether, apart from the question of representation, it is expedient that the members of the Council should be diminished. Surely, first of all, we should inquire whether it is not possible that some methods might be devised for improving and strengthening that Council. The hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir G. Campbell) told us very rightly that the best thing that could happen for the interests of India would be that the Council should be not only thoroughly representative, but also should have more power to insist upon its opinion being listened to by the Secretary of State. I do not for a moment suggest that the expert advisers of the Secretary of State should be permitted to have power by law to override the settled opinion of the Secretary of State, still less the settled policy of Her Majesty's Government. This House recognises that in all Indian questions, as in all other questions, the policy of Her Majesty's Government must be paramount, and that, therefore, no experts, whether at the India Office or anywhere else, can be allowed to override the opinion of the Secretary of State and the settled policy of the Government. But I do think there might be some method devised by which the experts at the India Office should be strengthened rather than weakened, as they will be by this Bill. I would suggest they might have the power of demanding the publication of the Minutes of Dissent, which we know are recorded at the India Office. What happens at present? The Minutes of Dissent are put in the pigeon holes and never heard of again. [Mr. STANHOPE: They can be moved for.] It is suggested they can be moved for in this House. Yes, but if they are moved for how often will the Government produce them? I have known occasions when they have been moved for, I think, by my right hon. Friend himself, and when they have been refused. If the experts had power by law to require the publication of the arguments by which they had endeavoured to influence the opinion of the Secretary of State, it would be a very different reform to that which is proposed by my hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State—namely, to do away with a large section of the Council altogether. I admit that, in all probability, the abolition of a large number of the technical expert advisers of the Secretary of State will render the life of the Secretary of State and the Under Secretary of State, and especially the life of the Permanent Under Secretary, and of permanent officials, a somewhat easier one. Possibly there will be less friction; but I maintain that friction is a wholesome element in our Administration, and ought not to be absent from the India Office any more than it is absent from any part of our Administration. Why, the policy of the Government in every other Department of the State can be discussed here in Committee of Supply, can be discussed at full length, conversationally and otherwise; but there is absolutely no opportunity for a free and general discussion of the grievances of the 200 millions of our Indian fellow-subjects. Therefore it is all the more necessary that this Council to whom falls the power and the duty of offering to the Secretary of State the advice which might otherwise be offered in this House, should be strengthened rather than weakened. If that Council be done away with, it is quite possible there will be no impediment, or, at any rate, very little impediment, to any attempt to carry out all the elaborate theories that have been worked out in the arm-chairs of philosophers in England. But that is not what we want in the administration of the Indian Empire. There is no one who feels this more than the Secretary of State for War. Therefore, I appeal to the right hon. Gentleman and to the Government to listen to the protests that have been made this evening unanimously from every part of the House against this Bill, the effect of which will be to increase the despotic power of the Secretary of State, and to perpetuate his unavoidable ignorance. I appeal to the right hon. Gentleman to accept the Amendment of the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy, and then, on the strength of the inquiry, to come down to the House and present us with a full and elaborate measure of reform which will confer lasting benefit on the Empire of India.

MR. E. STANHOPE: In addition to expressing the regret I naturally feel at the absence of the Under Secretary of State for India (Sir J. Gorst), who is much more recently conversant with the subject than I can attempt to be, I have also to express my regret that I have not heard the whole of the Debate. I missed one or two of the earlier speeches, but much of what I have heard scarcely comes within the scope of the Bill. The hon. Members for Kirkcaldy and Northampton have proposed that there should be a general inquiry into the administration of India, and have urged that inquiry should precede legislation. I quite agree that the time may come, and come soon, when it will be desirable that there should be such an inquiry. There have, periodically, been such inquiries. But this opens out a larger field than is necessary at the present moment. The hon. Members who have spoken have advocated abolition of the Council as it is at present constituted rather than an inquiry into its working. Perhaps it is worth while, therefore, in a few words to explain the grounds upon which the present Council was established, and the grounds upon which I think it may fairly command public confidence. The Council of the Secretary of State does not attempt to govern India, and it was not constituted for that purpose; the Council of the Secretary of State is mainly a Court of Review, and as such it was constituted. When an hon. Member speaks of the Council as an ingenious device for screening the action of the Government of India from the observation of Parliament and this country, all I can say is, that it was deliberately adopted as a means by which the policy of the Government of India should be reviewed and made known to the House of Commons. The three main objects attempted to be achieved in the constitution of the Council are—first, that it should consist of independent members, men who have served their time in India and are selected for the Councils when, for a considerable period of years, they are in a position of absolute independence—

MR. MAC NEILL: There is a special provision for their re-appointment.

MR. E. STANHOPE: I am quite aware of the provisions of the arrangement to which the hon. Member refers, but I do not think for a moment that any of the eminent gentlemen who have been placed on the Council, and who, I am quite sure, have retained the confidence of the governing classes in India and in this country, I am quite sure that they are incapable of being influenced in their proceedings and their advice by the consideration of whether or not their services will be continued at the end of a term of years. I repeat, they are a body perfectly independent of the Government of the day, and I am bound to say they continually show their independence, differing, as they often do, in the strongest manner from the policy of the Government of the day, and doing their very best to turn that policy in the direction they think best for the good of India. In the second place, the Council is chosen from men of Indian experience, men who have had experience in all parts of India, so that at any given time there are members of the Council who have had experience of any part of India concerned in any particular matter. Lastly, the Council is composed of men with fresh Indian experience. I am sure hon. Members will agree that it is desirable that the Secretary of State should have the advantage of council from men whose experience of India is fresh rather than from men who have spent a great number of years in this country after leaving India. They are men, too, who are entirely independent of our Party politics. That is of foremost consequence to the Government of India, and anything tending to a diminution of that independence of Party politics would inflict a grave harm upon the Government of India. Now, several hon. Members have spoken of the desirability of placing the Minutes of dissent before the House of Commons; but that, I believe, would be one of the most mischievous proceedings that could possibly be taken. There are occasions when, no doubt, it is highly desirable that these Minutes should be produced. There was a famous occasion of which I had full knowledge at the time of the Afghan War, strong feelings were raised among men of Indian experience and there were great differences of opinion on the Council of the Secretary of State, and in such cases I believe it is greatly to the advantage of the country that men of Indian experience should have the opportunity of placing their opinions before Parliament. But if that is going to occur over and over again and, perhaps, every year, the result will be we shall have Members of the Council playing to the Gallery of the House of Commons and not thinking solely and entirely of the interests of India as they do at present. Members of the Council being but human, and possibly Party men, would naturally have in view the presentation of their opinions to Parliament; and it is utterly impossible to conceive that the conduct of the business of India in the Council of the Secretary of State would be so satisfactory as it undoubtedly is at the present time. One suggestion for a change in the Council is that it should become a purely representative body. That is a matter which, as the House is aware, was a good deal considered at the time when the Council was originally constituted. Among other proposals was one that the commercial interests of this country should be represented on the Council. Well, I think, and in this I am expressing my own individual opinion, that there is no danger, constituted as the House of Commons is, of the commercial interests of this country not being fully considered in matters relating to the Government of India. The commercial opinions of the country can be heard in the House of Commons, and they are heard, and they undoubtedly exercise, in regard to Indian commercial matters, an influence which many people connected with India think excessive, and certainly I do not see any reason for increasing it. Then as to the proposal for native representation on the Council of the Secretary of State, that is a suggestion I am sure no hon. Member could make who has thought out the objections and the consequences. It is a suggestion that no Government could think of adopting unless they saw their way to establishing it on a principle very different to that indicated to-day. The question before us now is whether the Council of the Secretary for India is too large or not. There is no doubt that the reduction of the Council in the manner proposed would conduce to economy, and in matters of India administration economy is of the first importance, but the Bill is not primarily based on considerations of economy. The question is whether or not a Council of 15 is the best that can be imagined for the business to be transacted. This is a matter which, as the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy knows, has often been considered both in the House and outside. There have been proposals for 7 members, for 10 members, and again for 18; but every hon. Member who has been connected with the India Office has had to consider the subject. It fell to my lot when I was at the India Office to give close attention to the subject, and I confess the conclusion that I arrived at, and the conclusion that I am sure has been arrived at by almost all who have since been connected with the Government of India, is that the Council is too large. It is composed of members entirely devoted to the service of India who give the greatest possible assistance to the Secretary of State, but what I believe would be achieved by reducing the number of members would be an increase in the sense of responsibility upon each individual Member. The weak point about the constitution of the Council is that with so large a number of Members the sense of responsibility upon each is not sufficiently great. Therefore the ground upon which I would commend the Bill to the attention of the House is, that I believe a moderate reduction of the Members on the Council will tend to increase the sense of responsibility, and will render the assistance which the Council gives to the Secretary of State for the time being more efficient and more satisfactory than it has been in the past.

*SIR W. PLOWDEN (Wolverhampton, W.): We have a new and most curious argument in support of the Bill from the right hon. Gentleman. We were told a few nights ago by the Under Secretary for India that this Bill was advanced in the interest of economy; but we are now told by the more responsible Minister of the Crown that this is not so much a matter of economy as to secure greater responsibility by reducing the number of members on the Council. Of course, the logical conclusion to the right hon. Gentleman's argument would be the Government proposal to reduce this Body, which cannot be relied upon, to feel a due sense of its responsibility, to proper limits. But that is not what is done by the Bill. It is far from what is attempted to be done. The Bill does not reduce absolutely, but only gives a permissive power to the Secretary of State to reduce; and yet we are told by the Secretary for War, in the most guileless manner—in a manner, I confess, we should not have listened to from the hon. Gentleman who represents the Government of India in this House—that the sense of responsibility is to be largely developed by reducing the number from 15 to 10. But the Bill does not reduce the number on the Council to 10.

MR. E. STANHOPE: A discretion is left to the Secretary of State to retain the assistance of any member whose services may be so valuable that it is desirable he should not be excluded from the Council.

*SIR W. PLOWDEN: Very good; I accept that statement, but an absolute reduction of 15 to 12 would still give room for the addition of gentlemen whose services might be considered indispensable. If the right hon. Gentleman's argument for responsibility is good, the reduction to 12, at all events, should be absolute and not permissive. I regret extremely that while we are permitted two or three hours for the discussion of a petty Bill like this, we cannot have a single discussion throughout the Session on the great questions that arise on Indian administration generally. Two points have cropped up in this discussion, and one has been dealt with in an extraordinary manner by the right hon. Gentleman. I was grieved to hear him commit himself to the expression of an opinion that it was not possible in any regulated manner to accept the principle of representation on the Council—a principle that has been strongly advocated, not only on this side, but by Gentlemen sitting opposite. The right hon. Gentleman has told us that any such suggestion comes from those who have not thought out in full how the representative principle could be recognised in any way. Now that is a matter that has been thought out.

MR. E. STANHOPE: The representation of natives of India on the Indian Council was what I referred to.

*SIR W. PLOWDEN: How the representation of the Indian people could be applied to the Indian Council the right hon. Gentleman cannot see, but it is really a simple matter to deal with. Though it has not been prominently brought before the British public it is notorious to those conversant with Indian administration that the representative principle is thoroughly adopted and is at the bottom of the whole system of village administration in Northern India; so you have that as a good starting point. From that system which is admitted and has gone on from century to century in the north of India you might adopt a method that would give a real native representation on the Indian Council. There is no difficulty that the Local Government of India could not deal with in this matter. Upon this special matter—the reduction of the Council—I will only say that a Bill of this nature is most undesirable—we want a much more thorough reform. If it is desirable to reduce the number of members on the Secretary of State's Council it should not be done in a permissive manner, it should be done at once, not leaving open the possibility very much on the cards at present of there being no reduction at all. Economy is a very small matter and does not come within the consideration of the Government; the main and important matter is that the Council should be constituted in the best manner to secure the end you have in view. The right hon. Gentleman speaks of the freshness of experience on the Council, and there I confess the freshness of the right hon. Gentleman's view rather startled me. I take the last case but one of the appointment of a Gentleman to the Indian Council. Sir John Strachey is a distinguished man in

Sir W. Plowden

Indian affairs, and has held the highest office in India having been for a short time Viceroy, but he was not appointed to the Council immediately on his return home; he was left out in the cold for a considerable time, and not until after he had resided in England for some years was he appointed, and, meantime, men very much his juniors were appointed. I take this as an illustration to show that the formation of the Council is not precisely carried out in the way indicated by the right hon. Gentleman. I will go a little further in examination of the principle upon which the Indian Council is constituted. It is composed almost entirely I might say entirely of officers who have held high positions in the Indian Government, but who from the very nature of their position, were cut adrift from Indian opinion for years before they left India. The men who really know what is going on in India occupy a much more subordinate position. Those who administer districts or command regiments are brought into touch with native opinion, and can tell you what are the native views; but the men you select for the Council are those who have been Lieutenant-Governors, or who have filled high offices which altogether shut them out of touch with native opinion for years before they leave India. It would be much more desirable to appoint men fresh from active administration, and who would afterwards go back to India. The hon. Baronet opposite (Sir Richard Temple) is ready to repudiate all I have said, and I admit he is a high authority on Indian subjects, but he cannot deny that, occupying the high position he did, he was not able to consort with or listen to the voice of public opinion among the natives of India, and, therefore, to that extent he would be a less satisfactory representative than those much younger in the Indian service than himself. I shall oppose the Bill with the greatest satisfaction.

*SIR RICHARD TEMPLE (Worcester, Evesham): The hon. Member for Wolverhampton, who has just sat down, must not suppose that I am at this late hour going to answer him in detail, or to discuss with him what may or may not be the value of such knowledge as I have acquired in India in the positions

I have held there from the bottom to the top. The only thing I shall allude to is the disparagement which he seems to cast on the speech of my right hon. Friend the Secretary for War. I venture to assure my Parliamentary comrades that the speech of the right hon. Gentleman was distinguished by very sound knowledge of Indian affairs, and that he has preserved his recollection quite accurately, although he has recently been occupied in a different sphere of public duty. This Debate upon a small point regarding the Indian Council seems to have been made a peg on which to hang a discursive dissertation on everything in general regarding India; but may I endeavour to recall the attention of the House for a moment to the real question before us? The question is not whether India is well or ill governed, whether the natives are happy or the reverse, or whether the representative system is good as compared with the present system, but simply whether 15 members or 10 members should be the number of the Secretary of State's Council in London. That is the plain and simple issue the House is called upon to decide. It so happens that legislative sanction is necessary to enable the number to be altered from 15 to 10. It may appear strange that the attention of this sovereign assembly of British Members should be for a moment turned to so small a subject, but it happens to require legislation, and therefore the opinion of the House must be taken. The question is whether 10 or 15 is the best number for the Council. The hon. Member who has just sat down is quite under a mistake in supposing that the Secretary for War said that economy was not to be considered in the matter. What the right hon. Gentleman said, as I understood, was that not only economy but efficiency is to be considered, but certainly economy is not to be disregarded. Why the very Gentlemen who now disparage this economy are those who for years have been urging the attention of the House to the growing home charges of the Government of India, and now the first time an attempt is made to save a few thousands without any sacrifice of efficiency we find them objecting. Now do ten Members constitute sufficient strength for the Council? I will ask the House for a moment to consider what representation the number of ten would give. You might have two distinguished officers as representing the Army, one the European, one the Native Army. You might have three distinguished Covenanted civilians, one for each of the three great provinces of India. You might have one eminent Jurist of the position of the late Sir Henry Maine, one officer of engineers as representing all the great railways and public works in India; you might have a gentleman drawn from the commercial classes of India; one representing the banking community; and you might have one drawn from the medical service considering the growing importance of all matters relating to medical and sanitary science, and I say this in deference to the distinguished authority on my right, the hon. Member for Central Hackney (Sir Guyer Hunter). That gives you the number of ten, and I would ask the House to consider whether that would not give a fair representation of the great elements of Indian Administration setting aside always the question of representative institutions. It is said this reduction would diminish the check upon the despotic power of the Secretary of State. But why? Can it be said that the number of 15 afford a better check than the number of 10? Surely it is not numbers that constitute a check; it is weight, power, and capacity upon the Council? I quite agree with my right hon. Friend, there is more likely to be a sense of responsibility in a smaller than in a larger number. Though I have not had the honour to sit on the Council of India, yet I have had a great deal to do with Councils in my life, and I must say I greatly prefer a small to a large Council. The House must remember also that besides the members of the Council of India, there are Secretaries in each Department, each one an officer of the widest Indian experience, and of the highest public character. And now as to the publication of the Dissenting Minutes of members of the Council. Whenever these relate to any matter of great public importance, and it is of public advantage that they should be published, they can be moved for and given. It will be in the recollection of the House that last year, in relation to an important matter, to which the attention of the House was called, I had the honour to move for some of these dissents, and at once they were granted by the Secretary of State, and laid on the Table of this House. So much for the measure before the House, which, I submit, is well-framed, and deserving of our support. But there are just one or two other things that have been mentioned to-night by the hon. Member for Donegal (Mr. MacNeill) which ought not to pass without challenge from this side. In the first place the hon. Member made remarks reflecting unduly on the zeal and public spirit of the members of the Council in England. No more deserving body of public servants exists. They do not sink into an inert state, as the hon. Member supposes. They are thoroughly representative men of the highest character, of the widest experience, and the most distinguished record, and they continue to apply themselves in the evening of life to their duties and the Public Service with all that assiduity and diligence that they have always evinced in their prime. The hon. Member also said something as to the sufferings of the people of India. Well, I do not deny that there is misery in India, but it is nothing like the misery you have in London or in any centre in Europe or across the Atlantic. From my personal knowledge of India I can affirm that there is no country in the world, civilised or uncivilised, where there is so little misery—apart altogether from the cases of famine—as India. And those cases have served to bring into action some of the most humane and beneficent exertions in the annals of mankind. The hon. Member may shake his head as he likes, but that is the imperishable record which the British Empire in India has achieved. Then some mild sort of aspersion has been thrown upon the House of Commons with regard to its conduct of Indian affairs. I am bound to say that the new democracy under the recently extended franchise has returned more Members to the House of Commons who are acquainted with Indian matters than there have ever been in any previous Parliament. In my opinion the House exercised a wise discretion in relegating its powers to the authorities whom it has by its own legislation constituted in India. It is quite right that there should be a controlling power in England, but you can have only one Executive Government, and that must be in India. The hon. Gentleman opposite and his Friends would transfer the Government of India to this House—to their side of the House I suppose. They look forward to having the Government on their side.

MR. MAC NEILL: Yes; very soon.

*SIR R. TEMPLE: Well, it is the duty of this House to set up a good Government in India, and, having established it, to leave it alone. Supposing the Government were transferred to England I would ask whether this House is fitted to exercise the authority. Looking at the factions into which the House is divided, and the party spirit which governs our debates, we cannot say that it is. In this very debate hon. Members on the other side of the House have all spoken against the Bill, while we on this side are speaking in favour of it.

*MR. BRADLAUGH: I beg the hon. Member's pardon. I commenced by saying that I did not oppose the Bill.

*SIR R. TEMPLE: I beg the hon. Member's pardon. I did not hear his speech, and I am sure that with his usual impartiality the hon. Member would not speak against the Bill from a Party point of view. But I think my remark is applicable to the other speeches from the opposite Benches. Then the proposal has been made by the hon. Member for Donegal and the hon. Member for Wolverhampton that an elective element should be added to the Council in London. That is a matter the hon. Member for Northampton has taken great interest in as regards the Council in India, and there is something to be said for it in India. But it is proposed to put Indian representatives on the Council of the Secretary of State for India in Whitehall, and I am astonished that my hon. Friend the Member for North Kensington should have advocated that the Indian Princes should be represented on this last-named Council. How are they to leave their States and their governments, and cross over the water to England?

*SIR R. LETHBRIDGE: When I spoke of Princes and Chiefs of India, I, of course, did not mean—and the hon. Member will know I could not mean—the Princes of the independent or feudatory States of India, but those great noblemen of India who are customarily known there as Princes or Chiefs.

*SIR R. TEMPLE: The same thing applies to the great noblemen. How are they to leave their estates and their great interests in India in order to come and legislate here? But all I desire to do is to express my dissent from any such arrangement. If you had a representative Council of that kind established in London it would gradually claim to absorb a great deal of Executive power, and then you will have the people of India subject to a dual Government—one sitting at Calcutta, the other in Whitehall. That would greatly endanger the stability of our Empire in the East. With these few general remarks I beg to record my hearty support of the Bill.

Question put, and agreed to.

MOVABLE DWELLINGS BILL (No. 316.)

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

MR. STEPHENS (Middlesex, Hornsey): As the hon. and learned Member for Stockton (Sir H. Davey), and other Members, intended to oppose this Bill, and waited in the House a considerable time with that object, I think I must appeal to the sense of fairness of the House by moving, Sir, that you report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Stephens.)

MR. BURT (Morpeth): It is a considerable time since the Second Reading was carried, and the hon. Member has had ample opportunity to put down any Amendments. I must say I consider him rather unreasonable in making a Motion of this kind.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): I would appeal to my hon. Friend to withdraw his Motion. This is a Bill which, perhaps under a different form, has been before the House for a very long time, and although the hon. Gentleman may have some objections to the measure on matters of detail, I cannot think he can wish that the law should remain as at present in such a state that persons living in vans should go about from one end of the country to the other without supervision either as to sanitary matters or education. This Bill, without inflicting any hardship on any class of the community, will provide for the sanitary regulation and education of these people. I hope the hon. Gentleman will not persist in his Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. STEPHENS: I am strongly opposed to this Bill and as I think this clause in particular is entirely unworkable and most cruelly oppressive, I propose to vote against it. The authority under the clause is the County Council, and, as the House is aware, the County Councils are new bodies, and they already have duties more onerous and extensive than they are able to discharge. This is sufficiently proved by the fact that only a short time ago a Bill introduced into this House to transfer a great number of duties of various kinds to the County Councils was deprecated by the County Councils, or at any rate by some of them, and I was deputed, on the part of the County Council of Middlesex, to ask that the time for placing those duties on the County Council should be deferred. When you come to look into this Bill the extraordinary unworkable character of it is at once apparent. The County Councils in most counties meet at rare intervals. The County Council of Wiltshire, for instance, meets only about four times a year. This means that the administration of this Act will be practically transferred to an official, and that official cannot be under any effective control. There is no need to point out the very great risk of corruption which might ensue. How is the registration to be carried out? Is the van to be taken to the inspection, or is the inspector to go to the van? I presume that the van will have to travel to the office of the inspector. In many counties there will be a journey of some 40 or 50 miles to the office of the County Council, and if you take a van which is always horsed in such a manner as to travel only a few miles a day an immense journey like that, the obligation of undergoing inspection will be of an intolerably oppressive character. The section includes tents, and I am told that, under its provisions, it would really not be safe in this warm weather for a man to sleep in his own garden under a large umbrella because of the way in which this clause is drawn. It is certain that those who camp out up the river will have to get their tents registered, and will have to take it to the District Authority for the purpose of registration. The whole thing is most vexatious and full of interference without any good purpose. It puts everybody under a kind of ticket-of-leave. For what advantage, I ask, are so much irritation and annoyance to be created together with such a desire to evade the law?

MR. CHANNING rose in his place and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put," but the Chairman withheld his assent, and declined then to put that Question.

Debate resumed.

MR. STEPHENS: As far as the main purpose of the Bill is concerned, of course it is to regulate the poor people who go about the country in these travelling vans, carrying goods from village to village, and often visiting places which are inaccessible by any other means of supply. It would be impossible for the van-people to maintain themselves under the provisions of this Bill, and, I think, that if it is the intention that these persons should be in their present mode of life completely suppressed, that object should be carried out more frankly than is the case under this Bill. In many of these villages there is but one shop, and that rules the whole situation.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member is not speaking to this clause, but to the Bill as a whole.

*MR. TOMLINSON (Preston): As the clause is now worded the owners of moveable dwellings have to apply to the County Council. I wish to ask my right hon. Friend how applications are to be made to the County Council when it is not sitting?

MR. RITCHIE: Really my hon. Friend must not hold me responsible for all the details of this Bill. I imagine that the County Council for the purposes of the Act will appoint proper officers who will perform the duties under their supervision.

MR. T. C. BARING (London): In the place in which I live, on the borders of Middlesex and Hertford, there are a great many of these vans which habitually travel to the villages.

EGYPT—MILITARY OPERATIONS AGAINST THE DERVISHES.

OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON, in whose name there stood upon the Paper a notice “to call attention to the hostilities on the Nile, and the general condition of affairs in Egypt,” said: I have only within the last hour or two received a letter from my noble Friend the Prime Minister, stating that it is impossible for him to be present in the House this afternoon, and under these circumstances I think your Lordships will consider that I am exercising a sound discretion in postponing the notice standing in my name. But I cannot do this without one word as to the news that has reached us this morning. We have heard once more of a signal and complete victory; once again English valour and skill have triumphed; and although, as far as we can judge from the reports, the brunt of the contest has fallen upon the Egyptian troops, those troops have been led and officered by Englishmen. It is impossible not to feel for the fanatical and courageous sons of the desert, whose blood has been poured out so lavishly on this occasion. At the same time, every one must rejoice at the victory which has been achieved; and every one must hope that, for the present at all events, it is conclusive. Every one must hope this in the interests of humanity, as well as in the interests of the country, but I am bound to say that I cannot regard it as likely to be final. There is a much larger question even than that of these hostilities, which this victory, conclusive as it is, will not settle. It would be impossible, however, to enter upon this question in the absence of the Prime Minister, and I will therefore postpone my notice till Friday next. As this matter has been mentioned, perhaps I may be allowed to ask my noble Friend the Under Secretary of State for War whether he has any information to give us on this subject in addition to that which has appeared in the newspapers this morning?

THE LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Viscount CRANBROOK): I was quite sure that my noble Friend would not desire to enter into questions relating to foreign policy in the absence of my noble Friend the Prime Minister. But as he has called the attention of your Lordships to the victory which has been obtained in Egypt, it is only right that I should express on the part of Her Majesty's Government their great satisfaction at the report we have received, which shows alike that the soldiers were worthy of being led by a gallant English officer, and that that officer showed a skill and strategy which were worthy of the occasion, and that in the conflict ensued there was so little loss of life, while, at the same time, there was unhappily very severe loss on the other side, which was necessary under the circumstances. I am sure that your Lordships will deeply regret that the few who are mentioned should have suffered, and especially one distinguished and gallant English officer. I believe that the wanton invasion of Egypt—for it was a wanton invasion—has been stopped, and that for a time, at all events, it will not be repeated. What will be the future policy of this country with regard to this whole subject I will not now venture to remark, but I feel that I am speaking the sense of your Lordships when I congratulate the distinguished officer who has won this battle and the soldiers who fought under him.

EARL GRANVILLE: I certainly will not depart from the judicious course which both the noble Lords have taken of avoiding any political discussion in the absence of the Prime Minister and Foreign Secretary; but perhaps I may be allowed to associate myself completely with what they have both stated with regard to our admiration of the manner in which this battle has been conducted. It is extremely satisfactory to note the admirable strategy with which General Grenfell conducted this operation, the manner in which he was supported by Colonel Kitchener and Colonel Woodhouse, and a special and additional circumstance of satisfaction is the good conduct of the Egyptian troops under his command.

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Lord HARRIS): The only additional information which I can give your Lordships is as to the number of killed and wounded. Of 17 killed, one was a British soldier, and the 131 wounded include Brigade-Major Hunter, of the Lancashire Regiment, and Lieutenant Cotton, of the Shropshire Light Infantry (the latter severely wounded), and four British soldiers. A reconnaissance at day-break on August 4th showed the Dervish force to be completely broken up, the few fighting-men remaining being pursued by cavalry. General Grenfell adds that only one Emir, and that an unimportant one, remains alive.

CRUELTY TO CHILDREN PREVENTION
BILL, ~~now~~ PREVENTION OF CRUELTY TO AND PROTECTION OF CHILDREN
BILL. (No. 160.)

House in Committee (on Re-commitment) (according to order).

Clause 1.

*LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY: My Lords, in reference to the Amendments which stand on the Paper in my name, I would like to explain that the Parliamentary Agent for several Scotch societies asked me to take charge of them, as there was no other means of bringing them before the House.

Amendment moved, in page 1, line 5, after the word "who," to insert the words "being the parent or."

LORD HERSCHELL: I do not think this Amendment is really necessary, because the words "person having the custody, control, or charge of the child" include the parent when the parent is such person. The wider words were only put in in case the parent should not be such person.

THE MARQUESS OF LOTHIAN: I do not understand that these Amendments refer especially to Scotland; they refer to the whole Bill.

Amendment, by leave of the House, withdrawn.

LORD HERSCHELL, in moving after the word "ill-treats," to insert the word "neglect," said: As by this Amendment I propose to restore a word which was struck out, on Division, by a very narrow majority in the Committee, I propose to state the reasons why I ask your Lordships to restore the word. I think it was omitted under some misapprehension as to its effect. It was supposed that it would cover cases of neglect which ought not to be covered by such a provision, but I think those who take that view omit to see the force of the word "wilfully," which precedes the word "neglect." A wilful neglect always must be an intentional act. It is essential to restore this word not only because without it the cases would not be met which we desire to meet, but ~~really the clause,~~ so far as it consists in the words "wilfully neglects," is but a re-enactment, because there exists at the present time a provision in the Poor Law Amendment Act which renders liable to penalties and imprisonment upon summary conviction any case of wilful neglect of children. The only reason for inserting it here is that all the provisions should be found together. It will be observed that by the latter part of the Bill, Section 38 of the Poor Law Amendment Act of 1868 is repealed, and the truth is, if this word be not inserted, the law will be made less efficient than it is at the present time.

VISCOUNT CRANBROOK: I felt when we were in Committee very much what has been expressed by my noble and learned Friend; and it struck me, as it strikes me now, that it was wrong to take this word out, because it is quite clear that if wilful neglect took place and death ensued, it would be manslaughter; and, therefore, if there be wilful neglect which brings about injury to the child, it is unreasonable that it should not be punished when, under the General Law, it certainly would be punished if death ensued.

THE EARL OF MILLTOWN: As the noble Lord the Lord President appears to be in favour of this Amendment, it would of course be useless for me to divide upon it; but I may say that the only argument which has been used by my noble and learned Friend was used in Committee, and the Committee decided by nine to seven that this word should be struck out. One of the main objections is that it would make the section too wide, and might be made to apply to offences of an extremely trivial character.

LORD HERSCHELL: I am afraid it was my fault; but the point to which I have just drawn attention—namely, that this provision practically exists in an Act at the present time, which for consolidation purposes it is proposed to repeal, was not present to my mind in Committee.

*THE LORD CHANCELLOR: I was not present when this matter was discussed in the Standing Committee. I was engaged in the service of your Lordships' House at the time; but undoubtedly I should have felt with the noble and learned Lord if I had been there. It seems to me it would be very wrong to omit such a provision as this, which is quite consistent with the objects of the Bill. It may be, as my noble Friend fairly says, that in the event of wilful neglect leading to death, it would be manslaughter, and I think it would be, undoubtedly; but suppose death does not ensue, is the wilful neglect to go without punishment at all? It seems to me that it is an essential feature of this Bill, at all events with reference to wilful cruelty, that that should be made a specific misdemeanour.

On Question, that the word "neglect" be inserted, agreed to.

*LORD NORTON: The next Amendment is one in my name, and it is to omit the Proviso at the end of the clause. The Proviso as it now stands would be very little short of a legislative demoralisation of public opinion. The category of crimes and punishments dealt with in this Bill as it now stands is this—for ordinary cruelty to a child, a fine of £100; for persistent cruelty by a parent under the consciousness that he will make pecuniary gain out of the death of the child, £200; for causing the child to beg in the streets, or play in a pantomime, £25. Now, I maintain that the old Saxon system of pecuniary compensation for crime was never drawn upon so absurd and mischievous a classification as this. It is horrible that such should be the state of public morality in this country that it should be possible that a parent should be willing to maltreat his child under the influence of a pecuniary interest in the child's death. If death occur, it is murder, and murder of the most vile and horrible kind. If it were possible to make the standard of public morality still lower in this relation, it would be by a Parliamentary enactment making such horrible crime stand in the same category with ordinary domestic severity or cruelty, or with causing children to be hired out for theatrical purposes. I would ask whether, at this moment, cruelty to a child, with such a motive, is not already dealt with in some of our criminal statutes? If not, and if it must be brought into this Bill, I am not lawyer enough to say how it should be dealt with; but I am perfectly certain that it ought not to be dealt with as is proposed in this Bill. It should certainly be made perfectly distinct from the minor crimes with which it is coupled. It should stand alone in a clause by itself as a very aggravated misdemeanour, if not actually a felony, as I think it ought to be. Perhaps a wider view altogether should be taken and a separate enactment passed dealing with the insurance of children by parents. However, I leave it to the noble and learned Lord opposite to say how it should be dealt with otherwise than by a mere proviso at the end of a clause dealing with lighter kinds of offence. The noble and learned Lord the Lord Chancellor pointed out, as I understood him upon the Second Reading, the enormity of putting a crime, little short of the worst kind of murder, amongst a much lighter category, and that not even by a clause to itself, but by a proviso tacked on to ordinary kinds of cruelty which might take place under harsh or severe parents at home. Not knowing exactly what the substitution ought to be, I move to omit the proviso altogether.

Amendment moved, in page 1, line 21, to leave out from the word "months" to the end of the Clause.—(The Lord Norton.)

LORD HERSCHELL: I think my noble Friend opposite has somewhat misapprehended the scope of this proviso. There is no doubt that if a person interested in the death of a child wilfully neglects it in order that that child may die, the person so neglecting the child is guilty of murder or manslaughter if death ensues. But we are here dealing with cases where the child is subjected to ill-treatment and neglect without such unhappy consequences resulting; and the question is, how such a person ought to be dealt with. I may at the outset say that this proviso does not merely relate to cases where parents have insured the child, and so have an interest in its death. It covers that, but it does not apply exclusively to that. There unhappily have come under our experience lately cases in which the parents, or those having the custody of the child, though they were not parents, had an interest in the death of the child not resulting from insurance at all, but from a settlement giving rights to the child in some money in which those who had the care of the child had a contingent interest, supposing the child did not survive till the age of 21 years. I am not talking of imaginary cases, but of more than one case which has actually occurred. Therefore, no provision dealing simply with the question of insurance would cover the ground which this proviso seeks to cover. Now, what is the foundation of this proviso? I cannot see that it lowers any standard of morality at all. It says if you have an interest in this child suffering in its health, or becoming worse than it is, it is all the more disgraceful of you, inasmuch as you were interested in the child's death; and the clause seeks to do this, which perhaps is all that can be done—to say if there be on the one hand the stimulus to neglect and ill-treatment of the knowledge that that neglect and ill-treatment may ultimately result in a pecuniary advantage, the law will try at least to give a counter stimulus by the knowledge that that ill-treatment and neglect, if discovered, may lead to a pecuniary loss. That is the principle of the proviso, and it seems to me a sound principle. If you can impress upon these people that, under those circumstances, they may suffer a pecuniary loss, you diminish the temptation to ill-treatment on the ground that possibly it may produce a pecuniary gain. That seems to me a counter stimulus which the law may well give, and which is in accordance with sound principle.

*THE LORD CHANCELLOR: I confess I am a little uneasy about this provision, although I quite follow what my noble Friend has said. I cannot help thinking that either this proves a motive to do the thing or it is irrelevant to the amount of punishment. It seems to me very difficult to get rid of that dilemma. If it is a mere accident that there was pecuniary gain involved in the death of the child, there is no reason why there should be an aggravation of the punishment. If, on the other hand, it is some evidence of a motive, it must be evidence that the Court is to act upon that there has been an intentional exhibition of foul play on the part of the parent or guardian who has the custody of the child, and who has a pecuniary interest in its death. At the same time, I am not prepared to say that I will take the responsibility of voting with my noble Friend behind me (Lord Norton). I am content to say, by way of protest, that I think this provision is insufficient. It is now 30 years ago since I heard that very learned and cautious Judge,

Mr. Justice Wightman, express an earnest hope that the Legislature would sooner or later deal with the question of insurance upon infant life. That is now 30 years ago and nothing has been done, and I hope something may speedily be done in that direction. One objection I have to a provision of this sort is, that it appears to get rid of the necessity for dealing with the whole subject. Although I quite follow my noble Friend that this does not only apply to cases of insurance, it appears popularly to cover the ground, and I suppose the argument in men's minds would be—if the parent or guardian has in his mind the notion that he may get something by the child's death, the increase of the fine which may be imposed by the tribunal may act as a counter motive, pointing out to him that he may be deprived by the fine of all that he would get by the insurance. But it seems to me that that is insufficient. I know it is said that it is a very hard case upon parents that they may not be permitted to insure against the expenses of burial. I think it is quite possible for the Legislature to take care that no money should pass into the hands of the parents or guardians so interested, while, nevertheless, it might be possible to have an indemnity against the expenses of the funeral. I say this, because it appears to me that the proviso as it stands will lead to the impression that it is meant to meet that evil which has prevailed for 30 years. However, under the circumstances, I shall not take upon myself the responsibility of rejecting it, or of voting with my noble Friend behind me.

*LORD NORTON: May I ask the noble and learned Lord whether he will go so far to meet my view as to allow this proviso to be a separate clause? It is quite clear that if it has any meaning, its meaning is that there is a motive in the persistent neglect of the child—namely, the pecuniary interest in its death. The motive is the whole thing that gives any distinctive meaning to the proviso; and I think I may at least ask the noble and learned Lord, and I will be satisfied if he will so far concede my point, to make this proviso a separate clause, so that it may not appear to deal with a higher stage of the much minor crime connected with it, but with a separate crime of the greatest possible aggravation by the implied motive.

LORD HERSCHELL: I do not think it would make any difference, and therefore I do not object to its being a separate clause. In fact, perhaps it may be more convenient, because I have another Amendment to propose lower down in accordance with my promise before the Standing Committee. It was pointed out, and I think rightly, that if there are any circumstances alleged which might add to the punishment, there ought to be notice of it in the indictment, and with that view I have framed another Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

On the Motion of Lord HERSCHELL, the Proviso was amended to read as follows:—

“Provided that if it be proved to the satisfaction of the Court that a person was convicted on indictment as aforesaid was interested,” &c., and the Proviso was made a separate clause, and numbered 2.

Amendment moved to add to the Proviso the words—

“Such interest aforesaid in any sum of money accruable or payable in the event of the death of the child shall be charged in the indictment, and put to the jury in the same way, as far as may be, as a previous conviction is now charged and put.”

A Noble LORD: Would it be possible for the noble Lord to substitute a fixed imprisonment in the event of the fine not being paid at once?

LORD HERSCHELL: I think it is done already in the Bill, because there is power, as an alternative for the fine, to give imprisonment.

THE EARL OF MILLTOWN: I would point out that if the question is to be left to the jury, the words “to the satisfaction of the Court” should be omitted.

LORD HERSCHELL: I think it is quite intelligible as it is, but I have no objection to leaving out the words.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment moved, in line 1 of the Proviso, to omit the words “to the satisfaction of the Court.”

Agreed to.

Clause 1, as amended (now Clauses 1 and 2), agreed to.

Lord Norton

Clause 3 (Clause 2 in the Bill).

*THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN: My Lords, it will be necessary for me to say a few words to your Lordships in explanation of my Amendment, and in explanation of my reasons for placing this Amendment before your Lordships instead of the Amendment which I moved before the Committee. I, on that occasion, moved an Amendment the effect of which would have been to have excepted from the operation of this Bill all theatres and music halls and so on; and I am still of opinion that that would have been perhaps the wisest course to pursue. I suggested that course, because I object to the provisions of this Bill applying to theatres and music halls, holding that it is totally unnecessary, that it is not in consonance with the general tendency of our legislation, that it is without precedent in this country or in any country, and that it would inflict a great and cruel hardship upon the children, who would be deprived of the means of making an honest living. I entertain those objections just as strongly now, but I believe that my object and end can be gained as well by the Amendment which I shall presently move as by the Amendment that I moved in Committee. I object to this legislation applying to children employed in theatres for the reasons that I have mentioned. It has been said that it is necessary to apply it to theatres because we have legislated to prevent young children being employed in factories and workshops, and even in agricultural pursuits; but I must point out to your Lordships that there really is no analogy whatever in the two cases. In the first place, the first legislation affecting young children at all prevented children being employed under a certain age in textile factories. That was afterwards extended to other trades and workshops. But, my Lords, there is nothing whatever analogous in the working of children of eight or ten years of age in factories and workshops, and allowing children to appear, generally speaking, for only a few moments upon the stage. What do these children have to do? Sometimes they may sing a few verses in chorus, but, as a general rule, all they have to do is to group themselves upon the stage, to act sometimes as vegetables, in pantomimes, and so on, and in fact the work, such as it is, ought not properly to be called work at all. It is to the children an amusement—they look upon it as an amusement—and it enables them to earn in some cases very good wages indeed. As far as agriculture is concerned, I must point out to your Lordships that children under eight were prevented working in gangs purely and solely on account of the immorality and the evil examples set to the children by the grown persons working in gangs; and, as far as present legislation is concerned, the sole object of preventing young children from pursuing certain agricultural pursuits is that it interferes with their education, and exception is made in cases where there is no school in the vicinity, and exception is made also with respect to harvest time. I submit to your Lordships that, as far as education is concerned in the first place the theatrical training is positively beneficial to the children from an educational point of view; and, in the second place, that if it is not, and if the education of the children is interfered with in any degree, the Education Act, I submit, is quite strong enough as it is, and there is no reason whatever, from an educational point of view, for depriving children of this means of earning an honest living. As to the value of the children's earnings, it is very considerable. I have known and heard of cases where children under 10 years of age have earned £3, £4, or £5 a week. In other cases they may earn perhaps a shilling or two, or three shillings a day; but in many cases there can be no doubt—in not a few exceptional cases, but in many hundreds and hundreds of cases throughout the country—these children are able, without any damage to themselves, but with positive benefit to themselves, very largely to contribute to a family support, and in many cases are practically the bread-winners of a family, and are enabled to keep their families when the proper bread-winners are disabled by sickness, or some other cause, for a time, at any rate. As to the benefit to the children, I would like to read to your Lordships one or two quotations. I have a letter from Mr. Irving to a correspondent which I will ask permission to read, in which the case is stated very clearly and fairly, I think. Mr. Irving says:—

“I am not speaking from theory when I say that these children are educated, are well cared for, and are prepared for their struggle in life. Education is not entirely an affair of blackboards and the rule of three. There is a good deal in practical example, and the kindness with which the little ones are treated in the theatre, the discipline, order, and cleanliness enforced upon them.”

My Lords, I think the whole matter is contained in that letter. The habits of discipline, the cleanliness, the order, and at the same time the kindness with which the children are treated cannot fail to have a most beneficial effect upon them from an educational point of view. I may read also an extract from a letter that appeared in print from Mr. Runciman, than whom no one has had a larger experience as a school teacher in the City of London. He says—

“A good many little fellows came to the school after the pantomimes were over, and I was always glad to have them, for, without exception, they were far beyond the average in quickness, politeness, and, above all, in cleanliness.”

I could multiply instances of that kind; but I think, quoting those two authorities—Mr. Runciman, who has had such great experience in teaching, and Mr. Irving—I have quoted quite enough to show your Lordships that the theatrical training is beneficial to these children. Then, as to the hardship involved, if your Lordships understood and knew the kind of work which the children do, and the small amount of labour that is entailed upon them, your Lordships would see in a moment that really there is no common sense—no sense whatever of any kind—in the argument that anything approaching to cruelty can be inflicted upon the children. As a general rule, the children are out of the theatre by 10 o'clock. It is very rarely the occasion that they are kept later than that. As I have already said, what they have to do is, generally speaking, merely to appear for a few minutes upon the stage; sometimes they may have to sing a little, sometimes they may have a line or two to say; but, as a rule, the labour involved is absolutely infinitesimal, and I defy anyone to put before your Lordships any case to show that anything in the minutest degree approaching cruelty is involved in the employment of children in theatres. Then, my Lords, what is the alternative position of these children? Your Lordships must not suppose that if these children did not go to the theatres they would be all at home and put quietly to bed. I would like on that point also just to read an extract from a letter which describes very well the circumstances in which these children would generally be. That is a letter from Mrs. Ellicott, the wife of the Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol. She says, speaking of Gloucester—

“I have, when returning home from a party, seen, as late as half-past 11, little children, some in arms, some clinging to their mothers’ skirts, emerging from public-houses in the streets of Gloucester; other poor little wretches huddled together on doorsteps, waiting for their tipsy parents.”

As a matter of fact, if these children are not in the theatres, they are, in the generality of cases, in the gutter. It is perfectly true that some of them are the children of stage carpenters and other persons employed in the theatres. In those cases they are looked after very well by their mothers. They are under their fathers’ or their mothers’ eyes the whole time; but in the great majority of cases these children would be in the gutters in the back slums of London; and I need not describe to your Lordships the kind of scenes that they would see, the sort of language that they would hear, or the lessons in morality that they would be likely to learn. As a matter of fact, the theatres are doing a great and beneficent work; and if your Lordships have the wish to benefit the children in the poorer slums of London, and in our great towns, what you ought, in my opinion, to do, if it were possible, would be, not to prevent the employment of children in theatres, but, if possible, to multiply it a hundred or a thousand-fold. It must be remembered that this Bill, if not amended, will affect a vast multitude of children. I do not know how many may be employed in theatres, perhaps 2,000 or 3,000; but this Bill will affect thousands and thousands of children who now sing in out-of-door concerts at the Crystal Palace. I have seen the programmes for this year, and the number of children singing will come to something like 30,000. The choral concerts will employ 3,000 children in the Nonconformist Union Choir; the London Sunday School Choirs, 5,000; the Association of Tonic sol fa Choir, 4,000; the National Temperance League, 5,000; the Church Sunday School Choirs, 5,000; the Tonic sol fa Association, 3,000; the Catholic Total Abstinence League of the Cross, 5,000; the National Co-operative Festival, 5,000. Of course, I do not mean to say that all those children are under 10 years of age; a great many of them are older, but there is no question about it that a very large number of them are under 10 years of age, and if your Lordships legislate so as to prevent those children singing, you will, practically speaking, put a stop to these festivals altogether. These festivals are looked upon as the one great holiday of the year by these children; they prepare for them during all the year, and I do not think your Lordships, after considering the matter, would wish to deprive these children of the pleasure and advantage of singing in these concerts. It has been stated also that there is legislation of this kind in other countries. I wish to correct that mistake. I did so before the Committee, but your Lordships will excuse me if I repeat it before the House. There is no legislation of this kind whatever in France; anybody can employ children under 10 years of age in theatres, provided it does not interfere with their education; and, further than that, not only is there no law prohibiting their employment in France, but the law compels the managers of the State subsidised theatres and the Grand Opera to employ children under 10 years of age. There is no law in Belgium, there is no law in Italy, none in Germany, none in Russia, none as far as I know in any European country. There is no law of the kind in the United States. It is true that in the State of New York as I mentioned before the Committee and also in the State of California, as I did not at that time know, children are prohibited under 16 years of age from playing, but leave can be given for their employment in case of singing. At the same time I must point out to your Lordships that in the State of New York there is also a law which prevents children, male or female, I think it is under the age of 16, from going to a great number of places of entertainment, in public houses or anything of that kind where entertainments are going on; in fact, places answering to a great extent to many of our music halls. There is a law preventing children visiting them in any way unless accompanied by their parents or guardians. Well, I do not think your Lordships would take as a precedent legislation of such a great-great-great-grandmotherly description as that which would prohibit boys of 14 years of age from going into a music hall at all. Then, my Lords, the advantages of this early training have been mentioned, and the noble Lord opposite said that it could not amount to much because many of our best actors and actresses had not played at this early age. But on that point also I would like to read a short extract from another letter of Mr. Irving's. He says—

"The earliest years in a theatre are often of infinite value to members of our calling, and I do not hesitate to say that some of our most distinguished actresses owe their success very largely to the fact that they were brought up in a theatre, and that the stage was to them both a nursery and a school-room."

That is an opinion which I do not think ought very lightly to be set aside. You must remember that Miss Kate Terry, Miss Ellen Terry, and Mrs. Kendal, Miss Bateman, Mrs. Bancroft, and I dare say many others all played upon the stage as very small children. Your Lordships may, perhaps, have seen a letter from Mrs. Bancroft, the other day to the Daily Telegraph. Writing from the Engadine, she says—

"As since my earliest childhood I have been associated with the stage, I may, perhaps, be permitted to speak on this vexed question as to the employment of little children in theatres. I fail to understand what baneful influence there can be in their atmosphere to affect the moral nature of any child. My experience of our theatres is that the children are there so petted and made much of, so fondled and cared for, that when the run of a play in which they have been employed comes to an end, the little creatures often cry bitterly at the thought of being taken away, probably in their hearts dreading the return to the squalor, neglect, or rough treatment."

I received also a letter which I read before the Committee, and which I would like to read to your Lordships' House from a lady who wrote to me enclosing a communication she had had from a friend, asking this lady to make interest with her brother, who is a member of your Lordships' House, not to allow this clause to come into operation. She says—

"Owing to my niece and nephew having entered the dramatic profession two years ago, I have seen a great deal of the life of stage children, and can assure you that in all my experience I have never seen any of the evils put forward by those who are pressing that Bill, but I know that it will fall most heavily upon hundreds of children who are now gaining an easy and honest livelihood under careful supervision."

I do not wish to trouble your Lordships with any more extracts and quotations. I might multiply them if necessary, but I think I have quoted enough, and from sufficiently high authority to convince your Lordships that not only are the children enabled to earn a good living by theatrical employment, but that it is not harmful to them, but decidedly beneficial to them, and, above all, that there is nothing in any shape or kind resembling cruelty involved. It is quite true that the title of this Bill has been changed, but changing the title does not change the contents of this Bill, and the whole meaning and object of the Bill is to protect children against absolute physical suffering and cruelty; and I appeal to your Lordships whether it is just to persons who employ these children, or whether it is at all consistent with our general course of legislation to enact that children may not be employed in theatres, in a Bill which, although it is called the Protection to Children Bill, is in reality aimed at preventing actual physical suffering and cruelty. If this Bill were to become law as it is, there would be injustice done in certain minor degrees that I could mention. It would be necessary for children to produce their certificates of birth. Now, to obtain a copy of the certificate costs, I believe, a shilling. Your Lordships must remember that in the pantomime season, I suppose for one child that gets employment probably three children apply, and in all cases those children will have to spend a shilling in order to get a copy of their certificate. A shilling is not intrinsically a very large sum, but a shilling is a very considerable sum in the family economy of hundreds of families whose children are employed in pantomimes. The practical effect of this Bill would be to make bogus certificates rise in the market, and to put stunted children at a premium. You would have children of diminutive size pretending to be under 10 years of age, or children who are not properly developed supplying the places of children, who are now on the stage at four or five years of age; in fact, I believe the practical effect would be that it would become a dead letter, and I think there is nothing so unwise in legislation as to allow an Act to remain on the Statute Book containing such provisions that, although a great part of the Act may be exceedingly good, those provisions turn the whole of the Act into ridicule, and tend to make it practically of no effect. Those, my Lords, are the reasons why I object altogether to applying this legislation to theatres and music halls. But I am perfectly content to deal with the matter in the way I proposed; that is to say, by practically licensing the managers of these places to employ children. I am perfectly convinced and certain that in all cases they will have no difficulty whatever in showing to the satisfaction of any competent authority that every provision is made for the children's welfare and comfort, and that no possible harm can come to them, and therefore if your Lordships will agree to my Amendment I am satisfied that the object which I have in view will be carried out. I may be wrong, but my impression, so far as I could judge, was that if I insisted upon my original Amendment and succeeded in persuading your Lordships to admit it, there would be some danger that the Bill might not become law at all this Session. There is so much in the Bill which is excellent that I should be very sorry that it did not become law this Session, and that practically is the reason why, instead of pressing my original Amendment, the effect of which was to prevent the application of the Bill at all to theatres, I prefer to move the present Amendment, which will enable managers to obtain leave to employ such children. I think I have now given all my reasons to your Lordships, and I beg leave to move the Amendment which stands in my name.

Amendment moved, at the end of Clause 2 (now Clause 3), to insert the following Proviso:—

take place in premises licensed according to law for public entertainments, where it is shown to the satisfaction of a Court of Summary Jurisdiction that proper provision has been made to secure the health and kind treatment of any children proposed to be employed thereat, it shall be lawful for the said Court, anything in this Act notwithstanding, to order that any child, of whose fitness to take part in such entertainment or series of entertainments without injury the said Court is satisfied, be permitted to take part in such entertainment or series of entertainments, and such order may at any time be varied, added to, or rescinded by the said Court upon sufficient cause being shown; and such order shall be sufficient protection to all persons acting under or in accordance with the same."—(The Lord Kenry, Earl Dunraven and Mount-Earl.)

LORD HERSCHELL: I do not propose to trouble your Lordships at any length upon what I may call the main question of this Amendment—namely, the general argument as to the expediency or inexpediency of such a prohibition as is proposed by the Bill, because the matter was discussed, and I expressed my views upon it on the Second Reading, and I have seen no reason to alter those views, and I have no desire to trouble your Lordships with a repetition of what I then said. I cannot admit that this provision, if a proper one at all, is out of place in this Bill. The title of the Bill has been so changed as not exclusively to relate to cruelty to children, and, therefore, without in the slightest degree charging that these acts committed with regard to children under 10 are cruelty (I never have put the case in that light, and I do not now), nevertheless it is quite open to say that a Bill for the better protection of children may well include a provision which, in the opinion of those who advocate it, will save many children from suffering. I know perfectly well that there is a considerable difference of opinion as to the expediency of such a provision as this, but certainly many of the arguments that are used against it were used with just as much force against legislation to which the Legislature of this country is, I believe, irretrievably committed. In saying irretrievably I do not mean to cast a doubt for a moment on the expediency of that legislation, but even those who are opposed to it must admit that it would be hopeless to expect to retrace our steps with regard to it. And I cannot see that if it be right to insist that children shall not work in factories or workshops at this tender age, it can be otherwise than right to insist that they shall not occupy themselves in such work as some of them are engaged in in theatres. As far as one can judge one's self, I must say I believe it to be just as likely to be injurious to their health, and indeed more likely than some of the operations which are at the present time prohibited. In the case of agriculture, I believe children might more safely be employed at a tender age and without injury to themselves, and with equal benefit to their parents, and equally in the interests of those who desire to employ them, as they could be in the case of theatres. Therefore the question really is, is there any sufficient reason shown for making an exception in the case of theatres from the legislation which prevails with regard to other occupations. My noble Friend opposite has said that these children, if not so employed, would not be at their homes, but would be in the gutter or upon the streets. That that may be so with some of the children I do not for a moment deny, but from all I can learn there is no reason for supposing that that is an accurate statement as regards the bulk of the children employed. I have heard very different statements, that they are taken mostly from children of what may be termed the lower middle class, who might be perfectly well at home cared for and tended if not occupied in the way which is aimed at by this provision. No doubt in the case of some children it may be important for their parents that the money which they get by acting should be received, but I doubt very much whether that is so in the case of the large majority of the children. And I think noble Lords will see in a moment that that is likely to be the case, because a manager who has to train such children for the stage will naturally seek out those who have had some little education, some little training, some little cultivation, more likely to be amenable to discipline and more likely to be easily taught. The consequence is, I believe, that the last to be engaged would be those who may be called the gutter children. With reference to the education of these children, it has been suggested that it will benefit by this employment, and my noble Friend opposite has read the opinion of one authority to that effect. I have been furnished with the opinion of authorities I believe equally entitled to speak and to be listened to on the subject who take an entirely different view. I had representations made to me in a memorial signed by a very large number of members of the London School Board, who, looking at the matter from an educational point of view, were of opinion that the education of the children suffered, and that it was impossible for children to comply with the law and make the required school attendances without which their employment is absolutely unlawful, and at the same time be occupied in this way out of school hours. I will trouble your Lordships no more upon the general question, but proceed to say a few words upon the particular Amendment moved, and to state to your Lordships the course which I purpose taking with regard to it. I shall myself ask your Lordships to reject this Amendment, but in view of the possibility that that course may not be taken, I shall first endeavour to amend it, as I believe it is competent for me to do, by limiting to some extent its scope. Now when my noble and learned Friend opposite, the Lord Chancellor, moved his Amendment in the Standing Committee, he limited the dispensing power as I will call it, to children over seven, that is to say between seven and ten, and he permitted the clause to be absolutely effective as regards all children under seven years of age. I venture to think that if there is to be a dispensing power at all, it is time enough to begin when the children have reached seven years of age: even if you are not prepared to prohibit this employment up to the age of ten, you may well insist that children shall not be allowed to perform in public for profit during the tender years of their life between seven and ten. Therefore I shall ask your Lordships to insert after the word "children" in line 5, the words "exceeding seven years of age." Then I should like to call your Lordships' attention to the tribunal which the noble Earl suggests as the proper dispensing power, because it is really a tribunal and it does not seem to me to be a very fitting mode of carrying out his views. Application may be made to a Court of Summary Jurisdiction, and where it is shown to the satisfaction of such a Court that the child will be properly cared for, and is not likely to be injured, then dispensation may be given. Now a Court of Summary Jurisdiction means any Justice of the Peace, and it is not necessarily confined to Justices sitting in Petty Sessions. Therefore, so far as I can see it would be competent for a theatre manager, we will say, desiring dispensation to go to a Magistrate, and if the first Magistrate he went to refused the license, to go to another Magistrate, and then go the round of the Magistrates until at last he found a Justice who took the same views as himself, and get his sanction to the performance. So far as I can see, there is nothing in the fact that one Justice has decided that the license shall not be granted to prevent another taking a different view and granting it. I cannot think that that is expedient or desirable. You might have a large majority of the Justices having jurisdiction in the place where the theatre is determining that it will be injurious to the health of a child and inexpedient to allow it to perform there, and if the manager can get any one Justice within whose jurisdiction the theatre is situate to fall in with his views, he can give the license and the child will be allowed to perform. That is my strong reason for objecting to the whole machinery of this clause as proposed by the noble Earl opposite. I do not think it necessary to say anything further upon the clause at present.

*THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN: Perhaps it will be convenient for me at once to express my regret at my ignorance, and to say that I did not know that a Court of Summary Jurisdiction could consist of one Magistrate. What I meant was the Magistrates in Petty Sessions or a Police Court.

LORD HERSCHELL: Unfortunately the Summary Jurisdiction Act defines "Court of Summary Jurisdiction" as "any Justice."

*THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN: I will readily assent to any Amendment of my Amendment which puts that matter right.

*THE EARL OF POWIS: I should like to ask the noble and learned Lord to consider whether if he maintains Clause 2 in its present shape, it would not be fair both to the children employed, and to the employers that some rather more distant date than that of the Bill receiving the Royal Assent should be fixed for this clause to come into operation. It would be very hard on the children in many cases earning valuable money to be deprived of it at a day's notice; it would also be hard on the employers of those children, especially those who are moving about the country, if the piece is to be summarily put an end to by a number of the young persons employed in it being suddenly forbidden to act any longer.

LORD HERSCHELL: With reference to the appeal of the noble Earl, I shall be quite prepared to provide that this clause shall not come into operation until the 1st of November.

*LORD WATSON: I should like to say upon this clause that in Scotland a Court of Summary Jurisdiction consists only of the Sheriff or the Sheriff Substitute. Therefore I take it these provisions would not be open to the objection stated by the noble and learned Lord on the Front Bench. The authority constituted by the clause moved by the noble Earl in Scotland is the High Court of Justiciary and the Court of Sessions, and in England or Ireland the Lord Chancellor. The Lord Chancellor being present to speak for himself, I say nothing as to the Authority constituted for England and Ireland, but I do think that in Scotland the High Court of Justiciary and the Court of Session is not a proper body to which to refer any such duty as framing the rules for the admission of children either above or below seven years of age to act temporarily in theatres.

*THE LORD CHANCELLOR: I may point out that the noble Earl did not move that part of his Amendment. I had already pointed out to him the objections to it, and he agreed not to move it.

*LORD WATSON: I think it right that there should be some general rule throughout the country, and that some such authority as is referred in the last part of this clause ought to be established, but I would suggest that the authority constituted for Scotland should be the Secretary for Scotland, who has means at his command which will enable him to frame a proper system of rules that will ensure some degree of uniformity throughout the different counties and burghs in Scotland.

Lord Herschell

THE EARL OF MILLTOWN: I would like to point out to the noble Earl beside me (the Earl of Dunraven) that the Amendment as it now stands would involve an almost intolerable amount of duty to be performed by the police Magistrates in London, because it would necessitate inquiry into the case of every individual child. As the clause stands, it is this:—

"It shall be lawful for the said Court, anything in this Act notwithstanding, to order that any child of whose fitness to take part in such entertainment or series of entertainments without injury the said Court is satisfied."

That would necessitate an examination into the case of every individual child. I think the objections to the clause as it was originally proposed to be amended would be got over by this alteration—to make it read, "That any children under the said age be permitted to take part." Your Lordships will see that the Amendment goes on to state that it is always possible to obtain a revocation of the order in case of anything being proved to be injurious to the health or, I presume, the general well-being of the child. I venture to suggest that some Amendment of the Amendment is necessary if the noble Lord wishes to make his proposed clause workable. With regard to the observations of my noble and learned Friend opposite as to what constitutes a Court of Summary Jurisdiction I should advise the noble Earl beside me to insert instead of "a Court of Summary Jurisdiction" the words, "Two Justices sitting in Petty Sessions or a Stipendiary Magistrate."

*THE EARL OF GALLOWAY: I cannot help expressing my regret that the noble and learned Lord has determined to oppose this proposed Amendment to part of the Bill. The Bill is a Bill for the protection of children, and from all that I have learnt these theatrical children do not stand in need of protection at all. I think it would be a great misfortune if the House took that extreme view of the matter. I believe that employment of this kind for children is the best thing in the world; it takes them out of all danger of evil of every sort, and I do not see any necessity for hurried legislation of this kind. There was a letter in this day's Times from Mrs. Jeune which expressed me very much. According to my own experience and that of others with whom she acted and whose names she gave, this employment, so far from having an evil influence, had quite the reverse on a great many of the children, and the statistics she gives show that the employment has been attended by beneficent and beneficial results. I hope the House will consider this Amendment, when its wording has been suitably altered, a most reasonable one in the interests of the children.

*THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY: My Lords, I was very unwilling to interrupt anything which might conduce to the amending of the Amendment itself, and the putting it in the best shape before your Lordships, but I hope we cannot be said to have quite done with the general question. The noble Earl behind me cast a very rosy stage light indeed over the condition of these children. It has been represented to us as a few minutes' easy and amusing trifling upon the stage at not a very late hour in the evening, as if that were the whole of what was involved; but inquiry shows there is a great deal of hard work connected with the getting up of those few minutes play-work even if a few minutes described this work of the children. We have the account given by Madame Katti Lanner, professional trainer to one of the greatest theatres in London, of the work of the children under her care. Madame Lanner says that the children were at school from nine, or, in the case of the younger ones, half-past nine till a quarter or half-past twelve, that is at their ordinary schooling. The rehearsals were taken between that time and a quarter to two. At two the children return to school, and at half-past four, for as long as is necessary, the rehearsals are resumed. When rehearsal is finished, and the time of the theatre begins, the theatre does not end at ten o'clock. It is eleven o'clock or twelve before the children leave; that is a day of fourteen or fifteen hours spent by these children between the preparation for school and the preparation for the stage or the stage itself. Then, if we inquire into what is the effect upon the whole of the children, it is not so merely a refreshment and recreation tending to their health and strength, as some believe. One of the leading children's physicians in London, who has given years of attention to the subject, writes, in a letter which has been forwarded to me, "that this night employment, and especially of girls, is necessarily injurious to bodily health, and in London a cause of disease." If your Lordships will look at the tabular statements of the excessive number of children suffering from nervous disease in the hospitals, I am sure your Lordships will think that these are not times in which children ought to be forced through a great deal of this nervous and exciting work. It is not merely that the child smiles when it is amused, the children are kept to the moment in a state of tension, and they are taught for hours beforehand to retain and keep themselves in a state of tension, till the very moment when they ought to laugh or till the very moment when they ought to frown. Now, I do not say at all that this kind of discipline is bad for children—far from it. But I say that the immense amount of it, taken in combination with what we are obliged to require from them at schools, is very injurious, in the opinion of the best physicians, to the health of the children. Then the mischief is not over when the theatre is over. The children have to leave the theatre for home. I see it stated in a fascinating and able letter which appeared this morning in the Times, that the children are sent from the theatres with an employé of the theatre to the train. That may be so now, but it was not the case a very short time ago, nor was it the case at one of the best places of public amusement. I have here the account of a lady who attended the pantomime at the Crystal Palace for the purpose of seeing what became of the children. She says:—

"All the children left the theatre with the black on their eyes and the paint on their faces just as they had been on the stage. No one came to meet them at the theatre, and they divided up into groups and strolled about the Palace. My friend and I accompanied one of these groups into a 3rd class carriage of the train leaving for London at five minutes past 10; there were, perhaps, a dozen children of all ages in the compartment. The younger children were dreadfully fagged and evidently dead beat. They leant against the carriage or against each other in attitudes of complete exhaustion. None of those we spoke to had anyone to meet them at the Palace, and very few had anyone to meet them in London. They had to change trains for Ludgate Hill, some going to Drury Lane or Leicester Square, which they would reach about half-past 11."

Then she goes on to describe the case of a child who would have to take train to Gower Street and then get to Great Coram Street—

"My friend went on with the child and found things exactly as she had said. She was left utterly unprotected, and in an exhausted condition to find her way home. They arrived at Great Coram Street close on half-past 11, and the little thing thankfully took my friend's hand."

I will not detain your Lordships further, but the lady goes on to give a similar account of her own experience. This is in mid-winter, late at night in the lonely streets, and with the children very lightly clad. A very different account indeed from the account which your Lordships will have read in the Times this morning. Well, I say this severe preparation for night work, and the nightly work itself, and the getting home afterwards are all bad for health. But then there is the next morning. The same children have to be at 9 o'clock in school, and that combination appears to me to be the worst feature of the whole case, as regards the children's health. My Lords, you would not let your own children even amuse themselves night after night by looking on at these performances; and if your Lordships know very well that the children would be exceedingly excited by the performances—if you know that they would be quite unfit for their ordinary lessons the next morning, what is it to these little children, not just standing still as "Vegetables," but with a great deal of running and dancing to-and-fro, and a great deal of exertion leading to the fatigue which is here described. Then I have taken pains—I thought it my duty—to inquire into what is the view of the children's condition from the school side. I have taken a very experienced elderly teacher who has had a life's experience, who is a well known man in the schools in London, knows them all, and is himself a principal teacher; and he tells me that the lessons of course are unlearned—that must be the case—there is not time to learn them. Moreover, the children when they come to school are too tired to learn there, at once restless and sleepy. Sometimes, as he says, he has scarcely had the heart, knowing that the wages they earn were so valuable (I am most anxious that there should be no exaggeration on the one side or the other) not to ease everything to enable the children to go on, but he says it is a vain task, and practically he may state as a general rule that the boys do miss their year's standard, they are unable to pass at the end of the year, and that means that they are a year longer at school. Then when all that is over the race of life itself begins, and he says the best educated, and the best trained boys of course get the places that are to be had; they get the start in life, and the other children are hindered, not only in their school lessons, but are practically unfitted for their work in life by the time when they ought to enter upon industrial occupations or upon employment as clerks. I believe that we may say that the preparation for stage-life itself is not worth thinking of, and could easily be made up at the age of 10 years if the children are really going to be devoted to the stage. But, my Lords, one of the worst things connected with it, is what was described to me by another of the witnesses I talked to, as the bogus schools. The children are taken away from their Board Schools, or National Schools, and a certificate is given by people who undertake to keep them at school and to teach them something, but in reality there is no teaching to speak of at all. Now, either the school is a serious thing or it is not. If it is not a serious thing, if it is a mere pretence, there is not one of your Lordships who would think it proper that a child should be treated in this manner, because it must be a great interference with all that a child's education is intended to fit him for in life. If it is not a serious thing, if it is a pretence, it ought not to be allowed; and if it is a serious thing it involves excessive hours for children under 10 years of age of hard and continuous work. Then as to the profit to the family. That has been disregarded in all other cases. It may be hard; I sympathise with the hardness as much as possible; but it has been thought right to disregard it in all other cases in order that the child may be better fitted for its life, and that the parents may be really benefited by the child receiving a good education. Then we are told what good wages the children get in many cases. Yes, the very clever and able children do, but the ordinary payment for a child is only 7d. a night;

that is to say, four or five shillings a week, lasting over three months. That is what the mass gain, and that is the whole profit to the family. But I say it is no real profit if the boy loses a year and is disqualified for his work; and, again, I say it is still less of a profit if it ends, as I am sure it does very frequently, in nervous weakness. It has been said that many of these children, or you might almost believe from what is said in the papers that all of them, are gutter children. Now, let me quote to you Mr. Oscar Barrett's statement. Mr. Oscar Barrett is the manager of the Crystal Palace Pantomimes. Upon a deputation at which he spoke, to meet objections urged against the system, he observed that "Theatrical children were far better off than ordinary children—they were supposed to be gutter children, but they were not." I have inquired of people who have devoted their whole lives to the service of the poor and to their children. I will not mention Mr. Waugh, lest it should be thought that he is an advocate, although I am sure that anyone who has read his statements will admit that there could not be a fairer-minded man. I might quote Miss Octavia Hill, who is intimately acquainted, in the minutest details, with the life of all these people, and who has devoted herself in a cool rational spirit to her good work, and another lady of the same surname, Miss Frances Davenport Hill. They have no knowledge whatever of invalid parents being maintained by children, or being kept out of the workhouse. They have knowledge of a very great number of families in which the earnings of the children are spent in drink. But, my Lords, these children are not really gutter children. The managers of theatres and pantomimes do not want half starved, emaciated, poor little bony children; they want the lithe, well-fleshed, well-formed, easily moving children; children already well mannered, in order to do the work of the stage. I know that there are two classes. There must be among them some exceedingly poor children. Of them I have spoken already. No doubt there will be loss there; but I am persuaded that the loss is very small indeed compared with the gain which it would be to all alike to be kept at school, at any rate up to such a tender age as 10 years. Again, we have been told that if the children are not in the theatre they would be on the streets. I dare not venture to put my experience against the experience of others who have written and spoken on this subject; but I thought it worth while three or four weeks ago to walk through the lowest streets and alleys in Lambeth, and that is a very suitable place to walk about in, because there are three theatres there. In walking for about an hour, between the hours of 10 and half-past 11, I met 13 children. The majority of these were with their parents, or they were going to the shops, whose doors were still open, although the shutters were closed, to fetch things for their parents, all in the quietest and most simple manner. There were three children in the gutter, for three children were employed in picking up the remnants of some fruiterers' packages. There was no rioting or anything of the kind in the streets—in fact, the streets were much quieter than I expected to find them, but there were no children at all about who in any way answered to the description of gutter children, seeing, and hearing, and mixing in all sorts of monstrosities, and who would be better off in theatres. The fact is that these streets which I walked through simply swarm with children the whole day long, while at night there were, as I have said, only 13 children, the rest were in bed. I have no wish to say a word about the characters of those who I am persuaded are good and kind to the children. I believe that very large numbers of them are perfectly irreproachable; but there must be, and we know there is, a rank and file whose examples and contact cannot be very beneficial to the children, and we know also that there are such things as stage doors. However, I believe the profession generally to be neither worse nor better than other professions. But what I do feel is that I have satisfied myself on two points. The wages that these children earn are not worth such a sacrifice as that of health, and nerves; and the work itself is not healthful. The mixture of school work and stage work is I am persuaded most injurious, while the incidents of the children having to make their way home are still more trying to them.

The Archbishop of Canterbury

Amendment amended by leaving out the words "a Court of Summary Jurisdiction," and substituting the words—

"A stipendiary Magistrate or Petty Sessional Court in England and in Scotland the Sheriff or Sheriff Substitute."

THE EARL OF MILLTOWN: I propose to leave out the words—

"Any child of whose fitness to take part in such entertainment or series of entertainments without injury the said Court is satisfied," and in lieu thereof to insert the words "children under the said age."

*THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN: I shall be glad to accept that Amendment.

LORD HERSCHELL: I very much prefer the words as they stand, because then it does require the Court to be satisfied that the child, as to whom the dispensation is given, is fit to take part in the entertainments. I shall certainly oppose this Amendment.

THE EARL OF MILLTOWN: I can quite understand my noble and learned Friend opposing it, because the Amendment would be perfectly unworkable if it is left as it is.

On Question, "That those words stand part of the Amendment," their Lordships divided:—Contents 37; Not Contents 20.

LORD HERSCHELL: I now move, in line 5, after the word "child," to insert the words "exceeding seven years of age."

*THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN: I cannot accept that Amendment. I think that every argument I have used already applies to that Amendment, and I will not trouble your Lordships by arguing the matter further.

LORD HERSCHELL: I should have thought that those who were most ardently in favour of omitting this occupation from the provisions of the Bill would have conceived that there was some age below which employment ought not to take place. Can it be really right to permit children below seven years of age to take part in these entertainments, and pursue their education at the same time?

THE EARL OF MILLTOWN: The difficulty is reduced to an extent by the 8th clause, which reverses the usual procedure in Courts of Justice, where it is necessary for the prosecution to make out their case by providing that the dependant must prove to the satisfaction of the Court that the child is above the actual age. That will stand enormously in the way of managers employing these young children. It is next to impossible to ascertain that these children are above the actual age. It would involve an enormous expense to them, and the difficulty would be so great as to render it impossible for managers to run the risk of prosecution, and they will therefore be bound to give up employing children altogether.

*VISCOUNT CROSS: This matter came before the Royal Commission on Education, and differing, as we did, upon many vital points with regard to that matter, upon this particular subject we were absolutely unanimous that these children wanted some protection. We had suggested some modification of the Factory Act. What your Lordships have inserted in the Bill would practically meet precisely the same point; but I do trust, on behalf of these young children under seven years of age, that the House will step in and protect them from what I am quite sure must in their case at all events result in cruelty.

*THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN: If the last Amendment had been carried the case would have been rather different; but your Lordships will remember now that the Courts have got to decide as to the fitness of every particular child. One child of only seven years of age may not be physically fit to play in a theatre, whereas another child may be perfectly fit. Your Lordships are aware that a great number of plays cannot be played if you insist upon this proviso—I refer to such plays as Claudian, A Midsummer Night's Dream, The Winter's Tale, and so on.

LORD CLIFFORD OF CHUDLEIGH: I may say that the Midsummer Night's Dream is played in Germany frequently without children. I would really ask the noble Lord why that play cannot be played without very young children?

*THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN: There must be small fairies.

On Question, that those words be there inserted—agreed to.

On Question, that the following words be inserted at the end of Clause 2 (now Clause 3):—

“Provided also, that in the case of any entertainment or series of entertainments to take place in premises licensed according to law for public entertainments, where it is shown, to the satisfaction of a Stipendiary Magistrate or Petty Sessional Court in England, or in Scotland the Sheriff or Sheriff Substitute, that proper provision has been made to secure the health and kind treatment of any children proposed to be employed thereat, it shall be lawful for the said Court, anything in this Act notwithstanding, to order that any child exceeding seven years of age of whose fitness to take part in such entertainment or series of entertainments without injury, the said Court is satisfied, be permitted to take part in such entertainment or series of entertainments, and such order may at any time be varied, added to, or rescinded by the said Court, upon sufficient cause being shown; and such order shall be sufficient protection to all persons acting under or in accordance with the same.”

Their Lordships divided:—Contents 31; Not Contents 24.

Clause agreed to.

VISCOUNT CRANBROOK: I do not wish to move an Amendment of this clause, but I cannot help calling attention to one particular part of it which strikes me as very remarkable; that is to say, that if a man is committed for trial his child is taken away, and is placed with some other person to be taken charge of, and that if he is acquitted no compensation is paid to him at all; though he is not found guilty of any crime or offence, all that has been done during the time he has been waiting for trial he is made to condone, as it were, and to pay for, though it has been against his will, and though his child has been taken from him for no offence whatever.

LORD HERSCHELL: I would point out that this is not compulsory at all. The clause merely gives the power in certain cases to remove the child from the custody of the parent when he is committed for trial. I think your Lordships will see that there are cases when it would be not only most expedient, but even necessary; for instance, if a parent were committed for trial, and were out on bail, the child might be intimidated, or might suffer seriously in consequence; therefore I think that the provision is perfectly right. But at the same time, I quite agree with the noble Viscount opposite that the provision as to the payment of any money ought to be had regard to. On Report I will propose an Amendment to meet this objection.

M

*THE LORD CHANCELLOR: I would also call attention to the fact that the phrase "Court of Summary Jurisdiction" appears here again. The noble and learned Lord will probably consider that on Report.

*LORD NORTON: My Lords, I have given notice, upon this clause, to move that the last three lines be omitted. The proposal in these three last lines is that the Secretary of State should make rules and regulations for the conduct of children in the foster homes to which they are committed by this Bill, and for the inspection of them. I think that that strikes at the whole principle of the Bill. The principle of the Bill is to place the foster parent in loco parentis: he is to take charge of the children, and to have all the responsibility of a natural parent. But under this clause the foster parent is relieved of responsibility, and the conduct of the child is put under the regulation, management, control, and inspection of the Secretary of State. Is the Secretary of State to regulate the homes of England, whether they are foster homes or the homes of natural parents? I protest against this. It destroys the feeling of parental responsibility, and it places the responsibility of home duties on the Secretary of State. If the Secretary of State must regulate these foster homes a fortiori he ought to regulate the worse kinds of homes for which these foster homes are substituted; and the ultimate corollary to these three lines would be that the Secretary of State had better regulate every home in England. This point was discussed in the Standing Committee, and this proposal was defended as a parallel to rules made by Guardians in the case of boarded-out children. There is no parallel whatever between the two cases. Guardians boarding out children are obliged to make rules for the conduct of the children in the places where they send them, because they pay for their care, and have to account for an expenditure of public money. They, therefore, make some rules (which are, after all, very slight) for the schooling of the children, and their clothing, and so on. But in this case the foster parent will be invested with the whole of the responsibility: he will be put in the position of the parent: he is the parent in the eye of the law, and is as much answerable to the law for any neglect or abuse of duty as any other parent. Nor is there any reason why the Secretary of State, if he should make regulations with regard to these foster homes, should not make similar regulations with regard to all the homes in the country. I think the State is already intruding a great deal too much upon the domestic life of this country. It is against the whole spirit of this nation that the State should be constantly interfering in domestic life. It is a foreign and not an English idea. In England we consider that a man's house is his castle, and that he may keep out the Secretary of State or anybody else, unless he abuses his position as a citizen; in which case he is amenable to the law, without special rules imposed. I say it would be a step in the wrong direction, and against the independent spirit of this country, if we passed the three lines at the end of this clause, which would relieve the foster parent of responsibility, and put it in the power of the Secretary of State to regulate the conduct of domestic life.

Amendment proposed, Clause 4 (3), page 4, line 27, to leave out from "approves" to the end of the Clause.—
(The Lord Norton.)

LORD CLIFFORD OF CHUDLEIGH: The arguments of the noble Lord who has moved the omission of these words, if they go for anything, go against the whole spirit of the clause; that is to say, the whole spirit of the clause is that the State does step in, and does interfere with the rights of the parent by taking away the child altogether. It appears to me that if the State takes the child from the parent, it may be bound to make such rules and regulations as shall ensure the proper custody of that child in the hands of those in whom it is placed. I hope, therefore, that the House will not agree to strike out these words, which, while casting no absolute duty upon the Secretary of State to make such rules, give him ample power if it be found necessary to make rules which will ensure the proper carrying out of the clause.

*EARL FORTESCUE: I quite agree that Parliament has power to authorise the Secretary of State to make rules for the custody of these children who are to be entrusted to a sort of foster parents; but the question seems to me to be, is it expedient that the reasonable authority for the child, who is to be a sort of adopted or foster child, in default of the proper treatment and care of the child by the parent, should be vested in the Secretary of State? Is it likely to work well? Will it not disincline the most desirable foster parents to adopt these children and take care of them if a sort of notion gets abroad that they are subject to a number of vague rules and regulations? It seems to me, I must say, that if the foster parent is fit to have custody of the child, and to be placed in loco parentis, he should be entrusted with the whole duty and responsibility of its proper care. I entirely agree with my noble Friend who moves this Amendment.

*LORD NORTON : I would like to say one word in reply to the Lord Clifford of Chudleigh. I could quite understand his argument if the State, in taking away the custody of the child, undertook the care of the child itself. Then the matter would be parallel to the boarding out of children by Boards of Guardians. But in this Bill the State takes away the child from the parent, and places it in the hands of a foster parent; and I say that when the State has once placed the child in the care of the foster parent, it weakens the sense of responsibility in that foster parent that the Secretary of State should undertake to regulate his conduct.

LORD HERSCHELL : I should be very much opposed to any interference with the foster parent beyond what is absolutely necessary to secure the proper treatment of the child committed to his charge. The provision contained in the clause does not really contemplate that the Secretary of State should undertake the management of the child, or dictate to the foster parent how it is to be managed. It gives to the Secretary of State the widest discretion to make such regulations in relation to these cases as he thinks necessary. I cannot but think that it would be desirable that at least there should be some record from time to time of where the children are who have been committed to a person other than the parent; because although the parent may have behaved ill, we will say, two, or three, or four years before, nevertheless I am quite sure it would not be desired that the parent should be forbidden, if there were no objection to it, to have access to his child, to know something about its welfare, and where it was. Therefore, it would seem very reasonable that there should be, for example, such a rule as this : that at certain intervals (I do not want to make them too short) a Report should be made of the whereabouts of the child, so that if the parent desires to see the child or to have access to it, he may be able in some way or other to learn where the child is. I merely give that as an example; but I would point out that the whole thing is left to the Secretary of State; there is no compulsion upon him to make rules, it is a power given, and not an obligation upon him, and I have no doubt he will exercise it with care and discretion.

VISCOUNT CRANBROOK : Perhaps if my noble and learned Friend would put in the words "may if he shall think fit," it would show that the matter was left to his discretion, and that might satisfy my noble Friend.

LORD HERSCHELL : I have no objection to it, although I still do not see that it is necessary.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed, in line 27, after the word "may," to insert the words "if he shall think fit," agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 5.

THE EARL OF MILLTOWN : This is a clause to which I beg to call attention for a few moments. It refers to a matter which will, I am certain, give rise to considerable dissatisfaction amongst the working classes, and the poorer people of this country. It provides that any Justice of the Peace, on information made before him by any person—that is, any busybody who may take up a case of this kind—

"Who in the opinion of the Justice is bona fide acting in the interest of any child, that there is reasonable cause to suspect that such a child, being a boy under the age of 14 years, or a girl under the age of 16 years, has been or is being ill-treated or neglected in any place within the jurisdiction of such Justice"

(the word "neglected," as I said just now with regard to another clause, is not one of very clear application and meaning, it might mean any kind of neglect which this person should think prejudicial to the health of the child)—

“such Justice may issue a warrant authorising any person named therein”

(that might be the busybody in question)

“to search for such child, and if it is found to have been or to be illtreated or neglected in manner aforesaid to take it to and detain it in a place of safety.”

Now, my Lords, all Justices are, unhappily, not persons of sound discretion; yet a man who is an enthusiast may go to any one Justice and get power to search any home for a child; and, if he finds him, he may carry him off forcibly from his parents in order to place him in what he calls a place of safety. But that is not all. By the 3rd sub-section there is a provision that—

“Any person authorised by warrant under this section to search for any child may enter if need be by force any house, building, or other place specified in the warrant, and may remove the child therefrom,” that is to say, that this person who succeeds in getting round any Justice of the Peace may break into any working man's house, or one of your Lordships' houses, if it comes to that, at any hour of the day or the night, and wake a man up in the middle of the night, and may take, as it were, by force of arms, any child who may, in his judgment, be neglected or ill-treated. That seems to be a most startling power to give to any Justice; and I should have proposed to have omitted the clause altogether, but it has been suggested to me that there are certain cases of cruelty which go on here and there throughout the country, which could not be detected without some such clause as this. Therefore, I have not proposed to omit it altogether, although I still think perhaps that would be the wisest course to take; but I venture to suggest to your Lordships that the power should not be given to one Justice but to two Justices, or to a Stipendiary Magistrate. The clause, as it stands, has been copied word for word from a very ill-considered, and, as I think, mischievous measure called the Criminal Law Amendment Act, which has already caused a great deal of mischief, and perhaps will cause more; but it was passed, as your Lordships may remember, in a panic, or something approaching to it, and was not very well considered. Therefore, I shall presently propose to limit the time at which a search warrant can be executed to the hours between 6 in the morning and 9 at night, which are the hours, as your Lordships know, which distinguish burglary from housebreaking.

Amendment moved, in page 2, line 3, after the word “Justice,” to insert the words “or Justices.”—(The Earl of Milltown).

LORD HERSCHELL: If this Amendment were adopted, I think it would go far to defeat the object of the clause, because it is not always easy to get two Justices together on an emergency. Very often it becomes known that a child is being ill-treated, and perhaps dangerously ill-treated, and unless there can be immediate action that child may be sacrificed. Therefore, to require, as this Amendment proposes, a resort to two Justices would often render it impossible to put the provision in operation until it was really too late to effect the desired purpose. My noble Friend has quite truly said that a similar clause to this was inserted in the Criminal Law Amendment Act of 1885. Whatever complaints may have been made of certain provisions in that Act, and there have been some, there has been no complaint that I am aware of of this particular provision, which has been in operation now for nearly four years. If it were applicable in the cases covered by that Act, it seems to me to be equally applicable in the present case; and the power is not only not more liable, but I should think less liable to abuse under this Bill than under the Act to which my noble Friend referred. If the noble Lord could have shown that complaint had been made of that particular clause, or that there had been abuse of it, he would have made out a strong case against inserting it in another Act of Parliament, but, failing that, my only desire being really to make this effective, and to protect the unfortunate children, I feel myself obliged to resist the Amendment.

*THE LORD CHANCELLOR: I would suggest to my noble and learned Friend that it would perhaps effect his purpose, and I should think would satisfy the noble Earl behind me if that, which he has given as a reason of his somewhat exceptional power, should be made part of the provision itself—namely, that the Magistrate should only issue such an Order upon his being satisfied upon oath that the case was one of emergency. My noble and learned Friend will observe that although no doubt that is the leading idea throughout the clause, it is not confined to it; and I think if he would make it a condition precedent to the operation of this clause that the Magistrates should judicially determine that the case was one of emergency calling for this extreme and unusual remedy, a great part of my noble Friend's objection would be got rid of.

THE EARL OF MILLTOWN: If that satisfies my noble and learned Friend, of course I can hardly venture to press my objection, but I still think that this power is a most objectionable one. I would like to ask this question: What remedy would a man have if his house is broken into at any hour of the day or the night because somebody has succeeded in persuading some philanthropic Magistrate that there is a child in that house under ill-treatment? How is he to recover damages? This clause even as modified is of such a character that if one case of malfeasance occurs under it, it would become a dead letter. My noble and learned Friend challenged me to find a case where this particular clause in the Criminal Law Amendment Act had produced abuse. I am not aware that there is any, and probably it has never been put in force; but I would point out that it is much less likely that error should occur in the detection of the crimes covered by that Act than in the detection of crimes which this Bill deals with, such as, for instance, the question where a child is or is not neglected in a particular house. I confess I would prefer to leave the matter to two Justices. The noble and learned Lord himself just now objected to one Justice of the Peace having jurisdiction; and I do not see why the same objection should not apply now. I do hope that my noble and learned Friend will accept my very simple Amendment. With regard to the question of Stipendiary Magistrate, I may say that this is a matter which would generally occur in large and populated districts where there is always a Stipendiary Magistrate available.

LORD HERSCHELL: I should have no objection to having two Justices or a Stipendiary, provided that, in case of emergency, it may be done by one Justice. I would agree to that as a compromise. That would point, of course, to its being held to be a case of emergency.

VISCOUNT CRANBROOK: Perhaps my noble and learned Friend would, upon the Report, introduce what he considers the proper wording. I may mention to him with a view to consideration on Report, also, that there are very extraordinary powers in this sub-section. Power is given, unless the Justice otherwise directs, that the person who makes the charge should be a party to the seizure, and be entitled to go into the house. That might be the means of introducing very objectionable people into a house, who could not go there in any other way. I think it is a thing which ought not to be left to any person. Let the Justice direct who shall go if he pleases; but I think it would be undesirable to allow any person who so desired to enter the house of his own free-will. I think it is a very formidable thing to have unknown persons admitted to other people's houses.

Amendment by leave, withdrawn, Clause agreed to.

Amendment proposed in page 4, line 37, after the word "health" to insert the words "or is residing with common or reputed prostitutes or reputed thieves."—(The Lord Stanley of Alderley.)

LORD HERSCHELL: This would be introducing a new head altogether into this Bill, which deals with the neglect of children and not with the question of morality. There are provisions already in other statutes dealing with the consorting of children with prostitutes, and I do not think it would be desirable to embody such a provision in this Bill, which does not really deal with that question at all.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

THE EARL OF MILLTOWN: My Lords, Sub-section 3 empowers any person authorised by warrant to search for any child, to enter by force any house specified in the warrant and to remove the child therefrom. I cannot imagine anything likely to cause greater dissatisfaction, and just dissatisfaction, than such a power as this. It is surely a reasonable thing to say that this power shall only be exercised in daylight. It is a very strong thing to allow it to be done then; but to allow a house to be searched in order to see whether a child is there, and to ascertain if it is ill-treated, at any hour of the night, is really a most extraordinary proposition. I hope my noble and learned Friend will accept the very moderate limitation which I propose.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 8, after the word "enter" to insert the words, "at any time between six o'clock in the morning and nine o'clock at night."—(The Earl of Milltown.)

LORD HERSCHELL: My only reason for objecting is that I think there are cases in which this limitation would defeat the objects in view. If it is right for such purposes as this to enter between six in the morning and nine at night, I cannot see any magic that makes it wrong to enter at any hour. Those are the hours no doubt fixed with reference to the distinction between burglary and housebreaking; but is there any reason for such a limitation in the matter with which we are now dealing? When my noble Friend says that this is a provision which would be hateful, and strongly objected to by the people of this country, I must remind him that this particular clause comes to us in a Bill in its present form from those who are the representatives of this country other than those who are in the House of Peers. They are jealous of the rights of those whom they represent, and are likely to attend to anything that they think would seriously affect them. They represent the people who would be subjected to these provisions, and they, as their representatives, considered that it was worth while to yield up a portion of the rights of the community in that respect for the sake of securing a considerable and important end; and if they have been willing to do that, I do not see that your Lordships would do well to stand in the way.

THE EARL OF MILLTOWN: I really do not at all admit the doctrine that the

The Earl of Milltown

House of Commons are the only representatives of the people. Your Lordships are, in many respects, far better representatives of the people. I should think it extremely doubtful whether anyone's attention in the House of Commons was called even to this particular point. If the noble and learned Lord's faith in the House of Commons is so profound, how is it that he has himself put sheet after sheet of Amendments into this Bill? The Bill is extremely ill-drafted; and if it were not for the corrections which your Lordships have put into it, the time of Her Majesty's Judges would have been entirely taken up by endeavouring to find out the meaning of the Bill.

Amendment, by leave of the House, withdrawn.

LORD HERSCHELL: I will bear in mind what the noble Viscount has said about the 4th Sub-section. It might be that one ought to turn the provision round and enable the person to be present if the Justice of the Peace so directs. The Amendment I now have to propose is to leave out the words "legally qualified," in order to insert the word "registered."

Amendment moved, in Sub-Section 4, line 6, to leave out the words "legally qualified," and insert the words "registered."—(The Lord Herschell.)

*THE EARL OF POWIS: I would take this opportunity of asking the noble and learned Lord how he would make provision for the medical practitioner being properly paid, and what authority should fix the proper remuneration. In the case of a medical practitioner attending at an inquest, the Coroners' Act lays down the remuneration which he is to receive; he gets his guinea for attendance, and he gets his two guineas if he has a post mortem examination. It would be very undesirable to leave it at the mercy of the medical man to fix his own fee, and to make whatever charge he pleased.

LORD HERSCHELL: My impression is that there will be no power to remunerate the medical men out of the public funds. There is no such provision here, but there are cases where the person making the information himself obtains the services of a medical man, and it is a matter of arrangement with him what is the fee which the medical man shall receive. It would be necessary to fix the fee if it were a charge upon the public funds, but that is not the case here. I do not see that there is power given to the Justice of the Peace to insist upon any medical man being present; it is only to enable the Justice to allow the person to be accompanied by a medical practitioner; it does not enable the Justice to order a medical practitioner to attend.

Clause as amended, agreed to.

Clause 6.

LORD HERSCHELL: This is a clause which raises a question of very considerable difficulty which has weighed upon my mind a good deal. It enables in the first instance the accused person to give evidence. As to that I do not think there is likely to be any difference of opinion, but it goes further, and it makes the husband or wife not merely competent to give evidence, but compellable to give evidence. Undoubtedly, that is a very great innovation, and one which under circumstances which I can conceive might give rise to a considerable amount of feeling. The object of inserting it is one with which I entirely agree. There are many wives who would feel it their duty to give evidence if summoned to do so for the protection of their children (and the same may be said, perhaps, of husbands too) who do not like to appear to volunteer. They would attend if summoned to attend as witnesses, but they do not like to offer themselves when they are not summoned. It affords a kind of protection which it is natural they should desire and which it is right, I think, to extend to them. But it, of course, covers the case of a witness, a wife we will suppose, attending unwillingly, and when asked questions which will incriminate her husband refusing to answer, and as the clause stands the Judge would have no alternative if the witness so refuses to answer but to send her to prison, and I think that, if such a case arises as a wife refusing to testify against her husband and being sent to prison in consequence of that act, there would be likely to be a very considerable sensation excited, and

I think it is not at all unlikely that the provision would be condemned. I have, therefore, sought to hit upon a middle course, one which will give all the protection which is desired, which will prevent the appearance of volunteering evidence on the part of the wife or husband, and at the same time prevent such an occurrence as I have just described. What I propose is this, that the clause be amended by providing (I will put the exact form of the Amendment in a moment) that the wife or husband of such a person shall be competent, and may be required to attend to give evidence as an ordinary witness in the case, but shall not be deemed to be in contempt for refusing to answer a question tending to incriminate the accused person. That enables either a wife or a husband to be heard as an ordinary witness; but at the same time if he or she is unwilling to answer questions incriminating the accused person the Judge would not be under the obligation of sending the witness to prison. It seems to me that that is a middle course which is likely to secure all the advantages that the clause would have secured, without at the same time those disadvantages which might have brought discredit upon it.

Amendment moved to leave out the word "compellable" in order to insert the words "may be required to attend," and at the end of the clause to add the words—

"But shall not be deemed to be in contempt for refusing to answer a question tending to incriminate the accused person."

*THE LORD CHANCELLOR: I cannot help thinking that this is a somewhat circuitous mode of meeting the case. Would it not be better at line 21 to strike out the word "and," and to insert the words "but not?"

LORD HERSCHELL: I will explain why I did not do that. I want to insert the words "may be required to attend as an ordinary witness." That is, that a husband or wife may be summoned by the Court—that is really what is required for their protection. All I do is this: if in any case the witness says, "I will not answer that question because it will incriminate my husband," or "my wife," then I protect the witness from the ordinary consequences of refusing to answer questions.

*THE LORD CHANCELLOR: That would amount to this, that you would force the husband or wife into the witness box, and enforce upon them the duty of giving what may be the most cogent evidence, perhaps, against the incriminated person by declining to answer a question. I object to that sort of indirect admission of the husband or wife which you would force from their lips.

LORD HERSCHELL: Then I should propose to leave the clause as it is.

THE EARL OF MILLTOWN: The object is to make the evidence of the husband or wife evidence for the defence, but not for the prosecution. It seems to me that if it should be evidence at all it should be evidence on either side. There are many cases of cruelty to children especially of which the wife is the only witness, and the husband continually escapes because she cannot be called. If you are going to do away with that anomaly, very well; but do it thoroughly, and enable the case to be proved by the only witness possible.

LORD HERSCHELL: My provision would do that.

*THE LORD CHANCELLOR: It will satisfy me if my noble and learned Friend will consider this matter on Report. I myself should prefer the words "but not" substituted for the word "and."

LORD HERSCHELL: Then we will leave the clause as it is till the Report Stage.

Clause 6 agreed to.

Clause 7.

LORD HERSCHELL: When this clause was before the Standing Committee containing a provision which appeared in it, rendering a child who was examined in pursuance of the provisions of this clause liable to the penalties of perjury, but limiting the punishment to two years' imprisonment, it was felt by many that, considering that we were dealing with the case of a child, of tender years, there was something revolting in an express provision that such a child might be sentenced to two years' imprisonment; at the same time, my noble and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor said, and I confess I shared his view, that it would not do to say that a child examined under this clause should not be liable to be indicted for the offence of giving false evidence, because sometimes that might be the only way in which a person whose character had been affected by the child's evidence would be able to clear it. I feel myself, also, that it would be making a strange distinction to say that the child who could understand the nature of an oath and who told a falsehood should be liable to punishment, whilst a child who did not understand the nature of an oath, but knew that it ought to tell the truth and did not tell the truth, should be liable to no punishment. The result would be certainly to put a premium on the absence of theological knowledge, which seems to me indefensible in principle. But in order to meet the various views that were expressed in the Committee, I propose to add as Sub-section (b) at the bottom of page 5 these words—

"Any such child whose evidence is received as aforesaid, and who shall wilfully give false evidence, shall be liable to be indicted and tried for such offence, and on conviction thereof may be adjudged such punishment as is provided for by Section 11 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, in the case of juvenile offenders."

Clause 15.

Amendment moved, that the following Clause be inserted after Clause 14:—
"That Section 7 and Section 10 of this Act shall not apply to Scotland."—(The Lord Stanley of Alderley.)

Amendment agreed to.

*LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY : On this clause I wish to move an Amendment as to child life insurance. Clause 1 touches upon the question of insurance, but only where there has been proceeding by indictment and a conviction. The Registrar General, or some other equally high authority on statistics, has spoken more than once of the great infant mortality owing to insurance, and the number of children that die on account of over-insurance is so great that in a Bill of this kind for the protection of children I think the clause proposed would not be out of place.

Amendment proposed,

"After the passing of this Act, it shall not be competent to insure the life of a child so that on its death occurring before it is 10 years of age any money shall become payable in the policy, without prejudice, however, to any insurance to the effect of providing decent and proper burial for such child."—(The Lord Stanley of Alderley.)

LORD HERSCHELL : This Amendment, no doubt, raises an important question, but I think it is too large a question to be dealt with by a provision in this Bill—namely, the question of the insurance of infant life. I do not feel satisfied that if the matter were dealt with at all it ought to be dealt with upon the basis of prohibiting insurance under 10 years of age. For such a purpose I do not see why 10 years should be taken as the limit; but beyond that, the clause provides merely that it shall not be competent to insure the life of a child in the event of its death occurring before it is 10 years of age. I apprehend that at the present time a policy on the life of a child is void as much as the policy on the life of anyone else unless the person insuring is interested in the life—that is to say, no person can insure the life of another unless he is interested in that life. I have no doubt insurances are effected every day which would be void if those who insured the life chose to take the objection, but the truth is they do not take the objection—they find the business of insuring a profitable one, and its profits, of course, would entirely cease if they were to repudiate the insurance by refusing to complete their contracts on the ground that their contracts were void. Therefore, in saying that it shall not be competent to insure the life of a child under 10, unless you provide some machinery something going beyond the present law, which really makes an insurance where there is no interest a void insurance, you will effect nothing at all. It is not competent in a sense at the present time, inasmuch as the liability could not be enforced unless an interest in the life could be proved. Therefore, to say that it shall not be competent would be absolutely ineffectual. If you are to deal with this matter at all, it must be dealt with in the way of making it absolutely penal on those who take part in it. That is the only possible way to secure it. Then I think it can, and ought, only to be made penal in cases where there is not an interest which justifies the insurance and not where the insurance does not exceed that interest. There are cases where it is very proper to insure an infant's life. It is done constantly without any impropriety in the cases of settlements and leases for life and in various other cases. Those who have any experience of the business of insurance offices know that the insurance of infant lives in that way is a perfectly legitimate and necessary thing. The abuse consists in the insuring of lives where those who insure have no interest which justifies the insurance. To insure a life in the proper sense is to insure from loss by reason of the death where you are insuring the life of another person. That is the only proper object of insurance. In order, therefore, to deal effectually with this evil, you must first of all limit your prohibition to the cases where insurances ought not to be effected, and then, having limited your prohibition in that way, you must make it effectual by proper penalties. Under these circumstances, strongly as I feel the importance of the question raised by this Amendment, it seems to me that it lacks altogether the machinery which would be necessary to give effect to its intention.

*THE LORD CHANCELLOR : I have already expressed an opinion upon this subject, and I must say I entirely agree with my noble and learned Friend that this is an improper way of dealing with it. I believe it is a very important subject, and will have to be considered. As my noble Friend knows, everybody is supposed to have an insurable interest in his own life, and I believe the mode in which these things are done is that the infant is supposed to insure its own life, and then those who represent it obtain by inheritance or representation that which belongs to the child. Therefore, the objection to its being void by reason of the absence of insurable interest would not apply. But I quite agree there is no machinery here applicable to it, or I should myself have taken charge of an Amendment having the same object. I believe it is a subject which must be hereafter dealt with in a complete way, and that it is one which cannot be dealt with in a fragmentary manner, as it would be if it were endeavoured to be grafted upon a Bill of this kind.

Amendment, by leave of the House, withdrawn.

*LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY withdrew the remainder of his Amendment.

LORD WATSON: There is one Amendment of which the noble Lord had given notice, which seemed to be necessary in order to make Clause 15 complete, as in one part of Scotland, if not in others, there will be no Local Authority. The Amendment is on page 8, line 18, after the word "Council," to insert the words "as regards any police burgh in Scotland, the Commissioners of Police thereof."

THE MARQUESS OF LOTHIAN: I altogether differ from my noble Friend and cannot accept his proposal, which would lead to great confusion. The police burghs in Scotland would be independent of the Council for this purpose only. The Amendment which I introduced in the Standing Committee was to the effect that after the passing of the Local Government Bill all the powers which are now in the Commissioners of Supply, or in the police burghs would be transferred to the County Council, and after the passing of that Bill there would inevitably be confusion if this Amendment were carried.

LORD WATSON: These two Acts will run very nearly parallel. I should fancy it depends on who first obtains the Royal Assent. There is no reference in this clause to the supersession of the powers of the Commissioners of Supply by the County Council.

The Lord Chancellor

THE MARQUESS OF LOTHIAN: But by the Local Government Bill the powers of the Police Commissioners would be entirely superseded.

LORD HERSCHELL: The Local Government Bill does not come into operation until next year, so that there would be a certain hiatus which ought to be covered in some way.

THE MARQUESS OF LOTHIAN: On Report I will introduce some words to meet the case. Perhaps these words would do, "until the Local Government (Scotland) Act comes into existence."

LORD HERSCHELL: It will probably be better to put in these words now, and we can amend them on Report if they are not satisfactory.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 17.

Amendment moved, in page 8, line 20, after the word "the," to insert the words "prevention of cruelty to and,"—(The Earl of Aberdeen.)

THE EARL OF ABERDEEN: I may mention that the noble Lord who first proposed an alteration in the title has authorised me to say that he is quite in favour of the new form which I propose, and as I think my noble and learned Friend who has charge of the Bill is also in favour of it, I shall not trouble your Lordships with any remark. The Amendment is for the purpose of bringing out the twofold aspect of the Bill and meeting some of the objections which have been raised with regard to the nomenclature.

LORD HERSCHELL: Originally this was called the "Prevention of Cruelty to Children" Bill. Then objection was taken to that title on the ground that it covered matters which were not properly within that description. Then it was changed to the "Protection to Children" Bill. Then I have learnt that some of those who are interested in this measure think that it will not be so effectual if it does not keep also the title of Prevention of Cruelty. There seems to be no objection to give it a title which covers both.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, in the title, after the word "the," to insert the words "Prevention of Cruelty to and,"—(The Earl of Aberdeen),—agreed to.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE MARQUESS OF LOTHIAN: This is mainly a technical Bill providing for the re-arrangement of the position of two officers in Scotland, one of whom is called the Accountant of the Court of Sessions, and the other the Accountant in Bankruptcy. There are two main objects of the Bill. One is to consolidate the supervision of bankrupt estates, and other estates in the hands of the Scotch Courts, and the other is to subject to this supervision all estates without exception where an officer of the Court is an Administrator. The Bill is purely technical in its character, it has been considered by the most prominent legal bodies in Scotland, and many valuable suggestions which have been made by them have been incorporated into the Bill. I think I need not further explain to your Lordships the object of the Bill which I now move be read a second time.

QUESTIONS.

SCHOOL ACCOMMODATION.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON (Shropshire, Oswestry): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether his attention has been called to the statement, contained in the correspondence between the managers of the Luton National School and the Education Department, to the effect that Her Majesty's Inspector adopted "the 10 square feet per child basis" in calculating the accommodation now provided in the Luton National Boys' School, and to the fact that such basis has been approved by the Department; and, whether, having regard to Article 96 and Note of the Code, which directs that "8 square feet of internal area for each unit of average attendance" shall be the basis adopted, and having regard to the principle hitherto acted upon by the Department that voluntary schools shall not be touched by the 10 square feet basis, and that in case of schools which have been passed by the Department for a certain number of children the arrangement shall not be disturbed, he will say what the Department hold to be the future basis to be used in reckoning the amount of accommodation in voluntary schools.

*THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): My attention has been called to this statement. There is no interference with voluntary schools as to space, so far as the Code and the grant are concerned. The rule laid down in the Luton case is the same which has been acted upon since the passing of the Act of 1870 — namely, that a School Board may calculate the deficiency in school places on the assumption that 10 square feet is a reasonable allowance for each child.

MR. S. LEIGHTON: I beg to give notice that on the Education Estimates I will call attention to this new departure in treating the voluntary schools upon a different footing to the Board Schools.

IRELAND—DRAPERS' COMPANY'S ESTATES.

SIR GEORGE TREVELYAN (Glasgow, Bridgeton): I beg to ask the Solicitor General for Ireland, with reference to Mr. Commissioner Lynch's remarks on certain proceedings connected with the Drapers' Company's estates in Ireland, made on the 26th July and 1st August, whether the Government intend to take criminal proceedings for the purpose of protecting the Exchequer against injury from irregular and improper action in connection with the Land Purchase Act; and whether the conduct of the Justice of the Peace who passed the agreement has been brought before the notice of the Lord Chancellor?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, University of Dublin): The Land Commissioners Report that there is a Motion listed before Mr. Commissioner Lynch for to-day on behalf of the Messrs. Glover, solicitors, to rescind the Order made against them, and that, pending the hearing of that Motion, it would be premature to offer any opinion as to what further steps, if any, should be taken in the matter. Mr. Commissioner Lynch has transmitted the Papers to the Lord Chancellor having regard to the manner in which two affidavits were sworn before a Justice of the Peace.

THE ROYAL ARTILLERY AND ROYAL ENGINEERS.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether his attention has been drawn to complaints that a restrictive limit of compensation was withheld from the knowledge of Officers of the Royal Artillery and Royal Engineers when they were invited to retire under the Royal Warrants of 1881 and 1884; whether the principle of actuarial calculation has been applied to all cases of Regimental full Colonels of the Royal Artillery and Royal Engineers, and also to the cases of Lieutenant Colonels, Royal Engineers, subsequent to that of Lieutenant Colonel E. M. Lloyd; whether a Treasury Minute, or a Departmental Ruling, of September, 1882, has been applied to the cases of those Lieutenant Colonels, Royal Engineers, who retired under the above Warrant, from Lieutenant Colonel E. R. James to the case of Lieutenant F. B. Mainguy, thereby reducing their life annuities for loss sustained under Warrants of a later date than 1872, to £150 a year, instead of granting them the compensation they were entitled to on actuarial calculations, as stipulated by the Warrant; and, whether he will lay such Minute or Ruling upon the Table?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): I am afraid that I cannot give the hon. Gentleman the information he desires upon this particular point.

IMPORTATION OF SHEEP AND CATTLE.

SIR EDWARD BIRKBECK (Norfolk, E.): I beg to ask the Vice Chamberlain whether the increased imports of mutton into this country since the stoppage of the German sheep are much greater than any loss due to the discontinuance of live sheep from that country; whether it is a fact that, while 176,000 fewer sheep have been landed in England in the first six months of 1889 than in those of 1888, the receipts of fresh mutton have been greater by 135,000 cwt. or, roughly, the equivalent in mutton of 270,000 sheep; and, whether, considering that the entire import of cattle from Schleswig-Holstein has ranged from 8,000 to 15,000 head annually, any loss to our meat supplies from the non-importation of cattle from that country this summer is far more than made up by the fact that the live imports of cattle generally in the first half of 1889 have exceeded those of 1888 by over 50,000 head?

MR. BEAUFOY (Lambeth, Kennington): I wish also to ask whether, taking into consideration the hardship inflicted on the working classes in London by the present high price of meat, especially of mutton and lamb, he will consider the desirability of removing the present restriction on the importation of cattle and sheep from the Duchies of Schleswig-Holstein?

THE VICE CHAMBERLAIN (Viscount LEWISHAM, Lewisham): Since the discontinuance of the imports of live sheep from Germany it is true that the receipts of fresh mutton have largely increased. It is also the case that though sheep "on the hoof" from Germany have been and are prohibited, the imports of fresh mutton from that country have been largely augmented, so that nearly an equivalent of live sheep has been received as fresh mutton. The receipts of live sheep into the United Kingdom from all foreign countries were in the six months ended June 30, 1889, 174,975 less than in the corresponding period of last year and 234,871 less than in 1887. On the other hand, the imports of fresh mutton were in the same periods 135,034 cwt. in excess of 1888 and 265,346 cwt. over 1887. The receipts of cattle from all foreign countries and British possessions were in the six months of 1889 233,442, as compared with 181,317 in 1888, and 132,585 in 1887; while of fresh beef the quantity was 622,370 cwt. in the six months of this year, against 409,358 cwt. in 1888 and but 337,556 cwt. in 1887. The present high prices of mutton and lamb are due to the better state of trade generally, and consequent greater spending power of the consuming classes, and not to any diminished receipt of foreign meat, since the figures given show that the receipts of meat of foreign origin have been far in excess of those in previous years. According to the latest Returns received from the German Government, foot-and-mouth disease existed in Schleswig-Holstein up to July 16.

CAB-OWNERS AND THE EXCISE LICENCE.

MR. JAMES ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has been able to make arrangements with the Board of Inland Revenue, which will afford any alleviation to cab-owners in respect to the Excise Licence?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): I have been in communication with the Board of Inland Revenue, and they inform me that the present practice under the existing law could not be altered, and that any change in the law would present some practical difficulties. Hackney carriage licences are on the same footing as the other establishment licences (ordinary carriages, servants, and armorial bearings) and the dog licences.

MR. J. ROWLANDS: Upon the 3rd of June the right hon. Gentleman held out some hope that an arrangement might be come to between the Home Office and the Board of Inland Revenue. Does he see any chance of that arrangement being arrived at?

MR. MATTHEWS: I stated that I would communicate with the Board of Inland Revenue in order to see whether anything could be done, and the answer I have given to the question of the hon. Gentleman gives the result of that communication.

THE SHANNON DRAINAGE BILL AND THE IRISH FISHERIES.

MR. O'KEEFFE (Limerick): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he is aware that the Inspectors of Irish Fisheries gave public notice of their intention to hold inquiries at Athlone, Killaloe, and Limerick, as to what effect the works proposed under the Shannon Drainage Bill would have on the Shannon fisheries; that the Board of Works, in a letter dated 9th July ultimo, promised to have one of their engineers present at the inquiry to explain the nature and extent of the proposed works, of which the Shannon Fishery Conservators were left in ignorance; and that on the faith of this promised information a large number of landed and riparian proprietors, conservators, professional gentlemen, and fishermen had come long distances, at great personal inconvenience, to attend the first of these inquiries at Athlone on Wednesday, 31st ultimo; whether the Board of Works were represented at this meeting; and, if not, in face of their summons, to explain absence; whether the meeting proved abortive in the absence of the information which could be supplied only by the Board of Works; and, whether he would direct the Board of Works to give reasonable compensation to the professional gentlemen and other witnesses who attended the inquiry, for personal expenses and loss of time occasioned by a breach of faith on the part of the Board.

*THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): The absence of the Board of Works representative was, I am informed, due to the fact that the date of the inquiry had been altered to the 31st ultimo, and the notification of the alteration miscarried owing to the absence of the Chief Engineer in London on a Parliamentary Committee. The Fishery Commissioners had, however, already been furnished with all plans and available information; and, under these circumstances, I cannot admit any liability on the part of the Board of Works for the expense caused by the adjournment.

IRELAND—PRISON TREATMENT— WHITEWASHED CELLS.

MR. O'KEEFFE: I beg to ask the Solicitor General for Ireland what is the result of his promised inquiry as to the condition of Francis Tully, prisoner in Limerick Gaol for a term of 12 months' imprisonment, and who has been certified by the District Prison Surgeon to be suffering from catarrhal ophthalmia; and if he can state the nature of his offence, by what Magistrate tried, and what period he has been in gaol?

MR. MADDEN: The General Prisons Board inform me that the Medical Officer of the prison reports that the prisoner, Francis Tully, had been treated for slight catarrhal ophthalmia, but that he is now well and his general health good. The prisoner is undergoing sentences of two terms of imprisonment of six months each—one for assaulting a bailiff, the other for resisting and obstructing the Subsheriff. The committing Magistrates were Mr. Hickson, R.M., and Mr. Brady, R.M. He has now been 10 months in prison.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): Considering the numerous cases which have been brought to the notice of the Government of ophthalmia arising from imprisonment in Irish gaols, have they any objection to order an inquiry to be made in order to ascertain whether whitewashed walls have any injurious effect upon the eyesight?

MR. MADDEN: As questions upon that subject have already been put to my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary, I think it would be better that the question should be repeated when he is in his place.

THE BAND OF THE DUBLIN WORK- MEN'S CLUB.

MR. SEXTON: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury why the Irish Board of Works have refused to permit the band of the Dublin Workmen's Club to play a selection of music in St. Stephen's Green Public Park on Sunday evenings during the present summer?

MR. JACKSON: St. Stephen's Green Park is a square in the city surrounded by private residences, places of public worship, and a hospital. The Board of Works have not felt justified, under the circumstances, in permitting bands to play in it on Sundays.

MR. SEXTON: Is not this a very large square indeed, and cannot some arrangement be made by which the band can be allowed to perform without interfering with the arrangements for divine service? I may remind the hon. and learned Gentleman that the band of the Board of Works is allowed to play in the Phoenix Park.

MR. JACKSON: I shall be glad to make further inquiry, but I think it is hardly fair to compare this square to the Phoenix Park.

EVICCTIONS ON LORD CLANRICARDE'S ESTATE.

MR. SEXTON: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland what particulars he can give of the recent evictions on Lord Clanricarde's estate in the Portumna district; whether any further evictions there are in contemplation; what offers of settlement, if any, were made on the part of the landlord and of the tenants respectively; and, whether he will lay upon the Table a Copy of any Correspondence between any member or officer of the Irish Government and any persons acting in the interest of the landlord, or of the tenants, with respect to this estate?

MR. MADDEN: On behalf of my right hon. Friend I must ask the right hon. Gentleman to postpone the question until to-morrow.

SLAVE TRADE CONFERENCE.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs what further steps have been taken to bring about the promised Conference on the Slave Trade?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSON, Manchester, N.E.): The Belgian Government have been in communication with the Powers concerned. From the latest information received from Brussels it appears that the Conference cannot assemble before the middle or end of October.

PUBLIC BUSINESS.

MR. PHILIPPS (Lanark, Mid): I wish to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if the Government intend to persevere with the Irish Drainage Bills?

MR. J. ROWLANDS: And is it intended to proceed with the London County Council (Money) Bill?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): It is certainly not intended to stop all the operations of the London County Council, and therefore it is intended to proceed with the London County Council (Money) Bill; but it may not be possible to take it this evening. With regard to the Drainage Bills, I must ask the hon. Member to put the question to my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to-morrow.

DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.): Will the Committee stage of the Infectious Diseases Notification Bill be taken this evening?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): No, Sir.

THE DEFEAT OF THE DERVISHES.

COLONEL EYRE (Lincoln, Gainsborough): Has the Secretary of State for War any further news from Sir Francis Grenfell?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: Sir Francis Grenfell telegraphed to me last night that the loss amongst his force was 17 killed, including one English private soldier, and 131 wounded, of whom six were Englishmen. The House will, I am sure, be gratified to find that so stubborn a contest and so complete a success, showing great gallantry on the part of all the troops engaged, has resulted in no greater loss to our force. He adds:—

"I reconnoitred with mounted troops at daylight this morning; found Dervish force completely broken up; cavalry following up the few fighting men that remain. I have now over 1,000 prisoners and wounded Dervishes here, and refugees are coming in fast. Gunboats patrolling. I have sent Wodehouse's column south to Abu Simbel to head retreating Dervishes."

As various questions have been asked in this House with regard to the state of the Dervishes who have fallen into our hands, I think hon. Members may like to hear an extract from a private letter written to me by Sir Francis Grenfell on this subject, dated 22nd ultimo:—

"I think you may be glad to know that all my officers are doing their very best to alleviate distress. All who come in are rationed and well treated. I have sent up five large sailing boats full of food and medical comforts, with a doctor, to pick up and feed starving Dervishes. We have now (July 22) relieved not less than 1,200, and above 400 I have sent straight down to Cairo."

SIR W. LAWSON (Cumberland, Cockermouth): Does General Grenfell state the estimated number of the enemy slain?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: No, Sir; he does not say that in his last Despatch.

SIR W. BARTELOT (Sussex, Horsham): May I ask my right hon. Friend whether, with the exception of the 20th Hussars, any British troops were employed? It is stated that there were five or six British soldiers wounded.

*MR. E. STANHOPE: Some of the British officers belonged to the Egyptian Army. The 20th Hussars was the only British force engaged. A portion of the force was composed, not of black troops, but of fellaheen.

THE DONEGAL BATTERING RAM.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): On the 16th of April, in reply to a question by the hon. Member for the Holmfirth Division (Mr. H. Wilson), the Chief Secretary stated that the cost of the Donegal battering ram was £48 18s. 3½d. If that cost is charged upon the public, the amount should appear somewhere on the Estimates, and we ought to be able to find out from what public fund it comes. Having regard to the fact that the Constabulary Estimate is to be taken to-morrow, will the Solicitor General for Ireland state where this item is to be found?

MR. MADDEN: I am not responsible; but if the hon. Member will give notice, I will make inquiry.

MR. MAC NEILL: May I, then, ask the Secretary to the Treasury under what head of the Estimates the battering ram is charged?

MR. JACKSON: I am unable to answer the question. The accounts do not come before the Treasury.

MR. MAC NEILL: May I ask you, Sir, to whom I am to apply? I have already asked three Officers of the Crown, without effect.

*MR. SPEAKER: It is certainly not for me to answer that question.

MR. MAC NEILL: Then, on my own responsibility, I will put the question to the fountain of all knowledge, the First Lord of the Treasury.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will give notice of the question.

PUBLIC WORKS LOANS.

On Motion of Mr. Jackson, Bill to grant money for the purpose of certain Local Loans, and for other purposes relating to Local Loans, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Jackson and Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 365.]

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

PRINCE OF WALES'S CHILDREN BILL. (No. 358.)

Order for Third Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Bill be now read a third time."
—(Mr. W. H. Smith.)

*MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): We have now reached the last stage of this Bill, and it is very obvious that it will be carried. We have been unable to make those alterations in Committee which we thought might have, to a certain extent, mitigated the objections to it. Although the reasons we have urged against the Bill have not convinced the House, they have, notwithstanding, remained unanswerable and unanswered. I do not propose to go through those reasons again. Through some accident a Division was not taken on the Second Reading stage, and it is only proper, therefore, that a Division should be taken now, because this is one of those Bills in which it is most desirable to establish no precedent that can be used to the disadvantage of the taxpayers in subsequent years. But there are two misconceptions which have arisen from the speeches of the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the right hon. Member for Denbigh (Mr. G. O. Morgan) that I am anxious to correct. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said that Her Majesty does not possess the means of providing for all her grandchildren in a manner befitting their station and dignity.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EX-CHEQUER (Mr. Goschen, St. George's, Hanover Square): I said, as the House would desire.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I, for my part, deny that there is any particular station and dignity enjoyed by the grandchild of the first Magistrate of this country. I consider that a grandchild ought to lapse into the general community. But, apart from this, I absolutely deny the hard statistical, arithmetical fact that Her Majesty has not enough to provide for those of her grandchildren who need provision thereof what the House would deem an amount befitting their station and dignity. It seems to me the Chancellor of the Exchequer was playing upon the word "all." Her Majesty has 83 grandchildren, but some of these grandchildren are the sons and daughters of the children of Her Majesty, who have married the Sovereigns of foreign States or those who will be the Sovereigns of foreign States. These ought to be eliminated, because they do not require to be provided for. We therefore have to deal with 12 grandchildren and no more. When we were in Committee upstairs, a sum was stated which represented the interest-producing investments of Her Majesty. We are not at liberty to mention this sum, but as regards realty, it is unquestionable that Her Majesty's three estates of Osborne, Claremont, and Balmoral would sell for a large sum if cut up into small lots. Of course, I am not claiming that Her Majesty ought to sell them during her lifetime, but there can be no question that if she did so to-morrow, and if she were to add to the amount realised her present personalty, she would have sufficient to make such provision for these 12 grandchildren as would maintain them in what the Chancellor of the Exchequer calls their station and dignity. I estimate that these three estates of Balmoral, Osborne, and Claremont, would realise at least £600,000. I would undertake to find persons who would give more than that for them to-morrow, so that I am in reality undervaluing them. Taking it that double the amount that on an average the younger son of a Duke generally gets would be a befitting state and dignity to the child of a younger child of the Queen, during Her Majesty's life, which I hope will be long preserved, Her Majesty can, if she pleases, give to her younger children the interest that she receives from the investments which it is admitted that she has made, for there is no kind of necessity for her to make further economies, and to put by further sums in order to enable her to give her grandchildren what the Chancellor of the Exchequer thinks that they ought ultimately to have. This leaves untouched the Privy Purse, and the revenues derived from the Duchy of Lancaster. The Duchy of Lancaster produces £38,000 more than at the commencement of her reign, and she has £16,000 from excesses on Classes 2 and 3—which is annually transferred to her private account. She has therefore £54,000 per annum more than was estimated as her private allowance when the Civil List was fixed; and surely out of this she might allow the £36,000 to the Prince of Wales for his children, instead of asking us to vote it out of the Consolidated Fund. I am taking, in these calculations, the figures as they were given to the Committee, but I never yet understood whether they include the legacies received from the late Prince Consort and from Mr. Nield. When I asked upstairs, I was told we must not pry into the private affairs of the Queen. I never asked the First Lord of the Treasury to give us any figures, but when they were given to me, I thought that I was entitled to ask for some explanation of them in order to ascertain what they did and what they did not include. I do not know even now whether they include these legacies.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: They do.

*MR. LABOUCHERE: The right hon. Gentleman says they do. The second misconception to which I would refer arose from the statement of my right hon. Friend the Member for Denbighshire, who said that the Queen cannot be expected to discharge her old servants. Now, there never was a question of discharging old servants. I do not know what my right hon. Friend means by "old servants." The servants I had in my mind cannot be called old servants. They are the political gentlemen who go out with one Ministry and come in with another. They cannot in any sense be called old servants of Her Majesty. They are nominally appointed by Her Majesty, but they are practically appointed by the the Minister of the day for the services they have rendered to their Party.

*MR. G. O. MORGAN (Denbighshire): May I explain? What I said was that it would be rather hard to call upon Her Majesty, at her present age, to revise her whole establishment, with the necessary result of turning away old servants.

*MR. LABOUCHERE: It would not be necessary to ask Her Majesty to revise her whole establishment, because the gentlemen in question are not permanently on Her Majesty's establishment. They are Peers and others who want to get a good thing, and do get a good thing, whenever a change of Ministry occurs. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said that, in the autumn of her life, Her Majesty ought not to be called upon to make changes which is tantamount to what my right hon. Friend said just now. Does the right hon. Member for Denbighshire know that last year certain gentlemen, amongst others the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir R. Welby, Earl Sydney, and Sir H. Ponsonby, actually met to see whether any economical changes could be effected? It is perfectly obvious those gentlemen did not meet in opposition to the desire of Her Majesty. On the contrary, they undoubtedly met together by the express desire of Her Majesty to see whether her establishment could be revised. I do not think I am wrong in saying that the question of the Buckhounds was gone into, and the suggestion was made that money might be saved by putting an end to that silly and foolish absurdity. The Buckhounds cost, I suppose, about £12,000 a year.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: No.

*MR. LABOUCHERE: I say yes: but call it £10,000.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: No.

*MR. LABOUCHERE: Then call it £6,000 if you like. The right hon. Gentleman is more of a Nimrod than I am and possibly knows more about these matters than I do, but the right hon. Gentlemen will hardly contend that the honour and dignity of the Crown is involved in having a number of tame dogs to run after a tame stag to the ridicule of all true sportsmen, and in giving a Peer £1,700 per annum to gallop after these animals. No member of the Royal Family ever thinks of going out with them. It was, I believe, suggested by this Committee that many honorary officials should be got rid of. But the very suggestion caused a flutter in the dovecote, and I believe that Lord Salisbury himself, as the provider of booty for the gentlemen I have alluded to, objected to have the the amount of the booty at his disposal diminished. Therefore it is clear that in making the suggestion for economies in Her Majesty's establishment, I was only supporting the action of Her Majesty. In conclusion I wish to record my protest against the idea that the Radical Party has devoted an undue amount of time to the discussion of the Royal Grants. It must be remembered that in this matter we are giving Grants to the third generation. I fully admit that we have no right to alter the total of the Civil List granted to Her Majesty at the commencement of her reign. But when we are asked to add to it, it is well to point out that the public are sick and tired of all the nonsense and tameness involved in the Civil List. It is said that we should compare its amount with that of Russia or Germany, but this would be an improper comparison, because, although, theoretically, a Monarchy, this country is practically a Republic with a hereditary President at the head of it. The fairer thing would be to compare it with the expenditure of the President of the United States, or of President Carnot in France. For my part I think that in future the Duchies of Cornwall and Lancaster ought to provide for the Sovereign and the Sovereign's Family, amounting as the Revenues of those Duchies do to something like £110,000 a year. My main objection to the course we are taking is that we are prejudicing the question of the Civil List of the next reign. I also protest against the idea that in this opposition to the Royal Grants there is any insidious design against the Monarchy, as has been asserted by the President of the Board of Trade and others, or that there is any discourtesy to the Queen. I have had no idea of anything in the nature of discourtesy. While I do not think that I am open to the charge of being desirous to curry favour with Royalty by lip-service in this House, I repeat that I admire and respect Her Majesty personally on account of her conduct as a woman and her conduct as a Constitutional Sovereign, and that the last thing that I should dream of would be any discourtesy towards her. I believe that in opposing these Grants I am only fulfilling my duty to my constituents, and that I am acting in the best interests, not only of the people, but also of the Sovereign. In conclusion I beg to move that the Bill be read a third time on this day three months.

Mr. Labouchere

MR. STOREY (Sunderland) seconded the Amendment.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the question to add the words "upon this day three months."—(Mr. Labouchere.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

MR. E. ROBERTSON (Dundee): Although I have not had the advantage of being present during the whole of these Debates, I hope the House will allow me to state in a few words the reasons which impel me to vote against the Third Reading of the Bill. Let me recall the attention of the House to the circumstances under which the Bill has grown. It is founded on the Report of a Committee appointed by this House, and I desire to call attention to the conduct of the Government in relation to that Committee, and especially to the action of the First Lord of the Treasury in regard to it. For three years I have again and again called upon the right hon. Gentleman to fulfil the undertaking given in the last Parliament that a Committee should be appointed to consider the system under which these Grants have been made to members of the Royal Family. I will not trouble the House with the history of the long series of admissions and evasions made by the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury on the subject of the appointment of this Committee, but I contend that the appointment of the Committee, on the Report of which the present Bill is founded, was no fulfilment by the right hon. Gentleman of the pledges which he had given to this House. Both this Government and its predecessor were committed to the appointment of a Committee to consider the whole system of Royal Grants independently of and before any new application. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. Gladstone) did not promise it in order that it might consider any new application, but he promised to appoint it the next Session if he remained in office. The right hon. Gentleman did not remain in office, but the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury has since promised repeatedly that a Committee should be appointed to consider the whole question without any reference to a particular application. I do not know whether the right hon. Gentleman admits that that is a correct statement.

MR. W. H. SMITH: No.

MR. E. ROBERTSON: I will not go back to the answer of the right hon. Gentleman, but I will remind him that in 1887 he distinctly pledged himself that a Committee should be appointed after Whitsuntide, independently of any new application being made, and even this year, on the 18th of March, the right hon. Gentleman said that he would place on the Paper the terms of the Reference as soon as the condition of business afforded a reasonable chance of the recommendations of the Committee being proceeded with. In fact, for the last three years the whole reason why the Committee had not been appointed was, that the pressure of the business of the House would not enable the right hon. Gentleman to proceed with it as expeditiously as he desired. More than that, the right hon. Gentleman gave me a personal promise that he would give me full notice of the terms of the Reference, but I have received no notice whatever, and I think that the right hon. Gentleman in proposing this Committee on such short notice broke his promise to me and, what is still more important, his engagement to the House. For my own part, in opposing this Bill, I hold that we ought to have regard to the whole endowments of the Royal Family, those arising from the Civil List, from the Crown Lands, the Royal Grants now in existence, the large sums granted for the maintenance of the dignity of the Royal Family and Household, and also the salaries paid to members of the Royal Family for services in the Army and Navy. The aggregate of these sums is sufficient without new claims being made, and what is required is a subdivision and redistribution, such as would take place in the case of the owner of a large estate. We should follow the example of every family in the country, and have a resettlement of the family property as the children come of age. I do not find from the Report of the Committee that even now we know the total sum paid to the Royal Family, but it cannot be far short of three-quarters of a million sterling, and I certainly think that that ought to be sufficient for Her Majesty and the different members of her family. I certainly cannot go back to my constituents and say that it is not, and therefore I cannot vote for this addition of £36,000 per annum for the maintenance of the children of the Prince of Wales. I would congratulate the Government upon having at last informed the House of the total amount of savings in the various branches of the Civil List, but until 30 or 40 years ago this information was given annually to the House. Owing to the action of Lord Brougham the Government withdrew the information which had been previously given; and since that time each successive Government has been guilty of a breach of duty towards the House in concealing the real facts of the case. I observe that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bury (Sir H. James) favoured the House the other day with a legal opinion upon the matter, but this is a mere question of the intentions of Parliament, and I should attach just as much value to the opinion of any hon. Member of this House, or to that of a boy who sweeps out a lawyer's office as I do to that of the right hon. and learned Member. I maintain that in withholding the information each successive Government has been guilty of a breach of duty. During all these years we have paid for the audit of the Civil List, and yet the information has been refused. It is only now in order that this Bill may be passed that we are favoured with the information. With regard to the hereditary revenues of the Crown, the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Bury contends that there is some kind of private ownership belonging to the Crown in these estates which justifies its making a bargain with the country, but I would point out that this was denied by Mr. Ilbert, a gentleman who has been promoted and favoured by all the Governments, and who was at one time legal adviser to the Government of India. The question is not merely a legal one, but it is an historical question as well, and in this connection Mr. Freeman also denies the view put forward on behalf of the Government. For these reasons I intend to vote against the Bill. I wish to protest against some of the comments which I have read upon the action of the Liberal section of the House. Odium most unprincipled in its origin and its character has been cast upon those Members in this House who constitute the majority of the Liberal Party, who have opposed this Bill. I am glad that I have been able to come to the House in time to share in the odium. I fully endorse the conduct of those who have taken that part, and I protest against the language which has been used both on this side of the House and the other. When I reflect on the source of this language, I cannot help wondering at the audacity of the persons who have used it. It has come from two of the most notorious demagogues in this House; one of them an ex-Tory apparently in process of conversion to the Radical section of the House, the other an ex-Radical apparently in process of conversion to the other side. Criticism from such persons falls lightly upon our shoulders; we know how unscrupulously they are bidding for popular support and we treat it with contempt and indifference. I regret that any reference has been made to the personal savings of the Sovereign in this Debate; in my opinion, that is a matter into which no Member of the House has a right to inquire, and I think that the Government have lowered the dignity of the Crown in making any reference to the subject. In opposing this Bill I feel bound to say that I do so through no want of appreciation of the character and services of Her Majesty the Queen; on the contrary, I hold that Her Majesty is the best and probably the greatest Sovereign that this country has ever seen. Her place in history will be beside Queen Elizabeth and probably Cromwell; but I decline to vote money for the purpose simply of enabling Royal personages to compete with vulgar plutocrats. We all admit that if we are to have a Monarchy we must pay for it. We are perfectly willing to pay for it and to maintain it in all reasonable dignity and splendour, but we decline to pay a single farthing more than is just and reasonable. I maintain that we have an abundant margin in the existing Royal Grants, and I dare not and will not undertake to support more. If this question attracts more attention than any other, if it should be productive of consequences injurious and disastrous to the Crown, the responsibility will not be upon us but upon you. I cannot conceive anything more injurious to the Crown, and more likely to be disastrous to the Monarchical Constitution under which we live, than that in the present circumstances of the country you should insist, merely because two new Royal personages have come on the scene, on adding £40,000 per annum to the enormous burdens of the country.

Mr. PHILIPPS (Lanarkshire, Mid): The hon. Member for Northampton said, amongst other things, that the discussion on this Grant had made it more difficult for any Minister to propose Grants in future. I think the voting on this Grant has made it absolutely impossible for any similar Bill to pass in the future. When the last

Royal Grant was proposed only 13 Members voted against it, but in the first Division against the present Grant 116 Members went into the Lobby against the proposed Grant. I believe that means that Royal Grants are over. These discussions have convinced me that we in this House are nothing like so advanced on this question as the people out of doors. However hon. Members may vote here, I am certain that if a poll of the constituencies were taken not half-a-dozen constituencies would vote for further Grants. [Cries of "Oh, oh!"] I will take as an illustration the case of the hon. Member who so well represents the miners of the Rhondda Division. That hon. Member fell foul of the prevailing opinion in this House, but afterwards when he went down to his constituents he was reproved because his language had not been stronger and more violent than it really was. I am glad to see from the newspapers that other constituencies are waking up, and are demanding from their Representatives a statement of the reasons which induced them to vote for this Grant. We in this quarter of the House have been reproached because on topics like this we pose as advocates of economy, while on other questions, the payment of Members for instance, we pose, as it is said, as the advocates of extravagance. There is one thing certain, and that is, that everyone in the House knows very well that if we had paid Members it would be absolutely impossible to get a Royal Grant Bill through the House. Such a fact proves most clearly that the payment of Members would be one of the greatest economies we could possibly advocate. We have heard a great deal about maintaining the dignity of the Crown, and I have never as yet heard anyone explain what is meant by the dignity of the Crown. If it means footmen, and gold lace, and carriages, I do not want to see the dignity of the Crown maintained. Then, again, it is said the Crown must be rich, that the Crown would not be respected if it were not rich. That, also, I absolutely and entirely deny. There is one thing we may bless ourselves for, and that is that riches in themselves are not as much respected as they were a generation or two ago. There is nowadays a wholesome tendency to go behind wealth to its causes. When people are told that a man is rich, they do not go straightway and worship him, but they ask how his wealth was got, whether it was made in a praiseworthy way. We have now in London a great many more millionaires than ever before, and more probably than there ever were in any other country. We have the millionaires of all countries amongst us. I think this is largely due to the fact of there being no Court in Paris to which the French millionaires can resort. We have here, too, any number of American and other millionaires. All these people come to London to enjoy themselves. The splendour of the Crown, as it is called, leads to these millionaires coming to London. [Ministerial cheers.] Yes, I quite admit it, but I dislike their coming here. I admit they are very useful to a certain number of tradespeople in Bond Street, but they create a tendency to extravagance and luxurious living which is bad for the people of the country as a whole. I deny that these cosmopolitan millionaires in London are good for Great Britain at large.

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Gentleman is dealing in a very discursive manner with the subject.

MR. PHILIPPS: I should like to go on to show, if I may, that the Crown could not anyhow be as rich as some of the richest millionaires in London, and that no Grant this House is likely to pass could enable the Crown to compete with these men in splendour. It is disputed what the Crown really costs. Some Members have put the figure at £700,000 or £800,000 a year. The noble Lord the Member for Paddington (Lord R. Churchill) asserted that the Crown costs us almost £120,000 a year. The noble Lord did not go quite so far as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain), but endeavoured to make it out that the Crown costs us nothing, and that we got something thrown in. But I maintain that the less you put the cost down at, the more you make it impossible for the Crown to compete in splendour with the rich men who now live in London. The Crown of this country must, therefore, rely for dignity and respect upon something very different to money and Grants from this House. We have had lately in this country a foreign potentate who is said to possess diamonds to the value of seven millions sterling. I have never heard it suggested that the man who possesses the most diamonds is the man to be most respected. I should like some authoritative definition of the word dignity. It is often said that the poorest labouring man in the country has a dignity of his own. Is it disputed that a man cannot maintain his dignity unless he has £30,000 or £40,000 a year? I look at the Crown as something very much more than a merely rich institution. When I consider that the Crown is the head not merely of this Kingdom and Empire, but the head of the British speaking peoples inside and outside the Empire; when I consider that as regards ourselves it is the personification of our national unity, and that its pedigree represents our history, I am very sorry to see the tendency to maintain the dignity of the Crown merely by lavish votes of this House. Our royalty is descended from great Kings who have built up our history, who have repelled foreign invasion, and made laws under which we still live, and I maintain that Royalty in that sense will always be, and ought to be, respected in this country. I do not wish to be considered as exalting the pedigree of the Crown, although I maintain that a pedigree is a much more honourable thing than money. It is a much more honourable circumstance for a man to be descended from one who has done great work for his country than for a man to have had a large amount of money left him.

*MR. SPEAKER: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. Gentleman, but he is forgetting what this Bill is. It is a Bill to make provision for the Prince of Wales' children. It has nothing whatever to do with the Crown in the general sense in which he is now speaking of.

MR. PHILIPPS: I will merely say I protest against this Bill because it seems to hold wealth as one of the items of the respect of the country. When I think how easily wealth can be obtained by people who are not respected, and deservedly so—

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

MR. PHILIPPS: I think it is bad that we should lay it before the people that wealth is a necessary ingredient of the respect properly paid to the Crown.

*MR. ATHERLEY-JONES (Durham, N.W.): Although I have been present during the Debates upon the Grant, I have not hitherto sought an opportunity of expressing any opinion thereon; and it is with no desire to protract the Debate that I venture to offer a few observations as to the reasons which actuate me in recording the vote I have given and shall give. I think it is clearly understood by the country that we Liberal Members would be disloyal to the position we occupy, and to the promises we have made, if we were induced to abandon our duty of watching most rigorously and jealously the appropriation of any public funds by the insinuation that we are guilty of adopting a cheese-paring policy. I do not think that charge proceeded with the most exquisite taste from the noble Lord the Member for South Paddington who has taken up a very worthy and a very proper position in endeavouring to check departmental extravagance in various branches of our Civil and Military life. And again, I feel it is my duty to protest in the strongest possible manner against the suggestion that we are attempting to penalise the Sovereign in respect to the accumulations of funds which are the outward manifestation of the decorum and dignity with which she has maintained the Crown. But while I take that view I am bound to enter into an examination as to whether we are guilty of the charge which is levelled against us. We have been even accused of disloyalty. It is somewhat instructive to find that in the Debates in 1837 on this very subject, by Lord Melbourne and the other Members of his Government, the same charge was levelled against the Whig Opposition. The Opposition of that day were twitted in wishing to substitute a Republic for the Monarchy. I think I am entitled to say that these charges are as unfounded now as they were ridiculous then. Now, while I support the Amendment of the hon. Member for Northampton, I conceive that it is a constitutional doctrine of the first importance that the Sovereign ought to be absolutely dependent upon Parliament for its maintenance, and I can conceive no more dangerous state of things than that the time should arrive when the Crown and the Royal Family should have revenues independent of Parliament. That is a Constitutional doctrine not of yesterday's birth, but which was propounded on the authority of the great statesman of 1837. Whatever deductions may be made from the value of his speech on the ground of Party spirit, Lord Brougham expressed the opinion of a large section of the House of that day, when he protested against the granting for an almost unlimited period of colossal revenues for the Crown. Lord Brougham also pointed out that it would be impossible for Parliament to come to the Crown and demand an account of the surplus of those incomes which had been found more than sufficient for the purposes of the Throne. I entirely disagree with what fell from the hon. and learned Member for Dundee (Mr. E. Robertson) when he said he had nothing to do with the private savings of the Crown. The raison d'être of our position is that the private savings of the Crown are funds which were allocated to particular purposes. I agree with hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite, that we have no right to touch those funds for the purpose of appropriating them to the support of the children of the Prince of Wales; but I hold that the spirit of the enactments of 1837 and 1841—the spirit of the original settlement of the Civil List—was that these funds were effected with a trust; that trust was that the funds should be employed for the particular purposes to which they were allocated; that if there was a surplus, that surplus should be used in the reduction of debt on other classes. The inevitable conclusion, therefore, is that if there is no deficit in other classes, any surplus should be applied to the general benefit and uses of the nation. It has been said by great statesmen that the basis and reason of our granting to the Crown these various sums of money for the maintenance of the members of the Royal Family, is that the Crown and the members of the Royal Family are circumscribed within narrow limits as to the persons with whom they can form alliances. There is not a Member of the House who does not rejoice that Her Majesty has reverted to the more ancient traditions of the Royal Family as to matrimonial alliances; but I think it will be admitted that the claim of those members of the Royal Family who contract marriages outside the area of members of the various reigning dynasties to be considered as members of the Royal Family, in the ordinary sense of the word, ceases. It is for those reasons, firstly, because I believe that this fund which is at the disposal of Her Majesty is a fund which is really held in trust for the nation; and, secondly, because I conceive that we have no right to appropriate money belonging to the nation for the purpose of endowing members of the Royal Family who marry into another grade of society that I oppose this Grant.

MR. CHARLES WILSON (Hull, W.): I would suggest to the hon. Member for Northampton the desirability of not dividing against the Third Reading of the Bill, but I hardly anticipate that my suggestion will be accepted after the speeches that have been made. I voted with the hon. Member for Northampton in his Amendment on Friday night, and I confess that I was influenced to a very great extent by the speech of the hon. Member. Until I heard that speech I did not make up my mind which way to vote. I quite agree that the Civil List is burdened with useless extravagances, and that a saving might be effected which would meet this Grant for the children of the Prince of Wales without imposing any additional burden on the taxpayers of the country. It must be remembered that now we have an enlarged franchise, and that these matters are discussed throughout the length and breadth of the land, and if we wish to make the Royal Family respected and honoured in this country, as we all do, it is undesirable in the extreme that any feeling of irritation should be produced amongst any class by any further Grants being asked for in respect of members of the Royal Family. The working classes feel very strongly on this subject, and no doubt this feeling extends to others. While I and others entertain such opinions, it is as well it should be stated that we entertain no feeling of disloyalty to the Queen, but that, on the contrary, we have great admiration and respect for Her Majesty and also for the Prince of Wales, whom we admit has discharged the duties that have fallen to him with wonderful tact and discretion. I shall not vote with the hon. Member for Northampton if he goes to a Division, because I consider it very undesirable that we take any course which may appear to be discourteous to the Royal Family. [A laugh.] An hon. Member laughs; but, still, we must consider that we have a great position to hold among the nations of the world, and that if that position is to be held properly the Crown of England must be represented amongst all the other great Monarchical nations of Europe in a fitting manner. I feel that it is extremely advisable the Third Reading should be passed without a division.

MR. HALLEY STEWART (Lincolnshire, Spalding): I should like to say a word in response to the hon. Member (Mr. C. Wilson). It is quite clear it is hardly possible for some Members of the House to approach the consideration of this question from a purely Monarchical or representative basis. I very much object to being obliged to say that we mean no disrespect to Her Majesty; but when I am personally charged with being disrespectful to the Sovereign, I am compelled to resent the charge. I, and others with whom I act in this matter, stand here with the simple object of discharging our duty to our constituents. Something fell from the Chancellor of the Exchequer on Friday night as to Her Majesty being in the autumn of her life. I should like to say distinctly that if the refusal of this Grant would cause Her Majesty any pain or inconvenience I should be the last Member of the House to oppose the Grant. It is clear to everyone who has any knowledge on the subject whatever that Her Majesty's income is so large that if this grant were withheld there would be no interference whatever with her personal comfort, but it would simply necessitate the rolling up of a smaller fortune than hitherto. Therefore, keeping in view the very large private fortune of the Queen, I hold it to be a simple duty to vote against the Third Reading of the Bill.

CLASS IV.

£2,104,339, to complete the sum for Public Education.

\*THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir WILLIAM HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): I believe I shall be following the usual course if I commence the observations I shall have to make to the Committee by explaining, in the first place, what work has been done in the past educational year. The sum voted for 1888-89 was, on the original Estimate, £3,576,077; but there was subsequently a Supplementary Estimate of £24,690, making a total of £3,600,767. The total expenditure for the year was £3,600,692, so that a balance was left of £75. The chief cause of the Supplementary Estimate was that the rate of grant per day scholar, estimated at 17s. 6½d., reached 17s. 7½d. The total sum required for the year 1889-90, for which I ask the Committee to be responsible, is £3,684,339, or an increase on the sum originally voted for the year 1888-89 of £108,262, or, allowing for the Supplementary Estimate, of £83,572. This large increase of £108,262 is accounted for by an addition of £101,459 for annual grants for day and evening scholars, now equal to £3,323,903, and of £1,940 for training colleges, the sum being now equal to £119,140. Those large sums are required to meet (1) an increase of 83,144, or 2·3 per cent in average attendance of day scholars, and 3,300, or 10 per cent in the average number of evening scholars; (2) an increase of 1½d. per scholar, or £27,254 in grants to day schools, now 17s. 8½d. per head; and (3) an increase in the number of students in the training colleges. With reference to the expenditure for salaries and staff there is little or no change to mention. There is merely the normal increase both at Whitehall and in the Inspectorate, the only change being the promotion of six writers to be clerks to the Lower Division. With regard to teachers' pensions, although the position of matters is not, on the whole, as satisfactory as could be desired, yet an additional sum is being paid by the State for so worthy an object. Provision has been made for four additional pensions at the highest rate of £30, 17 at £25, 13 at £20, the total number now in receipt of pensions being 607. In June, 1884, the restriction imposed upon the number of pensions, so far as it affected the claims of teachers employed before August, 1851, was relaxed, with the result that, whereas in 1884 there were 17 pensions of £30, now there are 45. In 1884 there were 86 pensions of £25, now there are 257. In 1884 there were 129 pensions of £20, and now there are 305. The addition to the annual cost of teachers' pensions is £8,600, the total sum provided for pensions and gratuities being £14,215. I will now give a few statistics as to the rate of progress in the elementary schools in the past year. I will give a comparison of the number of schools inspected between 1887 and 1888. In 1887 the number of schools inspected was 19,154, in 1888 the number was 19,221, or an increase of 67. Again, in 1887 we found school accommodation for 5,279,000 children, and in 1888 for 5,356,000, or an increase of 77,000. The scholars on the register in 1887 were 4,635,000, and in 1888 they were 4,687,000, or an increase of 52,000. The average attendance at the schools in 1887 was 3,527,000, and in 1888 it was 3,615,000, or an increase of 88,000. With respect to the percentage of the average attendance to the numbers on the register, it is satisfactory to note that we have got over the slight decrease, or rather the halting progress, of the two preceding years. In 1887 the percentage was 76·1. In 1888 it was 77·1. There was thus a solid gain of 1 per cent in 1888 as compared with 1887. The percentage of passes in standard subjects in 1887 was 87·32, and in 1888 it was 87·97. The number of scholars examined in Standards IV and upwards is a fair test of the efficiency of the teaching in the schools, and there also satisfactory improvement is indicated. The number examined was 912,000 in 1887, and in 1888 it was 953,000, showing an increase of 41,000, or of 4·5 per cent. The percentage of such scholars to the total number was in 1887 36·3, and in 1888 37·4, or an increase of 1·1 per cent. Now I will take another item which has been again and again discussed in the House, and which is acknowledged to be of very great importance as regards the future domestic happiness of the girls in the schools. I refer to the teaching of cookery, and I ask the House to listen to a few figures, because they show that since I gave a pledge some two years ago that the Department would do its utmost to promote instruction in cookery we have made rapid progress in that matter, although we have not yet reached the maximum point. The number of girls earning the cookery grant in 1887 was 30,431, and in 1888 it was 42,159, or an increase of 11,728. I will now give the number of certificated teachers. In 1887 it was 66,547, and in 1888 68,683, or an increase of 2,136. The number of pupil teachers has risen from 28,930 in 1887 to 29,901 or an increase of 971. Looking at those figures as a whole, they show a decided though gradual improvement in the efficiency of the work done in the elementary schools. They indicate naturally a rather lower rate of increase than in previous years, except on two headings, which I consider of the greatest importance. In the first place, there is a solid increase in the percentage of average attendance to the number on the registers. In fact, we have made up the lost ground of the two preceding years. In the second place, there is a large addition to the cookery grants, showing the advantages of the centre system of teaching and peripatetic teachers. In 1884 the number of girls taught cookery was 7,600; in 1885, 17,700; in 1886 the increase was 6,672, or 38 per cent; in 1887 it was 5,905, or 24 per cent; and in 1888 no fewer than 11,728, or 38 per cent, the total being 42,159, or nearly six times the number receiving grants in 1884. The increase in the number of children on the registers has fallen from 129,000 to 52,000; but the increase in the average attendance is the same as in 1887 (88,000), showing that the enforcement of regularity of attendance has more than kept pace with the addition to the number on the books during the year under review. I believe the new Code will have stimulated school attendance, and there is yet ample scope for energy in that direction when we remember that there is now a daily absence of more than one million children. I am convinced that that deficiency might be much further reduced by making school life more popular, and varying the curriculum, rather than by fines and compulsion. Taking into account all schools affording elementary instruction, there are no fewer than 4,800,000 children on the registers, or 16·75 per cent. of the population: while before the passing of the Education Act of 1870 there were only 7·08 per cent. of the population on the registers of such schools. That result has been achieved by the addition of 6,378 voluntary schools since 1870, providing accommodation for 1,668,000 children, and by the addition of 4,562 Board Schools, providing accommodation for 1,809,000 children. These additional schools are provided as follows: From 1870 to 1876 there were 4,396 voluntary, and 1,596 Board Schools provided; from 1876 to 1882 1,744 voluntary and 2,272 Board Schools; and from 1882 to 1888, 238 voluntary and 694 Board Schools. The school supply may now be considered as well provided for, only 67 schools of all kinds being added last year. Before I leave these statistics I should like—and especially in view of probable coming Debates on these important matters—to give a few figures with regard to school expenditure, and the cost of maintaining our elementary schools. The cost of maintenance per scholar in average attendance in Board Schools in 1877 was £2 4s. 7½d., as against £2 4s. 7½d. in 1888; in voluntary schools the cost was £1 16s. 4½d., against £1 16s. 4d. in 1888, being a decrease of ½d.; excluding London, the cost in Board Schools was £1 19s. 8½d., as against £1 19s. 8d. in 1888; in voluntary schools the cost was £1 15s. 9½d., as against £1 15s. 8½d. In the London Board Schools the cost was £3 0s. 5d., as against £3 0s. 6½d. In 1888, while in the London voluntary schools the cost was £2 3s. 9½d., as against £2 4s. 1½d. in 1888. London excepted, the expenditure throughout the year has been stationary throughout England and Wales, the net result being a diminution of ½d. per head in the cost of voluntary schools. In London, however, the cost of Board Schools has risen  $1\frac{1}{2}$ d., and now reaches 6s.  $3\frac{1}{2}$ d. a head more than in 1884, while the cost in voluntary schools has risen  $4\frac{1}{2}$ d., and now stands at 1s.  $11\frac{1}{2}$ d. a head more than in 1884. The increase in the cost of schools in the rest of the country has been during the same period, in Board Schools 1s.  $11\frac{1}{2}$ d., and in voluntary schools 1s.  $1\frac{1}{2}$ d. The increase of cost, therefore, in the Metropolis contrasts unfavourably with the rest of the country. Contributions from the rates amount to, per scholar, 17s.  $7\frac{1}{2}$ d., a reduction of  $1\frac{1}{2}$ d. compared with 1886-7; subscriptions, 6s.  $7\frac{1}{2}$ d., the same as the year before; payments by children in Board Schools, 8s.  $11\frac{1}{2}$ d. per head; in voluntary schools, 11s.  $1\frac{1}{2}$ d. per head, being a reduction of  $1\frac{1}{2}$ d. and 1d. respectively. Compared with the figures of 1884, the rates have increased 1s.  $4\frac{1}{2}$ d. per head, the voluntary contributions have fallen  $\frac{1}{2}$ d. per head, and the school fees have fallen  $6\frac{1}{2}$ d. per head in Board Schools and  $1\frac{1}{2}$ d. per head in voluntary schools. The increased cost per scholar from 1884 to 1888 has been, in Board Schools, 2s. 11d.; in voluntary schools, 1s. 2d. A reduction during the same period has taken place in the fees and contributions of voluntary schools of 2d. per head, and in the fees payable to Board Schools of  $6\frac{1}{2}$ d. per head. The total deficiency has been met in Board Schools by an increase of rates 1s.  $4\frac{1}{2}$ d., miscellaneous receipts  $1\frac{1}{2}$ d., additional grant 1s.  $11\frac{1}{2}$ d.—being a total of 3s.  $5\frac{1}{2}$ d.; and in voluntary schools by an increase of endowment  $\frac{1}{2}$ d., and additional grants 1s.  $3\frac{1}{2}$ d.—or a total of 1s. 4d. So much for the educational work of the past year. But if I finished my statement here I should be doing not only myself, but also the Department with which I am connected, a grievous wrong. I must therefore pass on to review other matters. I have been told over and over again during the past few months that the Code with which my name has been connected is much too stringent. It is now practically withdrawn from the cognisance of Parliament; but, so far as my experience goes, I think that one of the most indifferent methods of enjoying life is to have anything like a joint parentage in a Revised Code. The amount of inquiry, disturbance, and criticism is such as to be absolutely destructive of peace and comfort so far as this life is concerned. Before I proceed further with my remarks however, I must express my extreme regret that the constant pressure of public business has prevented me from making an explanation of the Code. I admit that I have not pressed my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House to any great extent, and when I refer to the criticisms of the Code I do so in no impatient and carping spirit. A document so intricate and so replete with technical language might easily be misunderstood, and, therefore, I am not surprised at the criticism. The Code was criticised from two points of view. It was urged by many that it did not go far enough, so far as education is concerned; while others said it went so far as to injure the schools in which they were most intimately interested. I believe, however, that whatever sins of omission or commission may be in these proposals, it will be acknowledged by all that, so far as its educational aspect is concerned, it is one of the best Codes ever laid on the Table of this House. I should like, if I may be permitted, to allude for a few moments to one or two of the more important questions raised in this document. One of the chief criticisms to which I have been subjected is that the Department have only partially adopted the recommendations of the Royal Commission, while they ought to have been adopted as a whole. It is true that the Department have not adopted all the recommendations of the Commission, but with some experience of the House and with some knowledge of political Parties I was aware that some of those recommendations would have provoked bitter Party controversy. We may fairly urge, therefore, that the Department did right in seizing upon recommendations which had received the commendation, not only of those who signed the Majority Report, but of those who signed the Minority Report as well. Let me deal, then, for a few moments with this charge. I may turn to the page of the Report in which the majority say that their desire has been first to make such recommendation as will give the country certain inestimable advantages for the present large outlay. But what happened, for example, in regard to the proposal to assist voluntary schools out of the rates? Those who represented the interests of the majority of the Commission held a large meeting at which this question was discussed, and by an enormous majority the proposal was rejected. I should like now to deal with the most important change which was proposed, and that was in regard to the administration of the Grants. No one has studied either the evidence laid before the Royal Commission or the Majority or Minority Reports without coming to this conclusion—how very little really was urged in favour of the maintenance of the existing system of payment by results, and how much was urged against it. In framing these new proposals the Department felt, of course, the heaviest responsibility, because, so far as educational results were concerned, and particularly in respect of the elementary subjects, we felt we were leaving safe ground. We felt the gravest responsibility in bringing these proposals before Parliament. The great complaint made and urged before the Commission was that the existing system had grown too mechanical in its character, that it produced nothing but a system of cram, and that, instead of turning out the pupil with all his faculties broadly and widely developed, it looked upon the wretched scholar much in the light of a machine calculated to grind so many bushels of corn. In regard to the new system of administering the grants, the Education Department have endeavoured as nearly as possible to follow the recommendations of the Majority Report of the Royal Commission. These proposals have been criticized from various points of view. In the first place, the Department has been told that payment by results would practically obtain under the new proposals. My reply to that is that nothing of the kind would happen, and that under them the elementary subjects would be judged on the same system as class subjects; the whole standard would be examined, and the Inspector would judge accordingly, and the award of the grant would not depend, as heretofore, on individual passes, but on the fact that the children, as a whole, had reached one of three standards which were named. It is difficult to explain the scheme without the Committee having before them the instructions which would be issued to Inspectors, but the Department hope to found it on a system which has been thoroughly tried and tested in this country. It is said that the scheme leaves too much in the hands of the Inspectors, but I have to point out that these Inspectors are gentlemen who have been well tested in the work they have to accomplish, and none will have had less than 10 years' experience. No doubt the Inspector's Report will indicate to the Department what grant a school should receive, but the Report will have to be of the most searching and thorough character, and upon that Report the Department will have to judge. I have been told that the new proposals will be destructive of the interests of many of the voluntary schools, and that I shall be regarded as an immolator and destroyer. That I need hardly say, considering my predilections and my past experience, is not precisely the line of conduct I should sketch out for myself, but it would be well, perhaps, I should state how I believe the proposals will work. In the first place, the lowest grant of 12s. per scholar, according to our late proposal, must, at all events, be awarded to every school for two years which has a certificated teacher. I think there was something humane in a proposal by which every efficient school which has a certificated teacher should have two years, at all events, in which to improve its position and be secure of the 12s. grant. I should like to explain the position in regard to the three proposed grants of 12s., 14s., and 15s. 6d., respectively. These represent in the three standards of the schools, the percentage grant, the merit grant, and the fixed grant of 4s. 6d. At present no school does obtain 12s. per scholar unless it can produce 78 per cent of passes; likewise no school can obtain the 14s. grant unless it passes 90 per cent, and no school can obtain the 15s. 6d. grant unless it has 96 per cent of passes. I find that nearly 20 per cent of all our schools passed less than 78 per cent, and earned less than 12s. per scholar, and, therefore, in the case of that 20 per cent the Department's proposals will give an additional impetus to improve the efficiency of the schools. Proceeding on we find that 37·39 per cent of our day schools pass less than 90 per cent of the pupils, and receive less than 14s. I find in most of these schools there is the same result—an increased grant in every case up to the maximum. Again, I find that no less than 42 per cent of the remainder of our Board Schools pass between 90 and 100 per cent. A large majority of these pass between 90 and 96 per cent. There is also a considerable gain in grant per head in each one of these schools. Therefore, when I am told that this is a vast scheme for the demolition of voluntary schools, I cannot help regarding the statement as somewhat astounding, and I am anxious to discover some fact or reason which will act as a warning to me and bear out the assertion.

Mr. MUNDELLA (Sheffield): The right hon. Gentleman spoke of the number of schools that passed less than 70, less than 80 and 90 per cent. Could he tell us the number of schools which passed less than 65 per cent and less than 60 per cent, and the number that get no grant at all?

*Sir W. HART DYKE: I have no doubt I could get the information from the right hon. Gentleman, but I have not the figures with me. I know that, below 65 per cent, there are a good many.

Mr. MUNDELLA: Yes.

*Sir W. HART DYKE: Before I leave this point, I may say that, in respect of the poorer or struggling class of schools in this country, this scheme of ours is eminently calculated to assist such schools. It will afford them the utmost encouragement to improve their efficiency, and they will be, in the vast majority of instances, afforded the solid and substantial advantage of an increase of their grants. Then, Sir, there is another branch of our system of grants—that for class and extra subjects. We propose seriously to relax the position of our schools with regard to these class and extra subjects. We have a proposal, which I hope will be renewed, to no longer insist on the necessity of teaching English as a first class or extra subject. I have alluded already to the question of cookery. I think the widening and opening of the curriculum of extra subjects will be found of enormous importance. Take, for instance, the scattered schools in agricultural districts. Can we rest content with the knowledge that our agricultural schools in England and Wales are passing in elementary subjects and nothing else? I consider that a mistake, and a deplorable mistake. Again and again, by hon. Members on both sides of the House, I have been questioned as to instruction in agriculture in our schools. I know something of rural school life, and I am not going to suggest anything so absurd as the turning out of first-rate agriculturists from our elementary schools. But there is a vast difference between that and the absolute ignorance which we see in our agricultural districts of what is destructive to agriculture and what beneficial. A deal of good could be accomplished by giving some instruction in insect life, and illustrations might be hung in our rural schoolrooms of insect life with the utmost advantage to agriculture. What do we propose to do? That pupils may attend combined science classes—a plan which has been productive of great benefit in Hertfordshire and other counties where the central system of teaching has been carried out. I believe, not only in rural districts, but in towns the combination of schools for the achievement of a particular purpose is of great advantage. What one school is absolutely unable to do can be accomplished by a group of three or four schools with very little trouble and expense, and by means of a peripatetic teacher they could carry out a system of instruction such as I have indicated, with vast consequent improvement to our school life. I need hardly mention, Sir, that there is then the great question of drawing. Hon. Members are aware that we have placed drawing outside the 17s. 6d. limit, and a most useful change I believe it was. Hon. Members will be glad to hear that there is a vast improvement in respect of the numbers being taught. I believe I am right in saying that the number of children being taught drawing in our elementary schools has increased 25 per cent. That is most satisfactory. I am one of those who think that the pencil ought to run a harder race for supremacy with the pen in the teaching of our schools. I am of opinion that enormous benefit is to be derived from teaching children drawing in our schools. If hon. Members will look at the Code, they will find that managers were encouraged to submit to the Inspector a progressive scheme of lessons in class and specific subjects, and the curriculum would thereby have been widened to the greatest possible extent, and could have been readily adapted to the special circumstances of particular classes of schools. As regards the voluntary schools, I ought to say, before leaving this branch of the subject, that they will find a new field of exertion in these class and extra subjects, for which the Code offered fresh facilities. It will be asked, How is this to be done? It is true that a vast number of these schools do not at present see their way to afford instruction in extra subjects? But I would venture to plead that the new way of administering grants and conducting examinations will give to these schools time which they do not possess under the present system. It would give more time for teaching, and a better method of classifying the pupils. It would be a more elastic system—would cause less drudgery; it would be more liberal in its character; and I believe, if it is adopted, that the time hitherto wanting for teaching of these extra subjects will be available for their benefit.

MR. CONWAY (Leitrim): Do you do away with the 17s. 6d. limit?

*SIR W. HART DYKE: The hon. Member refers me to the 17s. 6d. limit. I am not going into that question, which is a matter for legislation; it is not a question which can be discussed on a Vote; but of this I am sure, that, if any movement is made in the direction of assisting the school by further grants from the State, no such proposal will be considered valid or adequate by this House which does not carry with it some security that the extra money paid will be actually expended for the benefit of education. That, I think, may fairly be urged and demanded. My hon. Friends may say, "It is of no use shadowing forth these changes, which may be of use to these schools, if we are met by the vexatious difficulty of the 17s. 6d. limit." I have taken six counties in different parts of England, which I believe to be typical counties—Buckingham, Herefordshire, Lincolnshire, Norfolk, Westmoreland, and Wiltshire. In these counties I find a total of 1,547 schools, out of which only 204 schools have exceeded the

17s. 6d. limit, 525 over 15s., 542 over 12s. 6d., 190 over 10s., and 26 under 10s. Only 17 per cent. of these schools are handicapped, if I may so term it, by the 17s. 6d. limit, while no less than 83 per cent are below that limit. Therefore, so far as 83 per cent of these schools are concerned, these proposed changes would be of considerable benefit; and, taking the proposals as a whole, I think there is not one of these schools—and I say it as School Manager in a country district—which will not be able to bring its total grant up to the 17s. 6d. limit. Again, I must say that I find it difficult to discover how proposals such as these are to immolate and destroy the great mass of the voluntary schools of this country. We have been told that they will destroy some 3,000 voluntary schools, and before this Debate closes I shall be anxious to know how they will destroy 300, or 30, or 3. Though I am afraid that I am detaining the House, still I think that the matters which I am discussing are of a very important character. I should like to say a word or two with regard to our teachers. Some of the largest and most considerable of our proposals affect our great teaching system. I must say I have marvelled at the inaction of the teaching community with regard to these proposals. They are, to my mind, so manifestly to the advantage of the teaching community that I have been puzzled from time to time that they have not been more cordially accepted as to principle and less criticised in minutiae of detail by the great mass of the teachers of this country. Now we have a proposal which I hope at all costs will be renewed, and it is that we relinquish the endorsement of teachers' certificates. We believe that it has been irritating, and that it has sometimes operated cruelly upon teachers who have been hard workers in their profession. The most important change, however, which we propose for the encouragement of teachers is in respect of freedom of classification. These changes were urged by the Report of the Royal Commission. I am aware that in certain quarters these changes have been criticised as not being real, but only changes on paper, and that if put to the test of practice would fail. I can only say that these proposals as regards freedom of classification are intended to be complete, and real, and conclusive. We propose that a teacher may put his scholars, as regards reading, writing, and arithmetic, in any standard he chooses. We have been told that no proposal of this kind will be satisfactory so long as the word "age" is left in certain Articles of the Code as one of the tests of the capacity of a child. I think myself broadly that it would be against experience of all kinds, and against common sense, if we were to strike out "age" altogether as a means of testing the capacity of a child. Take a case. The Inspector passes a child whose face shows the evident traces of overwork. Would not one of the first questions which a man of sense and responsibility would ask be as to the age of that child? To forbid such a question as that would, to my mind, be an absurdity. In judging of the capacity of a child it will be the duty of the Inspector to consider every possible circumstance, including that of age. I think the objection to the word "age" is a wrong one, for after all its retention would not work injuriously as regards our teaching system, but serve as a protection both to teachers and children. Then we are told that the liability of all scholars present to be examined is likely to work harshly, though I think it will be a most useful provision. It is said that a child may have been in the school only two or three weeks when it is seized upon and examined by the Inspector to the injury of the expected efficiency of the school. I think such a criticism as that does not do much credit to the common sense of the Inspector, who would surely not be fit to remain long at his post if he did not easily discover how long the child has been in the school. Sir, there are one or two other points on which I should like to touch—among them that relating to day training colleges. We shall not propose vast revolutionary changes as regards the training of our teachers, but we do consider that the recommendations of the Commissioners on this point are well worthy attention, and we think that the experiment should be made. I will say this, in regard to our proposal, that so far as the Universities are concerned, and in regard to all Institutions who are prepared to receive day teachers for training, we have received the greatest possible encouragement, especially from the Yorkshire College at Leeds, and the other University Colleges, the members of which have shown the greatest anxiety to be of service. The religious and moral training of our teachers is a subject of the greatest importance. I perfectly admit the importance of the religious and moral training of those who have to instruct our children. I will not go further into this point, except to say that we shall in every possible case have appointed a strong Local Committee in association with this new system when inaugurated. I deeply regret the postponement of this Code in regard to bilingual teaching in Welsh schools. The proposal to afford facilities for the teaching of Welsh and English side by side has met with unanimous support through the whole of the Principality. And in reference to this, I should like to remove a misapprehension which seems to prevail. It is thought that these proposals are made to promote the teaching of Welsh; but to my mind they are in a precisely opposite direction. We have made them entirely from an educational point of view, and because we found that unless some change was made in the Code, the Welsh people, in their efforts to learn English, would be heavily handicapped when it came to a question of examination. So far as my wishes and object are concerned, these changes have been made to promote the education of the Welsh children, and to enable them to get the best equipment when they start life. I am aware, Sir, that there have been several severe criticisms of our proposals with reference to evening schools. I at once admit that some amendment of them is necessary, and they shall be carefully considered by next Session. We think, further, that the additional subjects which we proposed should be taken in the evening schools were not sufficient. We feel that instead of two, four additional subjects should be allowed in evening schools in respect of such children as are not presented in any standard. I see by the Majority Report of the Commission it is suggested that we should do away with any distinction as to elementary subjects in evening schools or classes. But there is one difficulty so far as we are concerned, and that is that the elementary schools receive public grants under the Act of 1870, and that so far as the Education Department is concerned we must recognise the teaching of elementary subjects, and put that test to scholars before they can have the advantage of evening schools. We have been much criticised in respect of the curriculum of evening schools. We are told that we ought to have a very wide curriculum. We will treat it as widely as possible; and I conclude that the permission will apply to evening schools, where, under the footnote to Schedule IV., any subject with the approval of the Department can be taken as a specific subject. These proposals involve a curriculum as wide as any educational reformer could wish. It is proposed that a special curriculum should be drawn up with reference to all these extra specific or class subjects; but to my mind it would be far better to leave the curriculum as wide, and as open as possible, and to let it be made as useful as possible to the wants of the locality in which the school is situated. I am aware that I have only touched on two or three points of interest in our educational system. It is utterly impossible in remarks such as these to cover the whole ground. I need hardly say, Sir, that we have had but one object in view, and that is the improvement and furtherance of our great national scheme of education. We shall endeavour, if possible, to turn managers into a new groove, to improve the general character of our schools, to make our school life more elastic and more popular, and, with regard to extra class subjects, to do our very utmost to widen the curriculum. One or two notices have already been given for next Session, and they rather point to the fact that the educational barometer presents more stormy aspects, perhaps, than it has done for some years past; but, so far as I am concerned, I know of nothing at this moment, and I trust that nothing would happen in the near future, which would lead me to be unfaithful to the traditions upon which the great Act of 1870 was framed, and which were to make the School Board system supplementary to, and not destructive of, voluntary effort. Well, Sir, whatever may be in store for us in the near future, I do not disguise from myself the fact that there are questions of vast educational importance looming in that near future. Still, I trust that the House will approach those questions in a calm, broad, and judicial spirit, as becomes a Representative Assembly. I am certain of this—that we cannot afford to quarrel, or make political capital out of these great subjects. There is plenty of information to show that Continental nations are taking vast and daily strides in educational matters. They are sparing neither time, energy, nor money to bring about great results in education. Therefore, Sir, we cannot afford to waste time in quarrelling over those questions instead of coming to a practical result at as early a date as possible. I hope and trust that we shall approach them in a non-Party spirit; and I am quite sure of this—that whatever may be the result of our labours, whatever may be the result of our Debates on these important questions, we shall, at all events, ever be mindful that there is no issue so great, which an Assembly like this can debate and consider, as the education of the people, involving, as that education does, the fate and future of this great nation.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar): Sir, the statement which the right hon. Gentleman has placed before the Committee is not only interesting but highly satisfactory to every Member of this House and to the nation at large. As I understand, during past years not only has the attendance of children at school greatly improved, but practically we are very nearly up to our accommodation power. All we have to do now is to keep pace with the annual increase of children; at the same time, the moment has now fully come when we should endeavour to increase the efficiency of the schools by improving the education. We all concur, I think, in what the right hon. Gentleman said in reference to the withdrawal of the new Code. It was a very liberal Code, and a very considerable step forward in education, and embodied many very valuable suggestions. On this side of the House we certainly do feel that if the Code was not so thorough in some respects as many of us wished, yet we knew that it was high time, after the four years of stagnation which we have had since the Royal Commission, that a further step should be taken in order to carry out their recommendations. The right hon. Gentleman said that there was a pressure of business during this Session which had caused the collapse of that Code. Of course, that is only a way of putting it. We know, and the country knows, that it was not lack of time, but the pressure brought to bear by men behind the right hon. Gentleman upon the Government, which caused the withdrawal of the Code. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said the other day that the Party of which he is one of the most brilliant ornaments had among it no reactionaries. We know it is perfectly true that reactionary Conservatives have almost disappeared; but I regret to say that, in respect of elementary education, we have still Conservatives—and those the Representatives, chiefly and unfortunately, of the Church of England in this House—who have caused the withdrawal of this Progressive Code. I am led to say that its withdrawal, to a certain extent, was the fault of the Education Department. While the right hon. Gentleman was presenting to us the Code, he left us very much in the dark as to how these vast and Radical alterations were to be carried out. I think that hon. Gentlemen on both sides of the House thought the Department would have done well for their own sake and the sake of the Code if they had laid before the House the instructions to the Inspectors on which they wished the Code carried out. I regret the delay which will be caused to progressive elementary education by the withdrawal of the Code. The right hon. Gentleman expressed the hope that the Code would be re-introduced. I trust he will be successful in doing so. And if his speech is an indication of the lines on which the Code will go next year, I do not know that we on this side of the House need so very much regret the delay which has taken place. But I am afraid that the same malign influence which destroyed the Code this year will be encouraged by its success to act in like manner towards the re-introduced Code. Those who have opposed it have done a very ill service to the cause which they have at heart. I do not believe that any political action in regard to educational matters for very many years past has done so much to injure the voluntary system in public estimation. For many years past I have been one of those who can see a very great advantage in the dual system of Board and Voluntary Schools. But those who support the dual system as it at present exists do feel that, after all, the voluntary system only exists so long as it is really educational. When we find, as we have lately found, unfortunately, that voluntaryists look more particularly to the interests of their own denomination; and when we find the Archbishop of Canterbury reported to have said at some educational conference a while ago that this Code must be destroyed in the interests of the Church, then I confess it seems to me that to take up such a position is likely to do very much injury to the voluntary system. And not only so, but this opposition has been a very foolish opposition. The right hon. Gentleman, as Education Minister, clearly pointed out in his speech that the position of affairs under the new Code will not be disadvantageous, but rather advantageous to the voluntary system, because they will gain by the increased grants to the small schools. So that on the mere score of pounds, shillings and pence they will find they have made a great mistake. But if these educational reforms did entail a certain increased liability on voluntarism, they ought not to whine to this House over those proposals; they ought cheerfully to accept them, for it is a fatal position for voluntaryists to take up that denominational poverty is to stand in the way of educational progress. As far as I can see they have no case. After all, voluntary education does or ought to imply some sacrifice on the part of those who are interested in that system. [Cheers.] I am glad to find that hon. Gentlemen on this side of the House cheer that proposition. I think it is too much forgotten that sacrifices, instead of having been increased of late years, are very much diminished, and there is a large number of voluntary schools which are voluntary only in name, and which are carried on by means of fees and grants, and without any sacrifice at all on the part of the voluntary managers. Considering the very large sums that are paid to the voluntary system, and the very liberal way in which it has been treated, I do not see how they can expect the nation to vote additional sums unless they are prepared to make some corresponding sacrifices on their part. During the last 10 years the voluntary system has received something like £160,000 annually in children's fees, and they are educating a quarter of a million more in their own particular tenets. Not only are the Voluntaryists not called upon for further sacrifices, but the burden upon them is actually diminished by no less than £30,000 a year in less than 10 years. I think we may fairly ask those who are specially interested in these schools, to be ready to re-subscribe this small sum, if the nation, in its desire to have further educational progress, requests them to make some further sacrifice to the interests of their own special schools, and join with the Vice-President of the County Council in hoping that this subject will never be made an acute Party question, for in the educational future of this country it is essential that all Parties and sections should combine to improve it. I feel sure that nothing will more damage the cause of education than that a large section of the community interested in special schools should endeavour to prevent progress by pleading their poverty. I think it a pity that, even if the Code were going to be withdrawn, we had not an opportunity of discussing it in this House, because that discussion would have been the means of rendering some assistance to the Department and also to the House in appreciating the merits and demerits of the scheme. The chief point of the right hon. Gentleman's speech was that in which he referred to the substitute he proposed under the new Code for payment by results. I am one of those who think that the Code would have gone a long way to get rid of the many evils which existed under the old system. We should, by the proposals of the right hon. Gentleman, have got rid of the old multiple system; but, at the same time, I think that, under present circumstances, it would be impossible to get rid altogether of the system of making some recognition by grants of the merits of the schools. It is proposed by many of the teachers that there should be regular grants given to every school, and that it should not depend on the examiners or on the machinery of the schools, but that it should be by a combination of machinery and teaching and good buildings that good results should be awarded. But if we had not to make large payments to the beneficiary managers under the prevalent system, I doubt whether we should see large sums paid to Local Bodies to make them responsible for the management and inspection of the schools, and I also doubt whether such a system could be carried out. I am not sure that, under our system, where we cannot have a local buffer, such a system as that would answer, and I believe the proposal to abolish payment by results would be a satisfactory step forward, because it would get rid of that which was the real evil—the old system of the individual examination of every child, and the payment of a percentage on examination—a system shown by the evidence before the Commissioners to be overwhelmingly bad. The right hon. Gentleman emphasised the great opportunity given to teachers for the classification of the children and the choice of class subjects, and probably every hon. Member will welcome the great change which under these two heads it is proposed to make; but I do not agree with the right hon. Gentleman on one point—namely, that, although he proposes to give full freedom of classification, he is still going to retain classification by age. He desires that the word “age” should remain in the Code and be one of the items in classification. If we were starting a fresh system there might be no evil in such a principle; but the great complaint of the teachers and managers is that the Inspectors in the past have gone almost entirely on the age of the child, and if that word is still left in the Code the result would be that, the Inspectors having got into this rule, there would still be a great deal of difficulty in the classification. In regard to the choice of class subjects I agree with the right hon. Gentleman that under the new Code he has given practically freedom of choice; at any rate there is greater freedom than under the old system; but I am afraid that what is given with one hand is to be taken away with the other. It is proposed that schools shall not earn grants unless they take one of certain subjects, and the Department always seems to desire that as far as possible the obnoxious class subject of grammar shall be crammed down the children's throats, as they put that in the class subjects with repetition, making repetition compulsory. Under these circumstances freedom of choice in class subjects will not be so great as the right hon. Gentleman supposes. I regret that the right hon. Gentleman has not been able to carry his new Code, as I think it would in many respects be one of the greatest educational departures of modern years. It is too much to expect that in the next few years the right hon. Gentleman will deal with the question of fees. I am not now going to discuss the question of free schools, but I would ask whether he could not see his way to the fees in the voluntary schools being made lower and more uniform than they are. I cannot for the life of me see why the fees of the School Board schools should be absolutely under the control of the Department, while those of the voluntary schools are practically under the control of the managers and not of the Department. In a number of instances the fees in the voluntary schools are very irregular, and in some cases among the rural schools we find that they have been actually raised almost to prohibitive amounts in order to drive the children out of school, so that the farmers and others might utilise their labour more quickly. The right hon. Gentleman has stated that the children leave the schools at far too early an age, and I think that if he could only make a proposal to raise the age he would meet with almost universal approval. I would, however, suggest whether he could not combine such a proposal as that, which would throw a large burden on the parents, with some system under which fees might be greatly reduced and made more uniform, so that the parents would be to some extent relieved from the burden they have now to bear in the shape of loss of the children's wages and the cost of their school attendance. Thanking the Committee for its kindness in listening to these remarks, I cannot conclude without once more expressing my deep regret that the Code has been withdrawn, and my strong hope that the right hon. Gentleman will introduce it, or perhaps introduce even a better one, next year if he has the opportunity.

MR. R. TEMPLE (Worcester, Evesham): I cannot but heartily join with the hon. Member who has just spoken in congratulating the Minister for Education on the statement he has made to-night in a genial, sympathetic, and statesmanlike manner. I am sure that this House will heartily concur in what has fallen from the right hon. Gentleman as to the principal objects to be aimed at in regard to elementary education. I am certain that those objects are being obtained within the Metropolitan area, and that if hon. Members of this House could only see the educational work that is being done in London they would feel some pride in what is being achieved for the culture of the children, and look with hope and confidence to its good results to the country. I am sure that if the public could have seen the children of the Board Schools perform their march past in the Park of Lambeth Palace last year, and have witnessed the physical exercises the other day in the Albert Hall, they also would have felt pride in what is being done. We cannot, perhaps, get up an exhibition of drawings; but in music I believe we could fill the Crystal Palace with choirs of our children under our own teachers as conductors. We are going to have an exhibition of needlework in the East of London during the autumn, which I am sure will astonish all the spectators; and as regarded cookery, if hon. Members would visit the cookery centres between 1 and 2 o'clock, I am confident that their external senses would be gratified. I am sure that my right hon. Friend has exercised a wise discretion in postponing the introduction of the Code, at least till another Session, so that the public mind may be better matured by discussion during the Autumn on the subject. Nobody on my side of the House has doubted the excellence of the intentions of my right hon. Friend in regard to the voluntary schools. No one has ever accused my right hon. Friend of having done anything wilfully to immolate (as he calls it) or spoliolate voluntary schools. It is felt that many of the proposals that are of benefit to the voluntary schools apply mostly to schools in the interior of the country in those counties such as that the right hon. Gentleman represents, and such as I myself represent, but that these benefits are not extended equally to the great voluntary schools in the towns, which are suffering from the competition of the Board Schools.

These are the schools where the real pinch exists, and where the actual struggle must be waged. If there was to be real benefit to voluntary schools at large, how is it that no increased provision was made in the Budget on this account? Has the Chancellor of the Exchequer made any increase to his Budget on account of the Code? Not at all. He has not done so in the Budget for the year, and I fear he will not do so in the next Budget. What would happen would be this: new concessions would be made in one direction and new restrictions would be imposed in another—addition in one place, subtraction in another—so that both ends are made to meet. But, on the whole, there would be no net gain to the schools. The objections and difficulties of voluntary school managers in respect to the new Code I will, in a few moments, summarise. I must do this in justice to my constituents. In the first place they contend that their liabilities are increased, while their resources will not be increased. Liabilities will be augmented in various directions in respect to space in school-rooms, to establishment of teachers, and to apparatus, but there will be no increase wherewith to meet the increased liabilities in these three important departments of school management. On the other hand, they contend that their grants on the whole will not be increased. It may be so in some of the small schools in the interior of the country, but not in the great voluntary schools in the towns, and I think the danger is not for the country schools but for the town schools. In the country schools there is no competition whatever, while in town schools there is a grinding, crushing competition on the part of School Boards. It is difficult to argue in detail before this House as to whether such and such articles in the Code will benefit particular classes of schools, but those who are the managers and best judges as to whether they will gain or lose, declare for the most part that they will not gain. There is no complaint against my right hon. Friend for not moving in the matter of the 17s. 6d. limitation. Of course there is great grief over this limitation, but all our voluntary friends are well aware that the expansion of this will require legislation, and that if legislation is proposed a great deal of strong feeling will be evoked on the other side, and opposition to the alteration would be serious, and would have to be wrestled with. As regards payments by results our voluntary friends are, no doubt, thankful to see that the stringency of the system heretofore exercised will be relaxed, but what will be substituted will be an unlimited, irresponsible, inspectorial discretion—excuse the long words, but perhaps they are allowable in an educational discussion—everything will depend on the instructions given to the inspectors. It may be that under these instructions the new system will be more burdensome than the old; it may be that while payment by results is a chastisement with whips, payment on inspectorial reports may prove a chastisement with scorpions. That is the fear which prevails, and it might be advisable for my right hon. Friend to publish those instructions simultaneously with the Code. Further, in the execution of these instructions much will depend on the discretion of the assistant inspectors, and I would commend to my right hon. Friend that if the assistant inspector makes a report adverse to a school, an appeal should lie to the principal inspector. And, further, if it is contemplated to withdraw a grant from any school, that school so threatened should have due notice thereof, and the right to show cause to my right hon. Friend why the grant should not be lessened or withdrawn. There is great apprehension, and more than apprehension, much sorrow at the proposal to withdraw the grant for pupil teachers. The pupil teacher system is, in my judgment, essential to all schools, and particularly to voluntary schools, on both financial and administrative grounds. What our voluntary friends feel is this, that it was in order to find money for additional advantages and same time to strengthen the schools in the interior of the country, in rural districts, schools that are not exposed to competition, that the grant for pupil teachers was withdrawn, and the withdrawal creates great disappointment to the town schools which are exposed to School Board competition. One great recommendation of the pupil teacher system is its economy, but it further conduces to efficiency. The best teachers are those who have been brought up to the business of teaching from childhood. Selected scholars first serve as junior then as senior pupil teachers in special centres, then as ex-pupil teachers, and then after passing through the training colleges and won further their parchment certificate, and at last, having served as apprentices for eight or 10 years, become full-fledged assistant teachers. These are the very best men and women of their class who have imbibed the doctrines of pedagogy from their earliest years, and therefore we contend that a great blow to efficiency, as well as to economy, is being inflicted when the pupil teachers' grant is withdrawn. As to the training colleges, the voluntary school advocates have no objection to day colleges being instituted, but they fear that the day colleges, introduced in certain circumstances and conditions, would be enabled to compete unfairly and injuriously with the training colleges already existing, which are residential, and which have been founded for many years and have done wonderfully good work and brought up their alumni in a manner no day college can possibly equal. Therefore, there is an apprehension. No doubt my right hon. Friend may be able to make such regulations as shall secure an open field without favour, both to existing or residential training colleges, and the new day colleges to be set on foot. Another great disappointment is that the new Code made no provision for technical education. We contend, subject to the better knowledge of the Education Department, that nothing would have been easier than to obviate, by executive orders without legislation, all trouble about elementary schools, which trouble will now survive this Session, be carried over to next Session, and perhaps will never be solved. We say it would have been perfectly easy to make such regulations for technical instruction within the four corners of the Education Act. Further, we say the Code might have gone further in popularising evening classes. We are constantly liable to the eloquent and fervid appeals of the hon. Member for Flintshire (Mr. S. Smith), because we, for years, have been trying to extract from the Education Department under this and preceding Governments certain reasonable facilities in order to make evening classes popular. We did hope that this matter would have been settled by the new Code. I admit that the Code has done something, but much more might have been done. My right hon. Friend men ioned that the teachers as a body do not seem to be strongly in favour of the new Code, and is not that a signal proof that the Code requires further consideration? But I am not aware that there is disapproval of the Code on their part. While teachers think that there are many good points about the new Code, they at the same time complain that there is no provision, or a matter as to which teachers in England, whether in Board or voluntary schools, consider themselves much aggrieved. There is no provision whatever, either by Parliamentary or any other agency, in the nature of superannuation arrangements for them when they are unable any longer to carry out the exhausting labour in the classrooms, and this too by deductions from salaries without any burdens to the rates. This is a matter of great importance, because it not only affects the teachers personally, but the efficiency of the schools as well. In the absence of any such arrangement, teachers have to be kept on year after year, teachers of excellent character against whom no specific complaint can be alleged, but on whom increasing years are telling so that they are no longer equal to the discharge of their arduous duties. Now, Sir, I feel bound to take this opportunity of stating so much to the House, on behalf of my voluntary friends, not only on account of my experience in the Metropolitan area, where we School Board people are brought face to face with the greatest voluntary schools in the country, who are carrying on the most arduous of all the struggles now being waged anywhere, but also in justice to my own constituents and to a large class of clergy and school managers and of other persons interested in education who form the chief pillars of support of the voluntary school system. I say that the voluntary school system in this country is a system which deserves the support of Parliament and the nation. In the first place, it is a magnificent display of patriotic effort, the like of which is not to be seen in any other country under heaven. My right hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield is fond of telling the English people how much they have to learn from other nations in the matter of education. It is true we have much to learn from other nations, but I venture to think they have still more to learn from us, and I was sure they can claim nothing at all comparable to the system instituted by voluntary agencies in this country. The system has this advantage, that it saves a vast amount of money to the Public Exchequer and to local taxation. My hon. Friend who has just spoken talked as if the voluntary system was indebted to the nation, and as if it was rather kind of the nation to concede assistance. In my opinion, on the contrary, the nation is indebted to the voluntary system, eminently so. It is to the nation that millions of money are saved not only in taxation, but in a degree of private effort that no State effort could equal. No one can deny the assistance we receive from the local managers of Board Schools, but this, good as it is, does not equal the vigilance and loving care of benevolent friends towards voluntary schools. Such schools set an excellent example by the spirit they display. My hon. Friend who has just sat down says that these schools are no longer supported by subscriptions.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: I said some of them.

*SIR R. TEMPLE: My hon. Friend says some of them are not supported by subscriptions, but that—and that is a remarkable admission from an opponent of the voluntary schools—they manage to carry on the work by fees alone and grants. That is too good to be true, but if they do they have thereby set up the strongest possible ground for the support of the House and the country. Look at the Board Schools. Do they manage to carry on mainly by the fees? The fees in London amount to only one eighth of the total amount expended on elementary education. And yet are the voluntary schools inferior? I am not sure that their average earnings of Government grants do not compare favourably with ours. One remark further in reference to what fell from my right hon. Friend as to the expenditure of the London School Board as compared with other School Boards and voluntary schools generally. I am afraid that the censure of my right hon. Friend, if censure I may call it, mild censure by implication, is, in regard to the London School Board in my humble estimation, too well deserved. The London School Board has always spent too much and is still doing so, spending more than ever. Nobody in this House has stood up in his place more often to defend the conduct of the London School Board than I have, but its finances I cannot altogether defend. For several years from 1884 up to the present time, I have struggled not without success to keep expenditure down, and I shall not cease to struggle; but what I want to point out is that this question does not concern the House of Commons and does not relate to these votes. Whatever offences we commit in the way of financial extravagance does not in any way affect the sum we have to ask the House to vote. That is a question not between the London School Board and the House of Commons, or even between the Board and the Education Department, but between the Board and the ratepayers. If the ratepayers choose to elect a School Board who spend their money right and left they alone are answerable, it is their pockets that will suffer. I thank the House for allowing me to make this statement, and I will resume my seat with this observation—that my right hon. Friend and the Government have shown their wonted sound judgment in allowing a little time to elapse before the Code is re-introduced. We are not afraid of any adverse verdict as affecting the voluntary schools, we are quite confident that the more their work is examined the more splendid it will be found, like fine gold tried in the fire of criticism. At all events it will give my right hon. Friend and the Education Department the opportunity which has not been adequately afforded as yet of really taking the Voluntary School Managers into their confidence. I cannot help thinking that a good deal of trouble would have been avoided if the Education Department had been less reserved. I would entreat my right hon. Friend to consider this matter in consultation with the recognised Authorities of that great voluntary system of which the nation is so justly proud. I am sure they will give him every possible assistance, and he will find that no section in this country is more anxious to promote that physical, mental, and moral culture that should render the rising generation of Englishmen a wise and understanding people.

*SIR J. LUBBOCK (London University): The hon. Baronet the Vice President, in the closing sentences of his speech, justly insisted on the importance of education for the future happiness and prosperity of the country, and it is very much to be regretted that so little time is devoted to the subject. We hear of a Scotch Session, an Irish Session, and sometimes an English Session; I wish for once we could have an Education Session. What is the position in which we find ourselves? Two very important Royal Commissions have recently investigated the subject—namely, the Technical Instruction Commission, and the Education Commission. They each recommended important changes, and it is most remarkable that in very many points, I might almost say on all educational points in each case, the Commissioners were unanimous. The Technical Education Bill has been promised over and over again, and as often our hopes have been disappointed. I do not blame the Vice President of the Council, it is not his fault, but it is an additional evidence of the need there is that we should have a Minister of Education with a seat in the Cabinet, and then educational questions would receive the attention their importance justly demands. Then again the Education Commission, though divided no doubt on many important points, as was inevitable considering the diversity of views represented, was unanimous or almost unanimous on purely educational questions. Some of their recommendations, though by no means all, were embodied in the New Code. For my part I thank the Vice President for the care he has devoted to the subject, and for the improvements he has introduced, and I regret that the Code has been withdrawn. The objections to it were not educational objections. I think that the hon. Gentleman opposite and the supporters of voluntary schools, who object to the New Code, entertain exaggerated ideas as to the cost which would be involved in the new requirements, and that they underrate the average amount which will be earned under the New Code. It may reasonably be expected that the increased efficiency will secure a larger grant. Of course we must remember that it is in the essence of the existence of voluntary schools that there should be a substantial sum raised by subscriptions. It is a serious misfortune that the Code is to be postponed. Is it not possible, even now that the educational changes, as to which there is no question, should be accepted? They are imperatively required. For instance, the present Code presses unduly on night schools. There is no compulsion in the case of night schools, and the consequence, of course, is that unless they are made interesting and attractive to boys and girls, they will not be attended, and, as a matter of fact, they are lamentably few and far between. Again, the Commissioners were unanimous as to the subjects of instruction which they regarded as essential. They said:—

“The following are the subjects of elementary instruction which we regard as essential, subject to the various qualifications which we have already made: Reading, writing, arithmetic; needlework for girls; linear drawing for boys; singing; English, so as to give the children an adequate knowledge of their mother tongue; English history, taught by means of reading books; geography, especially of the British Empire; lessons on common objects in the lower standards, leading up to a knowledge of elementary science in the higher standards.”

That is to say they regarded the four class subjects as they are technically termed—namely, geography, history, English, and elementary science as essential. But the Code only allows two class subjects to be taken, of which English must be one and geography is generally the other. I am aware that there is, for those who know it, a postern door of escape, and they may take class subject as a special subject. But that is a roundabout process and is scarcely ever made use of. Now, what is the result? Out of, say, 20,000 schools only 383 presented any children in history, and only 39 in elementary science. When I mentioned the corresponding figures last year I was told that I must have made a mistake, and I will, therefore, quote the very words of the Report—

“The wider range of class subjects allowed by the Code under the head of ‘elementary science’ does not appear to be taken advantage of to any great extent at present. The returns show but 39 schools which have taken subjects under this head, while geography has been taken in 12,035 schools, needlework, by the girls, in 7,137, history in 383, and drawing in 505."

Of course I know that there are schools in which these subjects are taught, though the children are not presented for examination. That, however, strengthens my case, because it shows that as at present constituted the Code discourages the very thing we wish to secure. Schoolmasters naturally consider that the Department wishes children only to take up two class subjects, and they limit themselves accordingly. The London School Board, as the right hon. Baronet the Member for Evesham has often reminded us, has set an excellent example in this respect; they not only teach all four subjects, but went further and took up some of the specific subjects also. They found the results excellent. So far from interfering with the elementary subjects, the variety introduced, the greater interest excited, benefited the reading, writing, and arithmetic. Mr. Rankine reports that—

"In specific subjects this district is pre-eminent. No other district in England approaches it. Over 6,000 scholars were examined last year in specific subjects. The favourite subjects are physiology, domestic economy, and algebra. The children examined passed well in all subjects. The higher the instruction is carried in any school I find the lower work improved in proportion, and better results in reading, writing, and arithmetic are obtained with less pressure. This is, no doubt, owing to cultivation of general intelligence."

The result of the wider education given in German schools is the same. Surely, then, the time has come when every school should be examined in all the four class subjects. I do not mean that in every school they can all as yet be insisted on, but that this is what we should aim at. In the old, I regret that I must now say the present Code, if any class subjects are taken one must be English. The Education Commissioners unanimously recommended that this rule should be withdrawn and the school authorities should be allowed to choose their own class subjects. This the Department has done in the new Code, but then I am sorry to see that in another part of it they introduced a provision that "No school shall receive more than 12s., unless the Inspector reports that the scholars throughout the school are satisfactorily taught repetition as set forth in Schedule II." But repetition is part of the English. This is really therefore taking back with one hand what they have given with the other. I hope my right hon. Friend will see his way to omit this when he reintroduces the Code next year. But could he not even now in accordance with the unanimous recommendations of the Commission remove the provision which makes English compulsory. There is only one other subject on which I should wish to say a word before I sit down. Our elementary school system in the case of boys is altogether a training for the brain, I might almost say of the memory; there is nothing which tends to give a command of the hand and eye. In the case of girls, of course there is needlework, but we have nothing of the same sort for boys. The experience of the Sloyd system in Sweden, and of other foreign schools, I might add, I think, of our London School Board, shows that there is really no difficulty in the matter, though, of course, it can only be introduced by degrees; and I hope that when my right hon. Friend is reconsidering his Code he will introduce provisions, not of course as yet requiring, but encouraging the introduction of manual training into our elementary schools—not intended as a preparation for any particular handicraft—but to give control over the hand and eye. I believe, and I speak from some little experience in this matter, that such lessons would be very popular with the boys, and that would in itself be a great recommendation. I am convinced also that it would have a good effect on the purely literary studies. We often hear of the importance of teaching children to read with expression, but what is much more important, is that they should read with ease. This can only be acquired with practice; and people only read much, if they have been taught to enjoy it. The cardinal mistake that we have made has, I venture to think, been that our object has been to teach as much as possible, instead of endeavouring to make the process pleasant so that the children might wish to learn, and might teach themselves. What children learn for themselves is far more valuable than what they are taught. The changes to which I have called attention, which were unanimously recommended by the Commission, and which would not, I believe, be seriously contested in this House, would leave more freedom to school managers, would encourage and promote continuation schools, and would render our system more practical and more interesting to the children. The weakness of our present system is the absence of interest, and consequently of the wish for continuation schools, so that too often the children forget what they have so laboriously learnt. If, on the other hand, we can but enable them to realise the delightful and inexhaustible fund of interest and enjoyment to be derived from books, and still more from Nature herself, then indeed we shall need no compulsion, our schools and our libraries will be full, and the prisons and public-houses comparatively empty.

*MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON (Shropshire, Oswestry): We all agree with the hon. Baronet in wishing that more attention should be paid to education in the House, but I think the state of the House during this Debate will hardly encourage the Government to give us many more Bank Holidays for the discussion. Now, when I listened to the speech of my hon. Friend the Vice President, I thought that the Chief of the Education Department ought to be the most popular man in the country, for he described himself as the most generous of givers of public money, and that the Department must be the model Department in the Government, for he described it in glowing terms of praise. I hope I will not throw any discord into this discussion, if to a certain extent I criticise both the speech of the Vice President of the Council and the conduct of the Department. I have just presented a Petition, signed by 20,000 persons, who complain of the way in which the education of this great country is managed. The Petition is from managers, and parents who send their children to school, both voluntary schools and Board schools, and what do the petitioners ask for? For the relief and encouragement of voluntary schools. They think that the voluntary system is unfairly treated at the present time by the Department. They think that the policy of the Department is and has been for many years a standstill policy, and that there is a great deal of inefficiency in the way in which the business of the Department is carried on. If the complaints of the petitioners are well-founded no Government, whether it be Liberal or Conservative, can afford to overlook or to neglect them. Who make the complaints? Not reactionaries, not men who have hindered the cause of education, but men who have stood in the forefront of the educational movement for the last 50 years, men who show their interest in the education of the poor by annual subscriptions to the amount of three-fourths of a million sterling, by invested capital in schools and school plant of the value of £30,000,000; men who, without any assistance from the rates, are now managing the schools which contain more than half of the school children of England. What will be the cost to the country of extinguishing these schools? It will be many millions sterling a year, and £30,000,000 down. Who do these schools belong to? They belong to all religious denominations, to the Church of England, Methodists, Independents, Baptists, Wesleyans, Roman Catholics, and to Jews; their watchword is "freedom of religious education." The English people are essentially a religious people; I do not think any one will be found to deny that, notwithstanding the activity of the Secularist party in the House of Commons. The managers of voluntary schools believe that there is if not an intention, at all events a tendency in the action of the Education Department to violate the concordat with Mr. Forster. Everyone will allow that moral training is at the root of sound training, and that the foundation of moral training is religion. When men begin by eliminating religion they often end by obliterating morality. In the new Code there are no instructions whatever to the Inspectors to report on moral training; yet the Royal Commission declare that it should be the first duty of the Inspectors to report on moral training, and to impress on teachers, managers, and children the primary importance of that essential element of all education. The members of the Royal Commission may well say, "Who has read our Report?" They are like men crying in the wilderness; the Department seems to have paid no attention to their recommendations. "Accuracy of knowledge" is one of the points upon which the Commission suggest that the Inspectors should report upon. Will it be believed that during the 20 years the Department have never succeeded in giving an authoritative definition of "elementary education?" The idea of elementary education changes with the Code, and there is no limit to the number of Codes. There must be some mental confusion at the Education Department or they would not have gone on without defining the education which is to be paid for out of the rates and taxes. This mental confusion seems to prevail throughout, for no classification of schools has been arrived at. Neither in the time of the right hon. Gentleman nor of his predecessor (Mr. Mundella), and between them they had held office for 10 years, no attempt has been made to distinguish between schools under different conditions, and to treat them according to their circumstances. What has been done for the poor urban voluntary school—that school which is of such great advantage socially and religiously? Simply nothing. Then we come to the small rural schools, of which there are 4,000, whose attendance is less than 60. What has been done for them? Nothing, or hardly anything during the time of my right hon. Friend opposite, or my right hon. Friend the present Vice President. All that has been proposed is that they should be compelled to provide a much larger staff and should have the inadequate compensation of £10, which would in no way cover the increased expense. Every one who knows anything of schools in country places will admit that if the cause of education is to be advanced, these schools should be assisted by a special grant towards the staff. Again, voluntary schools are unfairly treated by their enforced association with pauperism. In the case of Board Schools parents unable to pay school fees get them remitted without difficulty, but in the case of voluntary schools a parent has to go to the Board of Guardians and submit to all the unpleasantnesses of pauperism before his fees are remitted. The right hon. Gentleman has now been three years in office, but no change has yet been made as regards the hardship to which voluntary schools are subject in having to pay rates while night and Sunday schools are exempt. Now, I wish to make it quite clear that the complaint which I now make is rather against the policy of the Department than against the right hon. Gentleman personally. The policy inaugurated by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Brightside Division of Sheffield still governs the Department in every respect. We remember the struggle we had with him on the matter of overpressure. Although personally a man of kindly good nature, yet we found the right hon. Gentleman was killing two or three children every month. It was only by bringing forward case after case and making the public fully aware of what was going on that we were able to get any relief. We all remember the famous Report of Sir Creighton Browne on overpressure, which the late Vice President tried to suppress. We have to a certain extent corrected the evils of overpressure, but still the salaries of the masters are dependent upon grants, and that is the fruitful source of the danger. We hope the hon. Gentleman will make the salaries of the masters not so much dependent on the grants as they are at present. The chaos in which the right hon. Gentleman opposite left the Department compelled the Government to appoint a Royal Commission on Education, and though that Commission has reported, that Report unfortunately has not yet been acted upon. I would appeal to my right hon. Friend to effect reforms in the conduct of his own Department. There is a want of confidence in that Department, and that is shown by the rejection and withdrawal of the Code—a want of confidence that I can assure him is very widespread. The Inspectors require to be inspected. There is great difficulty in getting rid of a bad Inspector, who may cause terror to a whole district. The other day I brought to the notice of my right hon. Friend what appeared to be a case of untrustworthiness in an Inspector, and told him he would find that other complaints against this Inspector had been made. My right hon. Friend said he could find nothing to confirm the statement that the removal of the gentleman from one district to another was due to any misconduct, that anything was known of his antecedents at the place I mentioned. But the fact was that the gentleman was cast in damages and costs in the County Court for striking a boy with a book in the course of an examination. I am not blaming my right hon. Friend, but I mention this incident to indicate that the Department is not as well managed and as well manned as it ought to be. And now I wish to point out how the creation of new precedents which has been going on from time to time by the Department has led to the invariable injury of voluntary schools. Those who know the rules and methods by which the Education Act is worked know that School Boards have the right of appealing to the Department to obtain compulsory powers to purchase sites for schools, and it is right that they should have this power. But the School Boards have not the right to compulsorily acquire the sites of voluntary schools, for these are guarded by the 23rd section of the Education Act, and this has been recognised by the Department until last year when they attempted a new departure, and to apply the compulsory powers of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act to force a voluntary school to sell its site to a School Board. Now, a new practice such as this is contrary to the concordat of Mr. W. E. Forster, and would, if allowed, lead to the effacement of voluntary schools. The case I refer to is known as the Middleton St. George case. Next I wish to call attention to a matter about which I asked a question this evening, and received a rather unsatisfactory answer. The method laid down in the Code as the basis for measuring the accommodation in voluntary schools is eight square feet per child. This has invariably been adopted. Article 96 and Note of the Code directs that "eight square feet of internal area for each unit of average attendance" shall be the basis adopted, and the principle hitherto acted upon by the Department is that voluntary schools shall not be touched by the 10 square feet basis, and that in case of schools which have been passed by the Department for a certain number of children the arrangement shall not be disturbed. But the other day at Luton, in order to give a defence for the enlargement of the Board School, a voluntary school was, for the first time, measured on the basis of 10 square feet instead of eight, and the Vice-President said that voluntary schools would be measured on that basis.

*SIR W. HART DYKE: I am sorry to interrupt my hon. Friend, but I am afraid I did not make myself understood in the latter part of my reply. I did state that there were other cases.

*MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON: I would ask my right hon. Friend to give me other instances. I am informed that there is no case precisely parallel to this Luton case. I believe this is the first case during the 19 years the Education Act has been in force in which 10 square feet measurement has been adopted in calculating the accommodation of a voluntary school. What I want to point out is the somewhat unfair spirit in which the Education Act is worked by the Department against the voluntary schools, and I appeal to my right hon. Friend to remove the unfairness. We who are interested in voluntary schools cannot but be dissatisfied with the partiality which reigns in the Department. The voice of the Education Department is the voice of my right hon. Friend, but the hand is the hand of his predecessor, and the head that conceives these new principles seems to be that of the ingenious chief of the Department.

MR. MOLLOY (King's County, Birr): Like the hon. Gentleman who has just spoken, I have always been a strong supporter of the voluntary system, and I wish the right hon. Gentleman had devoted some of his time to dealing with what, after all, is the real question before us, rather than have gone into the mass of details he did. The right hon. Gentleman asked for some explanation of the causes of the opposition to the New Code now put off to next year, and some hon. Members on the other side have given explanations. Whether they are the whole or only part of their explanations I do not know, but I will tell him very distinctly why I put down notice of opposition. It was this. I felt that the Code raised questions as between voluntary and Board Schools, which under the conditions and at the time of the Session could not be debated with any good result. Further, I looked upon the Code as merely a compromise. When the Royal Commission issued their Report, if the Government with their big majority between them had had the courage to carry the recommendations of the Commission into legislation they could have done a very great deal of good, and all parties might have been satisfied. But the Government allowed three years to pass, and then introduced the Code as a compromise only dealing with details of the proposed changes. The result appears to me to be that all hope of this Report of the Royal Commission being carried out has long passed. I do not myself see how the hopes expressed in that Report, and by those of us who sat on the Commission will ever be carried out by the present Government. I myself wish sincerely the Government had acted at once upon the report of the Royal Commission and carried out their own intentions, which were, to all intents and purposes, the intentions of the Royal Commission, for they had their majority on the Commission. I regret exceedingly they did not do so and effect a settlement of the question which was possible then but which, I believe, is utterly impossible now. We have gone a very long way beyond that Report. The very fact that the Report has been considered and discussed throughout the length and breadth of the country, and discussed by all educationalists, has made it impossible that the scheme which really underlies the Report can be carried out. The right hon. Gentleman was afraid of outside opinion and of a section of his own followers perhaps, but from whatever course it may be, the golden opportunity has been missed, and we must now seek for a settlement of the question upon a basis entirely different from that which we had formerly hoped for. I think there is nothing more dangerous to the cause of education than that it should become a Party and political question, but a Party and political question it is fast becoming, and is now far more than it was three years ago. Free education is now a plank in a political platform, and we have seen the principle carried out in Scotch legislation. I have come to the conclusion that supporters of both voluntary and School Board systems must be prepared to accept free education, compulsory education, education up to a standard and inspection. We shall have to accept nearly all that is accepted in Board Schools. I will go further and say this, that I think the result in the very near future will be that the whole system of education in the country will have to be under a system of Board Schools. Of course it will be impossible for voluntary schools to pass under Board School management under existing conditions; there must be a compromise on both sides, there must be a "give and take," and I am satisfied that a fair and honest compromise between the voluntary and the School Board systems can be effected. I, for one, do not fear it. The difficulty, of course—the main difficulty, and I speak more especially for those of my own creed, is that in accepting what the Board Schools demand we could not accept any system that would introduce into our schools a system of proselytism. We must find a system of compromise with the School Board system that will enable us to live together and carry on our educational system without injury or annoyance to either side. I certainly would have preferred the carrying out of the original system, but that is impossible; we have been driven into the position in which we find ourselves. I suppose there would have been considerable difference of opinion among those who support the voluntary system, and I think that difference of opinion will be to their injury; but they must blame themselves for the position in which they find themselves. I think a good deal of it has arisen from the fact that in some of the voluntary schools the political element has been introduced, more especially in some of the country schools. That accusation has been made against them, and whether it is true or not, we find ourselves in the present difficulty. The right hon. Gentleman has asked us to give him our views upon it, and I give him my view most willingly, for I know the interest he takes in the subject. These are the views I hold, and I believe that a compromise may be effected, that we may take this question once for all, out of the political arena and devote ourselves to the interests of education apart from every other consideration.

MR. HANDEL COSSHAM (Bristol E.): It is impossible to overrate the importance of the speech to which we have just listened. It indicates a policy with which I have the greatest sympathy, and frankly expresses views I have long entertained on the education question. I hope the importance of the subject may not be measured by the attendance of Members; for, indeed, I think it is impossible for the House of Commons to be engaged in a more important discussion, one that has a more important bearing on the future of this country. It is one of the most important considerations that meet us in relation to this great problem, that there are still a million of children not reached by our educational machinery, and we have to find a means of reaching these children; for it is from these largely that our criminal classes and our drunkards and many evils of society spring. I have listened with intense interest to the discussion, and I cannot help thinking that those who look at this subject from a voluntary point of view shut their eyes to facts that nevertheless they will have to encounter. It is not for the advantage of the country that three-quarters of a million in grants of public money should be placed in the hands of those who promote education merely as a means to sectarian influence. It is against the extension of this sectarian influence we protest and have to fight. We have had strong illustrations of this. The Technical Instruction Bill would have passed but for the opposition of voluntary schools, chiefly due to clerical influence. I am one of those who think that we shall never reach our educational requirements until we have compulsion in a much stronger form; but the country will never allow compulsion to be exercised by a self-elected body such as the managers of voluntary schools are. We are rapidly tending towards free education, and I only wish that in our own Local Government Bill we had been as wise as our northern friends in devoting the relief of local taxation to that purpose. I congratulate our Scotch friends on their success in this direction, and I am sure that the advantages of the principle cannot long be controlled by a geographical boundary. While I listened to the statement of the Vice President, I could not help noticing the fact that while expenditure for educational purposes is growing, subscriptions for the voluntary system are declining, and this, I think, clearly indicates that those who talk so much about the voluntary system do not make much impression in respect to it. But I do not wish to introduce more discord, though I cannot but express my belief that the clerical desire to keep control over education has checked the progress of education in this country. Long ago we should have had a really national system if we had had less of the clerical fingers upon the educational springs of the country. I listened with delight to the speech just delivered. It came from one who represents a section of Christians not supposed to have the most broad and liberal views, and, coming from the hon. Gentleman, it is a fingerpost that indicates the road that the Education Department would do well to follow; and I am sure we shall all have cause to rejoice at the advantages it will bring to the nation.

MR. CALDWELL (Glasgow, St. Rollox): I find that whilst there are 16·4 per cent of the population on the school registers in England, there are 15·9 per cent of the population on the school registers in Scotland—taking the year 1887—and the average attendance per population in England is 12·9 per cent of the population, as against 12·4 per cent in Scotland. Then again, in regard to the annual inspection, we find that a larger number of children are present at the annual inspection in England as compared with Scotland, and the results are, therefore, very creditable to England, the population of which is undoubtedly in advance of Scotland, both as regards the number of children on the school registers, the number in average attendance, and the number presented for inspection. Of course the attendances in the higher standards are larger in Scotland than in England, but then in England the compulsory standard is the Fourth Standard, while in Scotland the compulsory standard is the fifth. Again, in Scotland no child is allowed to work in a factory until it attains the age of 13 years, and that restriction does not apply in England. Again, in Scotland no child is allowed to pass from school until it has either passed the Fifth Standard or is fourteen years of age. It is quite evident, therefore, that you have superior educational results in Scotland as compared with England. In England you have, to begin with, a higher number of children on the school register, and what you want now is to bring up your educational standard. That is only to be accomplished by England following the lead of Scotland in making the fifth the compulsory standard, in preventing children under 13 working in factories, and in making the compulsory school age 14 years. There is less difficulty in raising the standard in England, because there a child goes earlier to school than in Scotland. In Scotland 3 per cent of the children go to school under seven years of age; in England 5 per cent are under seven. Now, I say there is no practical difficulty in making the compulsory standard in England the same as in Scotland, and I venture to think if this were done we should in a year or two have educational results in England far surpassing those obtained in Scotland. Another fact to be borne in mind is that in Scotland the Board Schools combine elementary with secondary education. I will cite the case of the City of Glasgow in order to show the extraordinary result of this system. According to the Report of the Education Department it is expected that one in every seven of the children at school will be found in private schools. Therefore, of the 84,000 school children in Glasgow, 12,000 ought to be found in private schools. But the result of the educational system prevailing in Scotland is that there are only 4,000 children in Glasgow in schools where the fees are above 9d. a week, and 2,500 of these are in public schools, so that there are only 1,500 children whose parents may be said to pay for education without assistance, and even that 1,500 includes children brought into Glasgow from the country in order to get the benefit of the better education to be obtained there. In fact, the class of children who attend secondary schools in England are in Scotland to be found in the Board Schools. You have an enormous proportion of the better class children who go up to Standard VI., and who, by taking specific subjects, are capable of earning the higher grant. In conclusion, I would again urge that by raising the compulsory standard and the school age in England you would secure educational results superior not only to those obtained in Scotland, but superior also to the results obtained in any country.

Mr. Caldwell

SIR HENRY ROSCOE (Manchester, S.): The small attendance this evening is not very encouraging, but we ought to remember that this is the 5th of August, and to-day there are attractions which draw Members away from this House. I think if we could induce the Government to bring on the Education Estimate at an earlier date next Session, we might have a larger attendance of Members for a discussion of so important a character. I join my hon. Friend the Member for London University in regretting that the Government were forced to withdraw the New Code, for it seemed to me it was a real step in advance. We have already given Scotland educational measures of the highest importance. Wales has been given a Bill providing for intermediate education, which, I trust, will prove an enormous improvement; and now I ask how long are we in England to wait? Are we so advanced in our education that we can afford to let other countries get ahead of us? It is a matter of the deepest regret to all friends of education that in consequence of outside pressure this Code, which promised so much, had to be withdrawn by the Government. I speak feelingly on the subject, for the same influences, I fear, also acted detrimentally to the Technical Education Bill, which I had the honour to introduce to this House. It is much to be regretted that this has been so, for those who have had the opportunity and advantage of seeing what is done in Continental countries in this respect will, I think, agree that we in England are behindhand, and that it is imperative we should put our shoulders to the wheel and improve our educational system if we are to succeed in the competition with other nations. Even at this late period of the Session something might be done in the direction suggested by the hon. Baronet the Member for London University, and surely it is possible to take into consideration some of these matters which are non-contentious. The questions of drawing and manual exercise are matters of the gravest importance to our national system of education, and seeing to what a large extent they are introduced in continental countries, I think we may assume they are equally necessary in this country for the proper education of our children. I wish in the most earnest manner to impress upon the Vice President the great importance of now dealing with these matters. Our present system of elementary education requires to be made more practical and to partake less of the character of book work. I trust that this subject will more and more engage the attention of the country, and I repeat that I think it most unfortunate that this matter should have been postponed to the fag end of the Session when our forces are somewhat exhausted. I hope the educational debate will take place earlier next Session.

Mr. W. F. LAWRENCE (Liverpool, Abercromby): I have the honour of representing a city which stands well forward in the matter of education, and I have the best authority for saying that there they do not in the least regret the withdrawal of the Code. On the contrary they quite approve it, because they hold that a Code which proposes to introduce such radical changes requires at least six months' reflection before it can be adopted by the House. It is not a light matter to introduce a change which would be so widespread in its effects. In Liverpool, the School Board and the voluntary systems have worked harmoniously together, and I should regret to see the voluntary system cease to be one of the leading factors in our educational system. I hold in my hands a memorandum from the Liverpool Elementary School Managers Conference, which practically embraces all the managers of the City of Liverpool, in which they say they believe it is most desirable that the limit to which so much reference has been made should be removed, and in which also they recommend that the suggestions of the Royal Commission as to the rates levied on schools should also be acted upon. The hon. Member who last spoke seems to feel great regret that his Bill has not been allowed to pass this Session; but if he will examine it more closely, I think he will allow that it is distinctly one-sided, and while it may do a great deal for the advantage of education, it will also do a great deal of harm to the voluntary system, which most of us are determined shall go hand in hand with the School Board system. It is therefore rather hard that the hon. Member should thus criticise our action, seeing that while we are anxious to promote the cause of education we are also anxious that justice shall be done to a system which has hitherto worked with so much success. At this time of the night it is unnecessary for me to enter into the various questions raised by this Code. I had intended in a few days to bring under the notice of my right hon. Friend the important question of cookery. I believe the Liverpool people are much interested in this branch of female education, and I desire to ask the Vice President if he is willing to extend to England the advantages which the Scotch enjoy in this matter? In English night-schools, before a pupil can earn a grant, it must put in an attendance of 40 hours, but in Scotland a child attending the class 24 hours earns a grant of 4s. I think it is practically impossible for a hard working girl—who spends the day in manual labour—to give as much as 40 hours attendance, and a modification such as I have suggested would, I am sure, be much appreciated and work well.

*Mr. MATHER (Lancashire, Gorton): I am glad to hear that the hon. Member's ardour in educational matters is not confined to a desire to promote voluntary education. I am sure on this side of the House we have no desire to say a word against voluntary schools. So far as they exist for the purpose of promoting education in its truest and best sense, we desire they should have the benefit to be derived under the New Code, but in order that they should be reckoned amongst the great educational institutions of the country, their efficiency must be equal to that of the Board Schools, and they must be judged by the measure in which they contribute to the education of the people generally. I think this Debate has taken place at an unfortunate moment, and I hold that the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council on Education deserves our sympathy. We have had testimony of the earnestness which he brings to bear on these questions, and I think some efforts might have been made to render this Debate more worthy of the subject we are discussing by selecting a day when hon. Members could have attended in greater number. The hon. Member for Liverpool has alluded to the action of the hon. Member for Manchester City, in regard to his Technical Education Bill, and has rather blamed him for not having introduced a measure which commanded assent from both sides of the House; but if the hon. Member had followed the fortunes of this Bill I think he would have seen it was shipwrecked on the ground that it could not be made satisfactory to some hon. Members opposite who have the greatest power with the Government in directing educational matters. The hon. Member perhaps forgets that a distinguished Member of the Party opposite proposed certain Amendments to the Bill.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order!

*MR. MATHER: I presume, Sir, I am not in order in further referring to this Bill, but I would suggest that the failure to pass it is not the fault of the hon. Member for Manchester. Now although we are nominally discussing the Education Estimates we are really discussing the New Code, and the right hon. Gentleman has invited an expression of opinion to day in order that the subject may come before the House next Session in a complete form and then receive the assent of Parliament. Now I believe that in our elementary schools throughout the country there is accommodation for more than five million children, and the important question we are now discussing is what subjects and methods of instruction shall be hereafter adopted in these schools. We must bear in mind that the use of our school system is unhappily almost confined to what we may call the working classes, and it is therefore most important that the subjects and methods adopted in them should be suitable to cultivate the intelligence, the aptitude, and the thinking powers of the children for their own future advantage and the good of the nation. In my opinion, we do not now get from the schools results that are adequate to the requirements of the country. We have not for the last 20 years had the plan of instruction which is best capable of developing the capacities of the children and preparing them for their future duties in life. In Germany, France, and America you will find an entirely different system of education. There all classes are educated together; the schools are usually supported by the State, and the education, from the lowest to the highest, is available for every class in the community. Anyone looking at our curriculum will, I am sure, admit that we have not been sufficiently practical in our methods. Happily, at last we have introduced the Kindergarten system into our infant schools, and that has, undoubtedly, pointed the way towards the introduction of a similar system into our higher grade schools. Manual training ought to be combined with class subjects; and experience shows that children who have had the former kind of teaching are able to excel in the class subjects prescribed by the Education Department those children who have devoted their whole time to those subjects. Wherever manual elements are introduced into elementary education — wherever drawing is taught at an early age and continued up to 13 or 14, and is also associated with workshop training, the children have been found far more apt in all the essentials of education than those who had not had such privileges. I trust that the right hon. Gentleman will well consider this matter, and see if he cannot improve the Code in this respect. This is not a Party question. I recognise fully the desire of hon. Gentlemen opposite to promote the cause of education in this country. I believe they are as earnest as hon. Members on this side of the House; but we can no longer ignore the fact that in the future we can only hope to hold our own among the nations of the world by securing the increased intelligence of our people, and developing our intellectual resources. In England we have natural resources superior to those of all the other nations of the world; and we only require to combine with those resources an education fitted to make our working classes a thinking, intelligent, and sober people, in order to hold in future a position higher even than that which we now possess. A little while ago we were engaged in discussing the Government proposals to spend a large sum of money on Naval defence. Well, many of us think the intelligence of our people is our first line of defence, and some of the money might be better spent on the education of the children of our working classes, with a view to enabling them to make the best use of the resources with which bounteous nature has endowed us, and thereby ensuring still greater pro-parity for this country in the future. When the Government come forward next Session with their new Code and their other proposals relating to education, I trust that, as the question is not a Party one, we shall all unite with one accord in endeavouring to bring our educational system into harmony with the wants of the age and the requirements of the nation.

MR. JOHN G. TALBOT (Oxford University): The speech we have just listened to is, I think, a satisfactory exemplification of the tone of this Debate; but, unfortunately, when we come to practical conclusions we do not always agree as to the method in which the principles to which we give expression should be carried into effect. It is easy enough in this House to lay down a more or less sound theory as to the principles on which education should be conducted, and say that it ought not to be treated as a Party question. No one echoes that sentiment more than I do; but when hon. Gentlemen on this side of the House come forward and ask that that sentiment may be carried into practice, and that no Party consideration shall prevent even-handed justice from being dealt out to them, they suddenly find all the forces of the Party to which they do not belong mustered together against them, and any concession to what is called the voluntary principle is immediately denounced in this House, and by the more powerful agencies outside of it. I hope that this will be an exception to the general rule, and that when this question comes to be more fully and more completely considered by education; but they contend that the system inaugurated in 1870 was intended to supplement and not to supplant, and should be maintained in its efficiency and integrity, at the same time not forgetting the important service which has been rendered by the voluntary principle to the cause of education. Our action, therefore, has been based on a conviction that we are bound by the traditions which we value, and by the interests which we represent, to see that in the new Code, which we believe to be a great and new departure, the interests of voluntary schools shall not be allowed to suffer, and that fair play shall be extended to both sides. That principle underlies the action we took upon the question of technical education. We value technical education as much as anyone, but we were determined that in this matter all the schools should be placed on an equality. And now, having made these few preliminary remarks, I ask the permission of the House to say a word or two in reference to the recommendations of the Royal Commission on Education. I acknowledge, Mr. Chairman, that you have been very indulgent to us to-night, for, although we are apparently discussing the Education Estimates, we have been permitted to refer to the Code which has been withdrawn, and I am afraid that the right hon. Gentleman who opened the Debate set us the first example in this matter. One of the points on which the Education Commission laid particular stress was the question of transfer schools, and in regard to that the Commissioners said—

“That in any fresh educational legislation it should be enacted that no transfer of a school held under trust should take place without the consent of a majority of the trustees, and that the Department should not sanction such terms of transfer as interfere with the original trust beyond what is required for the purpose of the Education Acts, and that provision should be made that no structural expenses involving a loan should be incurred without the consent of the trustees who lease the building.”

This is the point on which, if I may venture to say so, I think my right hon. Friend should take care that in any further legislation on this subject, whether by Code or by law, due security is provided. A great deal of complaint has been made in the past that voluntary schools have been transferred to School Boards by the mere fiat of a temporary

Board of Managers, and that the consent of the Trustees has neither been asked for nor given to the transfer. That seems to me to be a very inequitable state of things, and hence it received the attention of the Education Commissioners. Another point as to which I would like to say a word or two arises upon the recommendation of the Commissioners as to the limits of primary and secondary education. On this point the Report says—

“That, as the meaning and limits of the term ‘elementary’ have not been defined in the Education Acts, nor by any judicial or authoritative interpretation, but depend only upon the annual Codes of the Department on whose power of framing such Codes no limit has hitherto been imposed, it would appear to be of absolute necessity that some definition of the instruction to be paid for out of the rates and taxes should be put forth by the Legislature. Until this is done, the limits of primary and secondary education cannot be defined.”

No doubt there is a certain amount of restlessness on the part of hon. Gentlemen on both sides of the House on this subject of education. They are never satisfied, and possibly they ought not to be satisfied; they ought always to be trying to get something better. At the same time, I think they ought to remember that, excellent and admirable as education is, there is a limit to the public purse, and representing, as we do, the taxpayers of the country, we should bear in mind that, however desirable it may be that the children of any class should have a thoroughly good education, too much ought not to be done at the public expense. I remember that some years ago I was very much struck by a remark made by a right hon. Gentleman, whose death this House has so much cause to deplore—I mean Mr. John Bright—who said that, for his part, elementary education meant giving a child the power of reading intelligently, of writing a good hand, and of adding up simple sums. Some people think there ought not to be any limit to the instruction in our schools. They would not only provide technical education, but they would teach Latin and French, and would go on, until they had adopted practically the curriculum in force at Eton, at Harrow, or at Winchester. I say, let the people face this question. I do not represent a popular constituency, but many hon. Gentlemen do, and I would suggest that they should ascertain what is the feeling of their constituents on this matter. Now, Sir, there is another subject on which I would say a word or two. I find a recommendation of the Royal Commission points out—

“The necessity for having some form of evening school for the purpose of fixing and making permanent the day school instruction, and that it would be worth the while of the State to spend more money on such schools.”

That, I think, is a reasonable and logical suggestion. The great difficulty is, that the children when they leave the elementary schools are apt to forget what they have learnt, and I should be very glad to see if something could be done in the way of establishing evening schools which would give permanency to the day school instruction. Now, Sir, I have been challenged sometimes to say what it is we want in the way of additional assistance. We have been told that we are very unreasonable not to rest content with what we obtained in the Code; but if I may sum up in a very few words what we want and what we did not get under the new Code, it is simply this: Additional burdens were laid on the voluntary schools; but while you put those burdens upon them you did not provide the additional income which was necessary in order to meet the extra requirements, and I think we, at any rate, had a right to expect that something would be done in that direction. I shall be rather surprised if my right hon. Friend contradicts me when I say I do not imagine he has made any provision in his Budget this year for an increased grant for elementary education. I should be very glad if he could assure us he would do so next year. Until I get a positive assurance from the Government that we may get a little more grant from the Government, I shall remain of opinion that whilst the burdens are proposed to be increased, the means of meeting those burdens are not intended to be proportionately increased. I should like to ask for additional assistance to enable us to meet the additional burdens which are to be thrown upon us. It does not seem to be unreasonable to raise the 17s. 6d. limit to 20s., as proposed by the Commission, any more than it was to raise the 15s. limit to 17s. 6d. We live the 20s. now represents half the present cost of the education. I do not think, then, that our request is an unreasonable one, although it is a very meagre favour to ask for the voluntary schools. I am aware that, in regard to the Board schools, it is only a question of putting your hand into one pocket or the other; but I am sure the managers of the Board schools are anxious to keep down their expenses as much as possible, and would be glad to have this increased grant. What I ask for the voluntary schools, I am ready also to concede to the Board schools. As to the rating of the schools, the strong argument which has been advanced is that this House is already committed to the principle of exemption in the case of the Sunday and ragged schools, and it seems almost unfair that whilst exempting them you should not exempt ordinary schools which give education on all days of the week. There is one other matter on which I should like to call my right hon. Friend's attention. There is a very sore feeling on the part of a limited number of the older teachers of this country, and I think if my right hon. Friend can remove that sore feeling he will be doing a very meritable and wise act. Lord Lingen, who was Secretary to the Education Department in 1869, and afterwards, for several years, Secretary to the Treasury, says he did not know of the exclusion of the two classes of teachers I refer to from the benefits of the pension system. The contention is that many

I will only say, in conclusion, that I think I can assure my right hon. Friend, if I know anything of those with whom I have the honour of acting on this side of the House, that any proposals he may make in an Educational Act next year will be received by us with every desire to co-operate with him in the great work in which we are engaged. We do not yield one jot to hon. Members opposite in our desire to promote the true education of the country; but we say that, representing to some considerable extent the voluntary schools of the country, we are determined that by no act of ours shall the voluntary system suffer.

*MR. G. DIXON (Birmingham, Edgbaston): I have been waiting to hear from hon. Gentlemen opposite what their reasons were for attempting to delay the passing of the New Code. We now know accurately and definitely, from perhaps the greatest authority in this House, what those reasons are. The hon. Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. Talbot) has told us that the objection to the New Code is mainly, if not exclusively, that it calls for greater efficiency on the part of the voluntary schools and, at the same time, it does not provide for them a larger amount of grant. The hon. Member for Shropshire (Mr. Stanley Leighton) told us earlier in the evening that there had been on the part of the upholders of the Board Schools a violation of the Concordat of 1870. Now, one thing perfectly clear from the Debates at that time, and the principles upon which the Education Act was based, was that whilst every consideration should be given to existing voluntary schools, and the grants to those schools should be increased in order that they might meet the demand for better education, in no case was the grant made from Imperial resources to exceed the amount levied in the locality of the school. No doubt in some cases this grant was to exceed half, but that was merely because some of the schools were extremely poor, and the limit was made of 17s. 6d.; beyond that limit the grant was not to exceed half of the entire cost of the school. But what becomes of the Concordat of 1870 if we are to acquiesce in the demand of the hon. Member for Oxford, and to give grants to the schools beyond that which they levy in the localities? It has been said that the poor schools in agricultural districts would receive greater grants under the New Code, but the complaint made is that voluntary schools in large towns are not to be benefited. But what is the condition of the schools in the large towns which require assistance and in whose interest a valuable Code is to be suspended? These are the schools almost invariably without any contribution, or at any rate with a mere minimum of contributions from so-called subscribers. I am speaking that which I know, because as Chairman of the Birmingham School Board I am well acquainted with voluntary schools. It has been the Board's policy to treat them with every possible consideration. For years past many of these schools have not had the funds required to carry them on, and special efforts to obtain increased subscriptions have not been attended with success. It was supposed at last that the remedy would be a general subscription amongst all the voluntaryists in the whole district to help the poor schools. Yet the schools remain as before, and the contributions are so small that we are expecting continually that some of them will fall through. Depend upon it that if the proposals of the hon. Gentlemen opposite are to be carried out, and whenever the funds of these poor voluntary schools fall short they are to be made up out of the Exchequer, there will be a principle established which the majority of the people of the country will not approve of. We have been told that, while the contributions to these schools have fallen off, the number of scholars attending them has increased. It has been said to-night that there has been a decrease of £30,000 in the annual contributions to voluntary schools during the last 10 years. But, supposing you act on the principle suggested by the hon. Gentleman, and when these schools are in difficulties you, because they are religious schools, give them a grant from the Exchequer, do you think the voluntary contributions would increase? No, they would diminish still more, and you would have to come forward with larger and larger sums to meet the falling off of the voluntary contributions. Let me remind the House and the country that these voluntary schools, for which so much is said, and in order to assist which they have upset this valuable Code, are not equal to the Board Schools. They are far inferior. We have been told that the voluntary schools must be nearly equal, because the grant is nearly equal. But every expert knows perfectly well that, in this respect, the grant is no guide whatever. It was one of the grievances of the hon. Member for Shropshire that the new Code was to require more space per child; and that simply means that the voluntary schools do not provide that amount of cubic space for scholars which the Department thinks necessary. In fact many of the schools are too crowded, and are, therefore, in an insanitary condition, which is a serious hindrance to their educational work, as well as an injury to the health of the children. That is not all; the kind of education given in these schools is necessarily very inferior. I do not complain. I have never ceased, from the time I took an interest in elementary education, to say as much as I possibly could in honour of and to show my esteem for what had been done by the voluntaryists up to the passing of the Education Act. But because I honour them for what they have done and say that their work was a self-sacrificing, a noble, and a very valuable work, it does not follow that this great country is to stop at the point which they have happened to reach, and that we are not to make any effort to meet the constantly progressive demands for the further education of the great masses of the people. By the Act of 1870 an enormous advance was made in the provision of means for the education of the people. And who opposed the establishment of a national system of education? It was the friends of the voluntary system. And what have they to say now? They acknowledge that the education given by the Board Schools is a good education; at any rate, that it is equal to the education they give. We say it is inferior. We have now got, probably, accommodation enough for the children of the country. We have got what used to be considered fairly efficient education for all; but we who have the subject continually before us see that the improvements made are far from sufficient, and that if we do not want to lose a great part of that which we have obtained by the expenditure of these £3,000,000 or £4,000,000 of grants by the State, we must go further. The proper way to deal with this question is to say that the School Boards interested in the education of the people, or the voluntary managers, if they care to do it—we do not object to their doing it—must do more than was supposed to be necessary in 1870. The hon. Member for Oxford University thinks, as Mr. Bright thought 20 years ago, that to teach the children in elementary schools to read and write is enough. Let me tell hon. Gentlemen opposite that we do not think so now. The country does not think so, and the working men do not think so. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Talbot) will be surprised when I tell him that the working men of Birmingham are really in advance of the School Board; they are continually pressing it forward; their complaint is that it does not do enough; they watch the course of legislation on the subject; and they express in the strongest terms their dissatisfaction at delay. The School Board feels that it is their duty to do more than the law permits them to do. We feel it is our duty to give what is sometimes called secondary education, to supply future workmen with the means of acquiring the elementary and scientific knowledge alluded to by the hon. Member for Manchester (Sir H. Roscoe) and to provide evening continuation schools to enable workers to learn what will make them more successful in their particular trades. And we are met by the National Society and the voluntaryists in this way—"You shall not have these advantages unless you will give more money to the voluntary schools." The great mass of the electors in the country will not permit the education of the working classes to be retarded by such motives. It is an entire mistake to suppose that increased grants to voluntary schools will put them on a level with Board Schools. The half-crown addition to the grants will have to be followed by another as the subscriptions fall off; and yet neither the taxpayers nor the ratepayers would be represented in the management of these schools. If the so-called compact of 1870 were to be violated, you may rely on it that the country would be up in arms against you; and even if you succeed for a moment your success will be but fleeting, and before many years are over the principle you are now laying down will be swept away.

*VISCOUNT CRANBORNE (Lancashire, N.E., Darwen): The hon. Gentleman who has just sat down need not be afraid that we on this side are anxious to confine elementary education to merely reading, writing, and arithmetic. We fully acknowledge the feeling of the country in favour of higher education, and we are determined to act upon it. If anything were wanted to show how determined we are to pursue a policy of that kind it would be found in our attitude towards technical education. We fully admit that the feeling of the country is in favour of introducing technical education, especially in the higher schools; but even in elementary schools we are willing to give effect to that feeling. We maintain that any assistance given for the purpose naturally ought to follow the lines of the original Act, and must be equally given to both classes of schools recognised by that great settlement in 1870. Before I deal with the larger question, perhaps the Committee will allow me to say a word or two on a question particularly interesting to my own constituency—namely, half-time. I venture to ask my right hon. Friend to take this question into consideration, whether it would be possible to re-introduce the provisions that existed in the Act, 1876, but were abolished in 1880. I know it will require an Act of Parliament to do it—namely, to allow a standard of previous attendance to count as an alternative to educational efficiency in permitting half-time employment. The right hon. Gentleman opposite does not think so.

MR. MUNDELLA: It is utterly impossible.

*VISCOUNT CRANBORNE: That may be so in the view of the right hon. Gentleman, but that is not the view in the manufacturing districts. A number of children who are not able reach the same standard of proficiency as others, are kept back for a considerable time from half-time employment, and this is resented by the parents. I think that by such an arrangement these children might be allowed to become part of the wage-earners of the family, and in that way education of the children would become more popular with their parents. This view has been pressed upon me by an important Local Board in the neighbourhood of Preston, and also by the Teachers' Association of Blackburn. I would press this upon the consideration of my right hon. Friend between this and next year. And now let me turn to the new Code and the reasons for its failure. I do not for a moment think that any attack was intended by my right hon. Friend upon voluntary schools. For my own part, I give the Government great credit for having introduced a system totally different from the old payment by results under which we have so long suffered. But though the Code in its main outlines was a good Code, no doubt it was among voluntaryists all over the country widely unpopular. It contained certain provisions of an irritating character, and a good deal that was vague, but we should have believed that the vagueness would have been interpreted in a proper spirit, and that the provisions that were irritating would have been carried out so as to inflict no hardship upon voluntary schools if only we could trust the authorities who would administer the Code. We do not distrust the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Board; but we have a profound distrust of the Education Department, not merely because in the changes and chances of political life the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Sheffield may resume his seat on the Treasury Bench—and of course from our point of view that would be a public disaster—but because the right hon. Gentleman has left his spirit behind in the Education Department; and though my right hon. Friend does his best to restrain that spirit, we see it peeping out in every direction. Let me take two instances. There has been a question of increased cubic space in the New Code. I do not believe that the Government intended that provision to apply to existing schools; but in its words it did apply to them, and we found a most extraordinary reluctance on the part of the Government to withdraw that provision. Then there was the question of fixed grants. I am myself of opinion that the method of assigning the grant in the New Code was a very good one.

Viscount Cranborne

I presume that the Government intended that the lowest grant of 12s. was not to be withheld except in cases of gross inefficiency. That is what my right hon. Friend would probably say. But those who represent voluntary schools have no confidence that this provision would be interpreted in this harmless manner, so it became our duty to put down Amendments to make the meaning clear, and I am bound to say that, distrusting the Department as we did, the proceedings of the Government did not reassure us. Hon. Gentlemen are well aware that this is not the only Chamber in which these discussions take place. Listening to the utterances of Her Majesty's Government, taken as a whole, we could not feel sure that there was this determination to interpret all that was vague and irritating in a manner fair to voluntary schools. We could not feel sure that that was the case. Speaking for myself I do not share all the fears that have been expressed; but what I urge on the Government is this—that between now and next year they should make their intention clear. If they would make all these points clear before next year I do not believe that the Government will experience any difficulty from those who sit on this side of the House, at any rate, in passing their New Code. And now I turn to the question that has been discussed to-night. Hon. Gentlemen opposite are always telling us we must not attempt to bring about a change in the Concordat of 1870. The Act of 1870 gave a certain period in which voluntary school managers were invited to establish voluntary schools all over the country, and Parliament thus entered into an engagement of honour from which it cannot escape so long as voluntary schools do their duty. Since 1870, again, a great many new circumstances have come into existence; there is, in the first place, the astonishing multiplication of voluntary schools, which I do not think was anticipated by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian or by Mr. Forster at that time. The voluntary schools have become by far the most important educational agency in this country. They educate a far larger number of children than the Board Schools do; according to the reports of 1886-7 the numbers are in the proportion of 22 to 18. Then there is the enormous increase in the cost of education which was not contemplated at the time, and which throws an enormous burden on the rates and also on the voluntary subscribers. The hon. Member for Edgbaston said that the voluntary subscriptions had fallen off in the last 10 years, but the hon. Member forgot that for the most recent period, from last year to the present day, the voluntary subscriptions have practically remained at the same figure, and even in the period mentioned they have only fallen away by the comparatively small amount of £30,000, and even this has been made up by an increase in the amount of endowments. If hon. Members doubt that, they will find from the Report of the Commission that is so. But there is a third, and a much more important, event which has taken place since the settlement of 1870. The Nonconformist witnesses before the Royal Commission have declared that no religion whatever is possible in the Board Schools. I know the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Sheffield believes in the religious education given in the Board Schools, and I will not say a word against it. I am glad to feel that there is some sort of religion taught in the Board Schools, but the witnesses to whom I have referred showed that it was impossible or of no value. The public opinion in this country is in favour—strongly in favour—of religious education. Does anyone deny that the people of this country are profoundly impressed with the importance of teaching religion to their children? Does not the Sunday school itself show the enormous desire the people have for religious teaching? I have shown that the Board Schools had failed to provide religious education, and I entirely repudiate the view of the Member for Birmingham that the electors in this country are opposed to the voluntary school system.

MR. G. DIXON: I did not say they were opposed to the voluntary schools. What I said was that they were in favour of making their education more effective.

VICOUNT CRANBORNE: I apologise to the hon. Member. I have no doubt I did misquote him slightly. What the hon. Gentleman, I think, wished to imply was, that the people of this country would not allow religious considerations to stand in the way of educational progress. I believe the hon. Gentleman is entirely wrong. I believe the people do not care for very advanced educational systems, and that they do care for religious education. When I think of the constituency the hon. Member represents, I am surprised at the line he has taken. A country district might have a feeling against a voluntary school which the Nonconformists were obliged to attend, but how Birmingham can find anything to complain of in the existence of voluntary schools I do not know. In the constituency I represent there is no Board School at all. Every denomination has its own school, and my hon. Friend (Mr. Tomlinson) represents such another constituency. But in the case of a country district where there might be a theoretical objection. I feel bound to say that nothing is more instructive, in reading the Report of the minority of the Commission, than the account which they give of the action of the Conscience Clause. The Conscience Clause, they agree, is not violated; but they say it has been ineffective. It has been ineffective because the Nonconformists do not make the slightest use of it; that is to say, they are content with the present settlement. That being so, we have to consider the position in which we are now placed. After the Report of the Commission it will not be possible to remain exactly where we are. The majority of the Commission reported that the two systems ran along side by side, but the pressure is becoming almost more than the voluntary system can bear, and that, unless something is done for its relief, we must look to the time when the voluntary system must gradually disappear. We must not merely look at the rights of the voluntary system. The hon. Member said the voluntary schools have no right to expect assistance from the State unless they made every effort to maintain their subscriptions. I have no doubt they will do that, but I look at the matter from the point of view of the community. It would be a profound disaster to lose these voluntary schools, and I would go a long way to prevent it. Some hon. Members seem to think that we who touch their educational system are poachers. Well, we will be no longer considered poachers. We have a distinct line. We enjoy the support, I believe, of a majority of the electors.

We certainly enjoy that of the majority of the House, and we intend to use the power placed in our hands. I do not say that any Member will propose that direct rate aid should be given to the voluntary schools. The time is not yet ripe for that great question, but no consideration will restrain us from making the demand if we think fit. In the case of technical education, the hon. Gentleman has declared in the most emphatic manner that he will not allow any assistance to be given to voluntary schools. We are sorry hon. Members take that line, but we are determined to meet them. Next Session we hope to meet them in the open and defeat them in the Division Lobbies. Let not hon. Gentlemen think that at the next Election they will be able to throw it in our teeth that we stopped technical education, for we fully intend to carry it out ourselves. We are often told in these discussions that we are being defeated by other countries in the great competition that exists at the present day, but I am not convinced. When I look back on history I find that we have not always followed the example of foreign nations, and yet we have been successful and they have failed. I find, too, that there has been one undoubted characteristic to be recognised—the religious character of the English people. How do we know, with all our technical education and the rest of it, an irreligious England would produce the same result as in the past? We insist on religious teaching as a basis. We insist on the maintenance of our denominational schools, whether for Catholics, Methodists, or Church of England, and we believe we shall succeed.

MR. MUNDELLA: I am glad, Sir, that when I rose before I had not the good fortune to catch your eye, for it has given me the opportunity of hearing the admirable speech of the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Dixon). There is no man in the House more thoroughly qualified to speak on the work of education, and I may tell the noble Lord that though he seems to doubt it, no Member in the House has done more for the religious education of children than my hon. Friend has done in Birmingham. He cannot be surprised if I say, speaking from my experience of the Education Department, that no Member has done more for voluntary schools than the hon. Member (Mr. Dixon). I have known him put his hand into his pocket to advance them.

*VISCOUNT CRANBORNE: Looking at what they have done in the past, I should be rash to predict the collapse of the voluntary schools; but I do think there is a risk that they may be over-pressed, and I desire to protect them against it.

MR. MUNDELLA: That was the burden of the noble Lord's speech—that having in view the burden they are bearing and the difficulty they experience in competing with the Board Schools, something should be done by the Government for the voluntary schools. I must say that I do not think the First Lord of the Treasury will thank the noble Lord for his speech, and I am certain that the noble Lord has made the task of the Vice President very much more difficult than it was. And before I pass on I should like to refer to what I think was much to be regretted in the speech of the noble Lord, and what I think he himself will one of these days regret, if he does not feel ashamed of it. The noble Lord attacked the Education Department; he said he believed in the good intentions of the Government, but that he had no faith in the Education Department.

*VISCOUNT CRANBORNE: Hear, hear.

MR. MUNDELLA: Yes, he applauds that statement. The noble Lord said I had left my spirit behind me in the Education Department. I wish I was sure of that; but I will say this to the noble Lord—that it is disgraceful that a Member of the House should attack officials when they cannot defend themselves. [Ministerial cries of "Order!"] It is a shabby thing, at least, to attack permanent officials when they are not present to defend themselves, and have no one to do so for them; but, speaking from what I know of the Department, and of its traditions under every Vice President, I believe that it has been perfectly impartial in all its dealings with Board and voluntary schools; and if it has had any leanings, they have been almost always in the direction of the voluntary schools, which they are anxious to prevent from going to the wall. I am afraid the reference of the noble Lord was entirely confined to one important Member of the Education Department—namely, the Secretary to the Department, for I heard his name called out by the hon. Gentleman the Member for the Loughborough Division.

VICOUNT CRANBORNE: I must interrupt the right hon. Gentleman. I decline to have any words put into my mouth beyond those I used and to which I adhere. I am not responsible for any interruptions.

MR. MUNDELLA: He is not responsible for interruptions, but he is responsible for his words, and when he speaks of the Education Department he must remember that the chief of the Department is responsible for all the other officials, and I trust that the Vice President, when he rises to speak, will give the noble Lord a piece of his mind for the attack he has made on the permanent officials, because I hold it to be the duty of every chief not to allow his subordinates to be attacked. Did the noble Lord ever hear imputations of this kind made from this side of the House? So long as I was at the Education Department I always received the strongest public testimony from the heads of the Church to which the noble Lord belongs, from the late and the present Archbishop of Canterbury, from most of the Bishops, that I held the balance equal, and tried to administer the law as I found it; and I believe every Minister will endeavour to do that. The hon. Member for Oxford University admitted that the defeat of the Code and of the technical education scheme was entirely due to the apprehension that the voluntary schools would suffer. Thus, after three years and three Bills—after the passionate appeal made two years ago in Manchester by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that the Government would not allow the Irish to obstruct their good intentions with respect to technical education—the House has not been given a chance during all this time to vote on the question of technical education. The noble Lord and his friends when religious instruction is given? Has he seen the syllabus of religious teaching? I believe that there is more and better religious teaching to-day than at any time during this century. The noble Lord talked about a "religious England," and said we were possibly in the way of having an "irreligious England;" but he forgets that, whereas a century ago, Joseph Lancaster began to teach children for 5s. a year, to read and spell texts; now there are 4,600,000 children under instruction, and almost every child receiving good, solid religious education. A clergyman of the Church of England, a member of the School Board, and Chairman of the Religious Instruction Committee, wrote me a letter stating that the religious instruction of the School Board in London is at least equal to, and in most cases better, than the religious instruction of the voluntary schools; and I know that is so, not only in London, but throughout the country. There are in proportion to the population 40 per cent more in Sunday-schools than there were in 1851, and the number on the register is 5,200,000, or 500,000 more than on the register of day schools. What, then, does the noble Lord mean by talking as if the religious element was entirely monopolised by that side of the House, and we were advocates of irreligious instruction? There is no justification for any statement of that kind. I congratulate the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council on what I may call the ordinary statement of automatic progress in the numbers under education in our elementary schools. So far as numbers are concerned, nothing could be more satisfactory. In 1870 the number in average attendance was 1,160,000, in 1876, under the Act of Lord Sandown, it rose to about 2,200,000, in 1880 it was nearly 3,000,000, and it is now 3,800,000. During the past 19 years what has been going forward in regard to education? First, we have brought the children into the schools, and then we have given them a minimum of instruction; but I have no hesitation in saying, after the Report of the Royal Commission, we are in the presence of a state of things which demands a new departure. It is impossible, in the existing state of things, to continue the present moral and pecuniary waste. A few weeks ago attention was called by the Bishop of Lichfield to the great blot upon the Education Acts that children are leaving school at earlier ages every year. The reason is that the children are better taught, and every year they pass through their standards earlier. In Standard II. last year there were 561,000 children, in Standard III. 561,537, in Standard IV. the number fell to 481,000, in Standard V. to 309,000, and in Standard VI. there were only 129,000 children. In more than half the rural parishes in England the standard of exemption is Standard IV., the children are passing from school at 10 years of age, and very soon they will have an opportunity of forgetting all they have learned at school. We are spending between seven and eight millions a year on elementary education. So few children reach the upper standards, in consequence of the early age at which they pass the standard of exemption, that they lose in a few years all they have learned at school. A great many of them do not work; if they did they might become half-timers. The Chairman of the Birmingham School Board, in his address on last year's work, said that the parents were powerless to enforce their own wish, and there being no law to touch them these lads are a law to themselves; they will neither earn or learn, but loaf. That is a state of things which certainly urgently demands a remedy. The hon. Member for the University of Oxford says we have no standard of what elementary education ought to be, and that we seem to be adding first one subject and then another which was not in contemplation when the Education Act was passed. I have not time now to quote Mr. Forster's speeches, but I may point out that in opening several of the higher elementary schools he said that it was always contemplated that this education should be equal with any in Europe. Will the hon. Member for Oxford University consult the authority of his own Commission, which was sent on the Continent to consider the question of the elementary education of Europe? Mr. Alfred Arnold, the best authority we have, in his Report, which is one of the most important documents in relation to elementary education ever submitted to this House, says—

"The release of a child from school at 10 or 11 because he could pass the Fifth Standard would be thought in Germany absurd and most injurious."

Mr. Mundella

I am afraid the noble Lord opposite is not acquainted with that Report. The right hon. Gentleman's Code was in many respects an advance, and I very much regret its withdrawal. I do not complain of the right hon. Gentleman, but I think he has been badly treated at the hands of his chiefs. I know the trouble it involves to prepare a New Code, and make it fair all round, and I say that to prepare one and place it on the Table of the House, and let it lie there for six months to be shot at by all who misunderstand or misrepresent it, and never to give it one moment's chance of discussion, is to afford very scurvy treatment to the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council. I have often been disposed rather to commiserate with the right hon. Gentleman than to blame him. I have regarded him more with sorrow than with anger for all the miserable shortcomings of the Education Department during the past three years.

MR. RITCHIE: Hear, hear.

MR. MUNDELLA: I hope the right hon. Gentleman who is cheering that statement, the President of the Local Government Board, will take his full share of the blame. The Vice President of the Council is not a Cabinet Minister, and any Minister who is without a seat in the Cabinet has but a very poor chance of obtaining the consideration of any important subject it is his lot to bring before the House. I hope and trust the day is not far distant when we shall deal not only with questions of administration, but with the more important question which was before the House five or six years ago, and in favour of which a Committee reported unanimously—namely, the establishment of a Minister of Education. Until you have such a Minister you will never have your work properly performed—the Vice President of the Council will never be able to exercise proper influence over Her Majesty's Government. What I want to say with regard to the Code is this, that do what you will, shuffle the cards as you may, you cannot by any system of administration remedy the great defects which are now too apparent in the Educational system. It is not possible by means of a Code to lengthen the school life of a child which has been stereotyped by our low standards. The majority and the minority of the Education Commission were agreed that you must raise the standard of age and also the minimum standard for half-time and full-time examinations. I think they recommended that we should place England on the same footing as Scotland in that respect. The Third and Fifth Standards should be the minimum in England as in Scotland, otherwise we are wasting money in a lavish and almost profligate manner. Because £8,000,000 a year spent in elementary education when more than half the children do not complete their education is simply robbery of the taxpayer. Now, there was some question raised as to the progress made in certain subjects which the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President said affect domestic happiness. Cookery and domestic economy are two of these subjects and they require little or no apparatus. But where are they taught? I put the question to the noble Lord. The teaching does not take place in the voluntary schools. Of 42,000 children who received grants in cookery during the past year 35,000 were taught in Board Schools, and only 5,318 in the National Schools of the Church of England to which Church the vast majority of the voluntary schools belong. What is the reason of this?

An hon. MEMBER: The rates.

MR. MUNDELLA: But the noble Lord insists that the voluntary schools shall have the same means to enable them to teach technical education as the School Board schools. The voluntary schools have the same grants for teaching cookery as the School Board schools have; and because they will not teach it or cannot teach it are they to remain as dogs in the manger, refusing to allow it to be taught to any one else? Are we to wait for technical education for our children until such time as the voluntary schools can share the rates with the Board Schools, and that will for the towns, as they are where, while education ranks lowest and is poorest, the highest fees are paid—in some cases actually double what are charged in School Board towns. The hon. Baronet the Member for Evesham (Sir R. Temple) talked about the extravagance of the London School Board, both in the case of the last Board and the present one. Well, the hon. Baronet had a majority on his side at both Boards—how is it he did not manage to keep down the extravagance? The fact is the education of the London School Board is too good to be much cheaper than it is, and the hon. Member in his heart of hearts knows it. There are voluntary schools that give as good instruction, but it costs just as much. It is useless to say that the voluntary schools cost less than the Board Schools. I am grateful for what the voluntary schools have done, and have no desire to see them injured where they do their work as well as the Board Schools, but I say they cannot survive unless they do that. We have no right to maintain inferior schools and force the children to attend them, without choice to the parents, and waste the school life of the children, which must happen if they have not good instruction. A strong appeal was made by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Shropshire (Mr. Stanley Leighton) on the question of inspection, and he spoke of the Inspector as the great terror of the school. Well, some of them are not only a terror to the school, but a terror to the Department. But how does this come about? Why, by the exercise of political patronage, and putting men into the Inspection Department because they were the sons or relatives of this man or that. When you get the men there they do not turn out to be what is wanted. During six years something like 80 University men were appointed, and many of them were wholly unfit for the work—men who had no sympathy with child life, no desire to study their duties—in fact, no desire to do anything but receive their salaries. Well, we had to put an end to that. A Return before the House shows that between 1880 and 1889 only two Inspectors were appointed who were members of Universities, and one of them was a Welsh-speaking Inspector who was wanted in Wales. We improved the position of the teachers and promoted them to these

an exceedingly poor country in comparison with England. There are, no doubt, some districts where the minerals are very rich, but the large proportion of Wales is exceedingly poor when compared with England. Then the Welsh people are exceedingly anxious for education, but the public endowments for intermediate education and for all charitable purposes fall far below the endowments in England. I believe it has been computed—and I get this from the same source—that in England the average endowments for all charitable purposes, per county, amount to something like £55,575 per annum, whereas similar endowments in Wales, per county, amount to only £1,921. If we take the endowments in particular counties, of course they vary extremely. Some counties have much larger endowments than others, but whereas the most poorly-endowed county in England, Cornwall, has an endowment of over £4,000 a year, the large County of Glamorgan, with a population of something over half a million, has endowments only to the amount of £1,921. I hear that my noble Friend cheers that statement, and therefore I hope he will agree with me that the necessity for some additional endowment for intermediate education in Wales is conclusively shown by the figures which I have declared. My noble Friend said it was better to leave the endowment of intermediate education to the private munificence of individuals, but how is it that in Wales this private munificence has not created the endowments necessary for intermediate education? I think if there had been a large desire to do there what has been done in many parts of England—namely, to endow intermediate education, we should have seen much larger endowments in that country than now exist there. I therefore do not at all agree with my noble Friend that we ought to stay our hands and refuse to assist this poorer country in regard to intermediate education; for, from all I have seen and heard on the subject, I believe that if something is not done in the manner proposed to be adopted by this Bill, intermediate education will not thrive in Wales. My Lords, I do not wish to dwell at too great length on this subject, nor shall I go into the details of the Bill; but I should like to refer to one matter besides that to which my noble Friend has referred. I should like to mention one important clause in the Bill which deals with the initiation of schemes. That, to a certain extent, is a new method of dealing with charitable and educational endowments. Hitherto, it has been necessary either for the Governors of an institution to propose a scheme, or for the Charity Commissioners themselves in certain cases to do it. It was found that this, especially in Wales, prevented any new schemes being brought forward at all, and therefore it has been proposed in various ways to create some body, directed by popular opinion in the country, to start new schemes where new schemes are necessary. I think originally we proposed a different scheme to this. A different method for giving initiation to schemes was proposed by the Government of which I was a Member in the year 1885; but since that time a great change with regard to all Local Government has taken place owing to the great measure which was passed by Her Majesty's Government last year—namely, the measure which constituted County Councils throughout England. That gives at once a popular body which can deal with matters of this sort, and though I confess I should have preferred to have seen the initiation of schemes given also to these Councils, I think the compromise which has been arrived at between the Government and those who promoted this Bill is a wise one. Now that the County Councils are started, there is a body created which would be able to initiate any schemes, and also to reform some of the old endowments which have not the confidence of the country. Those two points—namely, that of granting direct assistance to the intermediate schools in Wales, and that of giving a new body, partly elected from the County Councils, power to initiate schemes, seem to me very important points to be dealt with, and I heartily rejoice to see them form part of this measure. My Lords, I shall not detain the House any longer, but I sincerely trust that the hopes which have been entertained in Wales with regard to the possibility of enjoying an enlarged system of intermediate education by a measure of this sort will not be disappointed, but that this measure will bear excellent fruit, and will give the people of Wales who so much desire it an easy and efficient means of intermediate education for their children.

EARL FORTESCUE: My Lords, I ask your kind indulgence while I offer a few remarks on this Bill, and I then more require your indulgence because I take the same view which my noble Friend did who answered the Lord President of the Council. I am afraid those views are not shared by very many of your Lordships. My noble Friend truly remarked that now for the first time Parliament is preparing formally to authorise the establishment and maintenance of schools for secondary or intermediate education by means of rates supplemented by grants from the Treasury, which are in no case to be more than equal to what is raised by the rates. As I expected, the principle of aid to education, above mere elementary education, by the State has, it has been urged, been recognised by the grants which have been made latterly to Welsh Universities. The noble Earl who has just spoken gave what he considered conclusive evidence of the value of those grants and of their good effect. I must say it seems to me a very different thing giving a grant to a University which the Welsh would certainly call national—at any rate it cannot be considered as less than provincial—in comparison with the establishment of a number of local intermediate schools supported by local rates. This is the first instance of the extension upwards (with the exception of those grants to the Universities) to the middle class of that system of public educational aims which was initiated as regards contributions by rates from one kind of property only, real property, less than 20 years ago, years. And, secondly, there is the evil of discouraging—in fact, more than discouraging—of extinguishing, practically, all chance of voluntary gifts or bequests being made for educational endowment. Who does not lament that there has not been in Wales in past times more public spirit and educational zeal shown? Take the rich County of Glamorgan, with its wealth of minerals, and we shall see that Wales has no reason to be proud of that absence of educational endowments which we have just heard described. No one, after these contributions from rates and taxes have been established by Act of Parliament, would, as I say, be at all likely to give or bequeath anything for the purpose of educational endowment; and perhaps all the less, because confidence in the devotion of endowments to the purposes which were dear to those who have founded endowments has been very much shaken by some of the legislation which has taken place latterly. But besides those two evils, there seems to me to be a third, and a very serious one, that of subjecting the higher education of the country, at least the higher secondary education, as distinguished from the elementary, to bureaucratic control. For the first time we find the Education Department brought into official connection with secondary education. The tendency, I fear, will be to increase the applications for grants, and assistance from rates, and with these increased applications, if they are yielded to, will come a very natural, and I cannot say otherwise than a legitimate demand for control and interference on the part of the Government. I know that one ex-Minister of Education, Mr. Mundella, has avowed again and again his earnest desire to see the Education Department entrusted with considerable control over the secondary education of the country. Well, if the Education Department is armed with such greatly increased powers as he and some others desire for it, instead of looking to our great ancient Universities, we shall find those engaged in the secondary and higher education of the country looking to it for guidance and leading. It is quite true that the Universities for a long time were too stagnant and too obstructive; but now for some time they have been awakened to their responsibilities and duties; and now, though

"To provide a subway, bridge, or footway at any station of the company where it shall appear that any considerable number of persons, whether passengers, or railway servants, or others, are daily compelled to cross the lines in passing from one part of such station to another part thereof ;

"To provide all passenger trains with an efficient means of communication between the passengers and the guard and driver."—(Mr. Channing.)

*SIR MICHAEL HICKS BEACH : I can only say I feel myself bound on this Amendment as on the former one.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Question proposed, "That Clause 1 stand part of the Bill."

*MR. W. M. MURPHY (Dublin, St. Patrick's): This Bill was not read a second time till Friday night, and although I desire the insertion of several Amendments, I only had the opportunity of putting them down to-night, and I think it is very desirable that they should appear on the Paper. Therefore, while I have no desire to delay or obstruct the Bill, I beg to move to report Progress. My Amendments are proposed in the interests of weak companies.

Motion made, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."

*SIR MICHAEL HICKS BEACH : May I point out to the hon. Member that the Question has already been put that Clause 1 stand part of the Bill, and if, as I understand, his Amendments are to that clause, it is too late to put them? If he will place them on the Paper, or in any way communicate with me, I shall be happy to consider them. I may explain that I have already altered the wording of the clause in order to meet the very cases to which the hon. Member refers, and I would ask him to let the clause pass so that we may proceed with the Bill as far as possible.

*MR. R. K. CAUSTON (Southwark, W.): I should like to draw the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to the fact that I have myself given notice of a new clause to this Bill with the object of securing the printing of fares on passenger tickets, and upon which I should like to take the opinion of the House if the right hon. Gentleman cannot accept it.

MR. A. J. MUNDELLA : I rise to appeal to the hon. Gentleman to let this Bill proceed, and I may remind him that there is no part of Her Majesty's dominions where a Bill of this kind is more required.

*MR. MURPHY : I have said before I have no desire to obstruct the Bill. I think, however, we should have an opportunity of discussing the Amendments, and, therefore, I cannot withdraw my Motion.

*SIR MICHAEL HICKS BEACH : With regard to the remarks of the hon. Member for Southwark, I do not think the question of printing fares on tickets is of first-rate importance. I hope he will not press it so as to defeat the Bill. I would also ask the hon. Member for the St. Patrick's Division of Dublin to place his Amendment on the Paper.

MR. MURPHY : I have done so.

ARTILLERY AND ENGINEERS COM- MISSIONS.

QUESTIONS.—OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF MILLTOWN: My Lords, seeing the noble Lord the Under Secretary of State for War in his

a former occasion, when commissions were thus allotted, and it seems to me rather an injustice to exclude that School when it is turning out the highest class of engineers. What the authorities of that School ask is either to be allowed to compete with the Coopers Hill men, or that a certain number, say six, of these commissions should be allotted to them, or that the allotted commissions should be thrown open generally for competition to such Universities as possess engineering schools. It seems to me rather hard that the Coopers Hill School should be allowed that advantage against older colleges and schools. My Lords, the University of Dublin asks no favour, but only justice in this matter, and I trust my noble Friend will be able to give a favourable answer to the question.

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Lord HARRIS): My Lords, the offer of 30 commissions in the Royal Artillery and Royal Engineers having now been made to the Coopers Hill cadets, it will not be possible to throw the competition open to all educational establishments where there are engineering schools. Coopers Hill was selected for the offer of these commissions because the Military Authorities found on previous occasions, when other establishments than the Royal Military Academy supplied successful candidates, that those who came from Coopers Hill required no more training at the School of Military Engineering at Chatham than Woolwich cadets, whilst those who entered by open competition required a year longer at Chatham—namely, three years instead of two. As these gentlemen are admitted, as it is, some years later than Woolwich cadets, this delay is obviously a serious matter.

INTERMEDIATE EDUCATION (WALES)
SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

\*THE LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Viscount CRANBROOK): My Lords, I have to ask your assent to the Second Reading of this Bill, a Measure which I hope will settle a controversy which has existed for a considerable period. In the year 1881 a Committee, which was appointed by the noble Earl opposite, who then filled the place which I have now the honour to occupy, reported in favour of a system of intermediate education for Wales at considerable length and in considerable detail. Since that time many attempts have been made to legislate in the matter; but either from want of time, or more particularly from the want of unanimity on the part of those interested, legislation has not taken place, and Bills which have been brought in on, I think, three or four occasions have passed away into the limbo of Bills, alike unfortunate, and have not come to any real result. I am very sorry that on this occasion my noble Friend Lord Aberdare, who was Chairman of that Commission, is absent, and unhappily from illness, but I have his assurance that if he had been here he would have given his hearty support to the Bill which I have brought before the House. My Lords, the Bill is a very simple one, and I do not propose, in saying a few words in its favour now, to make any remarks upon the Bills which have preceded it, except to say that with regard to the measure introduced this year in the other House it was read a second time with the assent of the Government, on the distinct understanding that it was not assumed to be accepted in its details, but that the interests of intermediate education in Wales were of such a character that it was desirable, at all events, that a measure should be passed in the course of the present Session. In consequence of that understanding we took the Bill into consideration, and by degrees framed Amendments which have been accepted by the authors of that Bill; and though, perhaps, they may not have been satisfied with everything done by us, they have seen that it is likely to advance education in Wales, and they have considered it advisable to give way on some points in order to ensure that result. My Lords, Wales has been for a long time in a very peculiar position, being poor and without endowments for this purpose. Within recent years three colleges have been established at Aberystwith, Cardiff, and Bangor, and the Government have given them considerable grants of money by which they have been able to do an increasing work. But day by day it is found that the young men who come up to them are very ill-prepared for the education which the colleges have to offer. There are not the means of providing adequate education within the Principality, and this Bill has been pressed on all hands with a view of supplying that deficiency in secondary schools. This will be the first occasion upon which the Government has given for this kind of education the promise of a direct grant of money to aid the contributions of the counties. The Bill provides that the counties may have power to rate themselves up to  $\frac{1}{4}$ d. in the £1, and provision is made that if upon inspection the schools are found to be adequate for their purpose, and to be carrying on work which is advantageous to the Principality, a grant may be made, in no case exceeding the sum found by the counties. But, my Lords, the mode in which we have dealt with the question in this instance need not be made a precedent elsewhere, for the circumstances existing in Wales, as I have pointed out, are very peculiar. Hardly any of the counties in Wales have endowments of any value, for those which exist are very small ones, so that in comparison with England they are very deficient in those means of education which we supplied to so large a degree in the English counties. In the endowed schools of Wales there is room for 2,846 scholars, but the attendance is only 1,546; nor is the education, though in some instances extremely good, such as to be practically suitable for the class of boys who generally need intermediate schools. Your Lordships observe that this is a Bill for providing intermediate or technical education. It embraces the two, and by the definition which is given in the Interpretation Clause you will see that it is intended this should be rather a kind of scientific and commercial education than the usual classical education given in such schools. It includes branches of science, such as those for which grants are made by the Department of Science and Art, the use of tools, modelling in clay, shorthand, and subjects which may be of use to the youths in trade or commerce, but it will not include the teaching or practice of any trade, industry, or employment. So that your Lordships will see the design of this measure is that throughout Wales schools may be provided at which boys will receive the kind of education which will best fit them for commerce or for the trades in which they may afterwards be engaged. Under the Bill which was previously introduced, provision was made that there should be a Board of Education for the whole of Wales, which was to supersede the Charity Commissioners. We did not think that was either workable or a good system in itself, for there would not exist the impartiality which is found in the Charity Commissioners. Besides, there seemed to be no reason why the Charity Commissioners should be excluded from the work which it has been doing extremely well, and which it is perfectly competent to do. We propose, in this Bill, that there shall be a Joint Education Committee of five in each county, three of the members being appointed by the County Council and two by the Government, and that the Charity Commissioners shall send an assistant Commissioner to sit with them but not vote. In that way the initiation of the scheme will begin with those who have a thorough knowledge of Wales, and, at the same time, the Government will be in a position to take part in the deliberations, and to give effect to its wishes. Your Lordships will observe that in the later part of the Bill the matter is to be taken up in the ordinary way by the Charity Commissioners, and that though powers are given to this Joint Committee to commence, there is no power given them to carry into effect projects, but that the Charity Commissioners are to exercise their functions as in ordinary cases. It seems to me to be very much in accordance with what was designed by the Committee appointed by the noble Earl opposite. The Report says that it may be hoped, when the wishes of the Welsh people come to be properly understood, those with whom the settlement of the question rests will make the necessary changes, and that they will act wisely in changing the character of the education, as time and alteration of circumstances may prove it to be unsuitable and unnecessary for any useful purpose. There will be an opportunity of changing the kind of education on the part of the Charity Commissioners, and they will be empowered to form schemes, even where, though there are no endowments, there are payments made out of the rates on the part of the ratepayers and on the part of the Government out of the public funds. The Joint Committee might find a difficulty in entirely formulating schemes, and therefore they have power to put forward proposals for schemes which the Charity Commissioners, with their staff and means of carrying them into effect, will undoubtedly be able to do more effectually and efficiently than a Body which may be, perhaps, even more intimately acquainted with the wants of Wales, and which may therefore very well be empowered to bring forward proposals. In this way the feeling of the body of ratepayers in Wales, who have been to a certain extent irritated at finding themselves contributing largely out of the rates to elementary education, without having educational resources for themselves, has been consulted. My Lords, I do not propose now to go into the details of the Bill. It will work with the Endowed Schools Acts, and will be made part of them, and they must therefore be read together. First of all will come the initiation of some scheme by the Joint Committee, the composition and constitution of which I have described. Those schemes will then be carried to the Charity Commissioners, and they will then come before the Education Department in the way in which all Charity schemes are dealt with. If there be any legal questions to settle, they will have to be disposed of by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, and therefore there is every opportunity provided for anybody who objects to anything under this system to object. Finally, if still opposed, the projects will be laid on the Tables of both Houses of Parliament, and there will be ample opportunity afforded, therefore, for discussing them. I think, therefore, your Lordships will agree that we have taken care that no rash schemes shall be either initiated or completed by any one of the parties who are entrusted with this work. I do not think I should be doing any good by going into the details of the Bill, which will be more properly reserved for the Committee stage; but I think I have explained to your Lordships sufficiently that this is a Bill which meets a want which has been put forward and advocated strongly ever since 1881. It is a Bill which, I confess, to my surprise, I have found accepted by all parties in Wales. Those who objected to the Bills hitherto, on the ground that they interfered too much with the old system in operation, are ready to take advantage of this Bill; and though they who were alarmed at the measure read a second time in the House of Commons are quite ready now to give their adhesion to the Bill before your Lordships. My Lords, I believe there is now an opportunity, such as there has never been before, of securing by this Bill a general system of secondary education in Wales; and, therefore, I commend it to your Lordships, and request for it a Second Reading.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2<sup>d</sup>."—(Viscount Cranbrook.)

*LORD NORTON: My Lords, I must beg the House to consider this Bill for a moment in a different aspect from that in which it has been presented by the noble Lord the President of the Council. The details he has referred to are no doubt very good, and the amendments which the Government have introduced into the Bill render it a much safer measure for effecting its object. But what I want to call your Lordships' attention to is the grave principle involved in the Bill, which was hardly alluded to by the noble Lord, and which was not in the slightest degree alluded to in the other House or in any of the Debates on this measure—I mean the principle of subsidising from general taxation the intermediate and technical education of the country. That is a principle which is not recognised—distinctly disavowed—in England. The educational Treasury grants given in England to national schools are restricted to elementary education. I am well aware that attempts are being made to stretch the term "elementary" very considerably, and from time to time it has been stretched by what I cannot help considering the very dangerous by-legislation which is now permitted by Departments of State, and over which Parliament has very little control. In fact, Parliament hardly hears of what is done in the Council Office until it is too late to be modified or rectified. But, although the Education Department, by its Code, seems to have stretched elementary education over a great deal that is very much higher than elementary, it professes, or the Acts of Parliament profess, to restrict the charge upon general taxation in respect of education to what is elementary, and so far the poorer taxpayers of this country are assured that they will not be called upon to pay the expense of the education of the richer classes. It is this assurance which has led to a much better kind of provision for intermediate education and for technical instruction in this country; that is to say, the provision which is made by private interest, by great manufacturers, by guilds, by endowments, and from private sources of every possible kind. That suits better not only the spirit of this country, but the interests of intermediate, and still more of technical education. It is better that education of that kind should be provided by those who are interested in it and who are far more competent to supply it appropriately than the State could possibly be under any circumstances whatever. This Bill represents a demand on the part of Wales for exceptional treatment in this respect. Upon what ground is Wales to make a demand for exceptional treatment in this matter? Wales distinctly claims it in forma pauperis, upon what has been called in the other House "the generosity

Viscount Cranbrook

England." They say that they have fewer endowments in Wales than in England. The land of Wales, the minerals of Wales, the enterprise of Wales, are quite sufficient for all public purposes required by that country. Why have they not provided by endowments for this purpose in Wales as in England? Endowments are the secured contributions of past volunteers. As to poverty, unless they mean poverty of spirit, there is no ground whatever for making such a claim. The fact is, as one can only gather incidentally from the Debates, the feeling is not so much that the endowments for education are small, as that the endowments for that purpose in Wales have been chiefly made by Churchmen. It is an anti-Church feeling, which is gradually diminishing in Wales; it is kept up only by agitation, and by the plan of shareholding in Dissenting chapels there. That is clearly the ground on which this demand is made. What can be a better proof of it than the clause in this Bill, which provides that the schools which are to be supported by public taxation are not to have any distinctive religious instruction whatever, and that any prayers, in the schools from day to day, shall be so arranged that the scholars can conveniently withdraw from them? That, my Lords, lets out the spirit of the Bill. The question is, whether even that spirit might not be more easily met than by admitting the principle of the charge on public funds. The terms of endowments might be widened. I observe that Mr. Gladstone, almost the only Englishman who took part in these Debates (and he is partly a Welshman) took the eleemosynary line too. He said that Wales had been neglected by England. Poor Wales neglected by its Patron! I thought that Wales was part of England, and had the same spirit as the rest of the country; but he thought that England should show more sympathy for Wales. Mr. Gladstone has not always thought so, for he himself, a few years ago, proposed the disendowment of Aberystwith College. And that, my Lords, leads me to the second argument which has been used in defence of this Bill—namely, that the principle of public support for higher education has been admitted by the public grants to Colleges which have been made in Wales, in Scotland, and of course in Ireland. I maintain that public grants to national colleges are no precedent for public taxation for intermediate schools. These schools are local, and have no similar claim upon the national funds. Technical instruction also is special with regard to various kinds of trades, and public grants to national colleges are no precedent for providing out of public taxation instruction in particular trades, which the State cannot undertake generally and everywhere. But the danger is this: if we extend this system of grants to intermediate schools, and to giving technical instruction, what will become of the existing schools? Poor as Wales is, there are a good many middle-class schools all over Wales, and very good ones. What is to become of those schools if the State is to set up schools in competition with them? We know something of the competition of State-aided schools against the higher-class schools in England; its effect has been to starve a great many of them, because they have been unable to compete with the Treasury in affording the same kind of education which can be given in State-aided schools more cheaply. What is to become of those schools if this Bill passes? What is to become of the private munificence, which is now being shown much more readily from year to year for the purposes of intermediate and technical instruction, when this Bill passes for supplying it to Wales partly at the expense of the Treasury? Is it to be stopped? My Lords, it certainly will be stopped. I observed that in the Debate in Committee alarm on this point has been already taken by some. They said—

"We are afraid if this Bill passes that some of the efforts which are now being made by private munificence will cease, such as the grant recently made by one of the London Companies."

I think it was the Haberdashers' Company, which was alluded to. That is surely a dangerous thing. The best education from private sources would be stopped. We know already in England how State undertaking has checked the work of such men as Armstrong, Mather, Whitworth, and others who are doing the work infinitely better for the technical instruction required in various lines of art than anything the State can do. We Englishmen might, perhaps, consent to let this bad principle be introduced into Wales if it were to be confined to that part of the country; but we know perfectly well that the principle once adopted will spread, and that we shall have it introduced into England. In passing this Measure we shall be introducing the very thing we are trying to avoid. In the other House the first day of Committee was entirely consumed in urging that Monmouthshire should be included, and upon the second day of the Committee the Government gave way on that point, and consented that Monmouthshire should be included. Depend upon it, my Lords, Monmouthshire is the thin end of the wedge in introducing this principle from Wales into England. I do not think it possible, even if I wished it, to arrest the progress of this Bill. For various reasons it has been at last assented to after eight years of discussion in Parliament, from the date of the Report of Lord Aberdare's Committee, alluded to by the noble Lord the President of the Council, which by the-by expressly stated in its Report that these intermediary schools should precede the colleges. The colleges have made more rapid progress in Wales. They found there a most favourable soil for the growth of demands upon the Treasury of England. Mid-Wales having obtained the grant, the people of North Wales said they must have one too, and immediately South Wales said the same; and now there are three grants of £4,000 a year each for those three colleges, which Lord Aberdare's Committee said should certainly not precede the schools required to give the requisite preparatory education. Upon that there has been framed a Measure which seems to me to be a somewhat lax mode of acting upon the principles of that Report. I should have thought that the right kind of Bill would have been one which would, in the first place have relaxed and widened the too narrow endowments in Wales; and, secondly, have encouraged more endowments being made as in England for these purposes. Wales, moreover, comes upon England to assist her as if England had a surplusage of endowments; but the endowments of England for educational purposes are not equal to her own requirements at this moment. We look to those endowments as our chief private aid to supply the middle class education required. All the endowments in England for this purpose do not exceed £200,000 a year, a sum perfectly unequal to the requirements of the middle-class in England for intermediate education. We have to do for ourselves England, as distinguished from Wales, a great deal more than they are called upon to do. Depend upon it, the only thing to prevent mischief being done will be their doing what is wanted as it is effected in England, that is, by local self-support. I do not propose to arrest the progress of this Bill; but I desire that hereafter nobody shall be able to say the Measure was passed without a protest against Government support for intermediate and technical education, and without a most hearty outcry against the extension of that principle now to be introduced into Wales to the disadvantage of English education.

EARL SPENCER: My Lords, I shall presently say a word or two upon the arguments which have been put forward by my noble Friend who has just sat down; but before I come to those arguments I have, on the part of my noble Friend Lord Aberdare, who I am sorry should be absent from this Debate, to express the great regret he feels at his inability to be in his place to-night. My noble Friend has all through his life been a true friend of education, and has devoted great attention to this subject in Wales. He has especially done signal service there by the part he has taken with regard to intermediate education. I therefore deeply regret my noble Friend's absence, and the cause which prevents him from being in his place. I rejoice that this important subject has received so much attention during the present Session of Parliament, and that a Measure of intermediate education for Wales has safely passed through the difficulties which have hitherto overwhelmed it in another place. I sincerely trust, differing from my noble Friend who has just sat down, that the Bill will pass safely through your Lordships' House, and will become law. Now, my Lords, the Report of the Committee appointed in 1889 has been referred to, and I should like to say something upon it, as I was responsible for the appointment of that Committee. Since then a great deal has been done to promote higher education in Wales by University extension and attempts at assisting intermediate education. The noble Lord said the recommendation of Lord Aberdare's Committee was that intermediate education should have been extended before higher education was extended in that country. I am not sure, as I have not been able to refer to the passage in the Report, whether he was altogether correct in his statement; but they did lay stress on the necessity of an improved system of intermediate education in Wales, with the view of preparing young men for the higher education which has also been demanded in that country. The Government of which I was a member is responsible for making the aid given to University education in Wales precede any measure with regard to intermediate education. We did it for this reason, that we saw there would be very great advantages in carrying any measure for intermediate education through Parliament; and, on the other hand, we were able of our own motion to give grants to increase and improve University education in that country. My Lords, I think the course we took has been amply justified by the event. There certainly have been very considerable difficulties in dealing with this subject, and eight years have gone by without any measure having been carried with regard to intermediate education. First, as to the result of our action in recommending that grants should be made to several University colleges in Wales. They now amount, I think, to £12,000 a year, £4,000 a year being given to South Wales for a University college at Cardiff, £4,000 to North Wales for a University college at Bangor, and to Mid-Wales the grant to the University college at Aberystwith was at first £2,500, but it has now been increased to £4,000 for that college also. The result has been extremely satisfactory. When the Report of the Committee was made there were only in public University colleges in Wales 57 students. The average number of students at Aberystwith has been for the last three years 140; the average at Cardiff has been 126; and the average at the University college of Bangor 175. That, my Lords, is an eminently satisfactory result, and

I maintain it justifies the action which the Government of that day took in giving those grants towards University education in Wales before they dealt with intermediate education. There certainly is great need for the increase of intermediate education in Wales. The noble Lord the Lord President of the Council put forward one matter as an argument in favour of it, but I will add another which can be found in this very Report of Lord Aberdare's Committee. It is there stated that it has been calculated that to give proper intermediate education to the people in England there ought to be accommodation at, I think, the rate of 16 per 1,000 of the population. If that rate were applied to Wales, there ought to be accommodation for 15,700 pupils. But the accommodation in public intermediary schools in Wales really only amounts to something over 2,000, and the noble Lord the Lord President of the Council mentioned that, owing to various circumstances, the unsuitability of the education provided, and possibly the constitution of the Governing Body, not nearly that number are found in the places of intermediate education in Wales. I say, therefore, that that argument is a very strong one as to the necessity of supporting intermediate education in Wales. Now, I will come to another point which my noble Friend also referred to—namely, the fact that for the first time a proposal is made to give direct grants to intermediary schools. He objected to that, but I confess I do not agree with him, and certainly not with regard to Wales, where, I believe, it was absolutely essential that some assistance of this sort should be given. It may be said that up to the present time assistance has been given to intermediate education through the instrumentality of South Kensington, and the large payments which are made for science and art subjects through that portion of the Education Department. But those grants are entirely given for particular subjects. They indirectly help a school, but they do not directly help it, and they certainly would not start an intermediate school in a locality where an intermediate school is wanted. Now, the reasons why in Wales there is such a need for this Government grant are very plain. Wales, it may be said, is an exceedingly poor country in comparison with England. There are, no doubt, some districts where the minerals are very rich, but the large proportion of Wales is exceedingly poor when compared with England. Then the Welsh people are exceedingly anxious for education, but the public endowments for intermediate education and for all charitable purposes fall far below the endowments in England. I believe it has been computed—and I get this from the same source—that in England the average endowments for all charitable purposes, per county, amount to something like £55,575 per annum, whereas similar endowments in Wales, per county, amount to only £1,921. If we take the endowments in particular counties, of course they vary extremely. Some counties have much larger endowments than others, but whereas the most poorly-endowed county in England, Cornwall, has an endowment of over £4,000 a year, the large County of Glamorgan, with a population of something over half a million, has endowments only to the amount of £1,921. I hear that my noble Friend cheers that statement, and therefore I hope he will agree with me that the necessity for some additional endowment for intermediate education in Wales is conclusively shown by the figures which I have declared. My noble Friend said it was better to leave the endowment of intermediate education to the private munificence of individuals, but how is it that in Wales this private munificence has not created the endowments necessary for intermediate education? I think if there had been a large desire to do there what has been done in many parts of England—namely, to endow intermediate education, we should have seen much larger endowments in that country than now exist there. I therefore do not at all agree with my noble Friend that we ought to stay our hands and refuse to assist this poorer country in regard to intermediate education; for, from all I have seen and heard on the subject, I believe that if something is not done in the manner proposed to be adopted by this Bill, intermediate education will not thrive in Wales. My Lords, I do not wish to dwell at too great length on this subject, nor shall I go into the details of the Bill; but I should like to refer to one matter besides that to which my noble Friend has referred. I should like to mention one important clause in the Bill which deals with the initiation of schemes. That, to a certain extent, is a new method of dealing with charitable and educational endowments. Hitherto, it has been necessary either for the Governors of an institution to propose a scheme, or for the Charity Commissioners themselves in certain cases to do it. It was found that this, especially in Wales, prevented any new schemes being brought forward at all, and therefore it has been proposed in various ways to create some body, directed by popular opinion in the country, to start new schemes where new schemes are necessary. I think originally we proposed a different scheme to this. A different method for giving initiation to schemes was proposed by the Government of which I was a Member in the year 1885; but since that time a great change with regard to all Local Government has taken place owing to the great measure which was passed by Her Majesty's Government last year—namely, the measure which constituted County Councils throughout England. That gives at once a popular body which can deal with matters of this sort, and though I confess I should have preferred to have seen the initiation of schemes given also to these Councils, I think the compromise which has been arrived at between the Government and those who promoted this Bill is a wise one. Now that the County Councils are started, there is a body created which would be able to initiate any schemes, and also to reform some of the old endowments which have not the confidence of the country. Those two points—namely, that of granting direct assistance to the intermediate schools in Wales, and that of giving a new body, partly elected from the County Councils, power to initiate schemes, seem to me very important points to be dealt with, and I heartily rejoice to see them form part of this measure. My Lords, I shall not detain the House any longer, but I sincerely trust that the hopes which have been entertained in Wales with regard to the possibility of enjoying an enlarged system of intermediate education by a measure of this sort will not be disappointed, but that this measure will bear excellent fruit and will give the people of Wales what so much desire it an easy and efficient means of intermediate education for their children.

*EARL FORTESCUE: My Lords, I ask your kind indulgence while I offer a few remarks on this Bill, and I the more require your indulgence because I take the same view which my noble Friend did who answered the Lord President of the Council. I am afraid those views are not shared by very many of your Lordships. My noble Friend truly remarked that now for the first time Parliament is preparing formally to authorise the establishment and maintenance of schools for secondary or intermediate education by means of rates supplemented by grants from the Treasury, which are in no case to be more than equal to what is raised by the rates. As I expected, the principle of aid to education, above mere elementary education, by the State has, it has been urged, been recognised by the grants which have been made latterly to Welsh Universities. The noble Earl who has just spoken gave what he considered conclusive evidence of the value of those grants and of their good effect. I must say it seems to me a very different thing giving a grant to a University which the Welsh would certainly call national—at any rate it cannot be considered as less than provincial—in comparison with the establishment of a number of local intermediate schools supported by local rates. This is the first instance of the extension upwards (with the exception of those grants to the Universities) to the middle class of that system of public educational alms which was initiated as regards contributions by rates from one kind of property only, real property, less than 20 years ago, and which have been supplemented out of general taxation, the original grant, a very small one, £30,000, having been given just half a century ago. The injustice of levying so large a contribution or tax upon one kind of property alone (because ratepayers are none the less taxpayers) does not strike me as nearly so objectionable as the evil of impairing the independence of the middle class, and accustoming them to look to public grants and public aid from the rates as the wage classes have, as I have already pointed out, been accustomed to rely upon them of late years. And, secondly, there is the evil of discouraging—in fact, more than discouraging—of extinguishing, practically, all chance of voluntary gifts or bequests being made for educational endowment. Who does not lament that there has not been in Wales in past times more public spirit and educational zeal shown? Take the rich County of Glamorgan, with its wealth of minerals, and we shall see that Wales has no reason to be proud of that absence of educational endowments which we have just heard described. No one, after these contributions from rates and taxes have been established by Act of Parliament, would, as I say, be at all likely to give or bequeath anything for the purpose of educational endowment; and perhaps all the less, because confidence in the devotion of endowments to the purposes which were dear to those who have founded endowments has been very much shaken by some of the legislation which has taken place latterly. But besides those two evils, there seems to me to be a third, and a very serious one, that of subjecting the higher education of the country, at least the higher secondary education, as distinguished from the elementary, to bureaucratic control. For the first time we find the Education Department brought into official connection with secondary education. The tendency, I fear, will be to increase the applications for grants, and assistance from rates, and with these increased applications, if they are yielded to, will come a very natural, and I cannot say otherwise than a legitimate demand for control and interference on the part of the Government. I know that one ex-Minister of Education, Mr. Mundella, has avowed again and again his earnest desire to see the Education Department entrusted with considerable control over the secondary education of the country. Well, if the Education Department is armed with such greatly increased powers as he and some others desire for it, instead of looking to our great ancient Universities, we shall find those engaged in the secondary and higher education of the country looking to it for guidance and leading. It is quite true that the Universities for a long time were too stagnant and too obstructive; but now for some time they have been awakened to their responsibilities and duties; and now, though happily independent of State control, they are very much under the influence and guidance of the tide of enlightened public opinion, though fortunately uninfluenced by the mere passing waves of popular blame or applause. It would be in my view a very great misfortune if a Political Department were to supersede the great ancient Universities as our chief guides and leaders in the higher education of the country. But this may be considered, I think, as a step in that direction; my fears may not be all realised, but I would venture to predict that after a great show of advance in the first instance we should find stagnation and routine. I will give your Lordships an illustration. I do not know whether I have used it in your Lordships' House before, but I know I have used it elsewhere, of Brunel's famous block-machinery, which was much in advance of what was known up to that time, and of its continuing to be used and proudly shown by dockyard officials long after it had been superseded and replaced in all solvent establishments by newer and better, and more efficient machinery. I think, my Lords, the same thing would apply to education. And though, as regards really elementary—not what is called "advanced elementary education"—which that high authority, Bishop Temple, says ought to be called "non-elementary education"—such very great changes or advances in the methods of teaching are not likely to be required; anything more fatal to national progress and the development of the national intellect than stagnation or routine in the higher education of the country I can hardly conceive. That, I think, is too likely to be the consequence of the higher education of the country being entrusted to a Political Department. Then, my Lords, there is the further fear of jobbery; because though in the first instance the right man is anxiously sought to fill a new and important post, after a while it is not the man that is sought for the place, but the place that is sought for the man; and political results are often what are mainly looked to even now as they have been in a certain number of instances within my own lifetime. Under democratic Governments, and our own is one which tends to become more and more democratic, we do not find any diminution of jobbery and corruption. In the United States jobbery in political bodies and in administration is a by-word among the educated classes there. In France and Germany the people are weighed down by the heavy weight of taxation, a taxation not merely levied for the support of their gigantic armaments, but also to provide for needless placemen and jobbers in public works. It is this fine end of the wedge as my noble Friend has called it, this introduction of Government aid, and of State and rate aid, in dealing with secondary education that I confess alarms me. I do not mean at all that Her Majesty's Government or its opponents, except perhaps a few of them, are contemplating any such development of the principle involved in this Bill as I have described. I believe the history of it is very much more simple. We now find Wales putting forward a plea of poverty, The Welsh found the Irish putting forward claims on the ground of poverty, and getting, by a certain amount of lawlessness and by much clamour, a great part of their demands. Accordingly Wales sought also to get something from the Public Treasury. The Government, besides this object of advancing Welsh secondary education, has undertaken the task of conciliating Welsh feeling in emulation of their opponents who, it is notorious, attributed to the opposition of the Tory Party, a good deal of the delay of this measure, which, whatever it did for education, it was likely to cause a considerable amount of public money to be spent in Wales. But what we have had urged on behalf of this Bill, founded on grants to the Welsh Universities, shows how very readily precedents of this sort are followed. As my noble Friend said, it is in vain for us to resist this measure, supported, as it is, by Her Majesty's Government and by their predecessors, who had previously themselves brought in a measure very much of the same kind. All we can do is earnestly to protest against it, and to entreat the Government to reflect on the very serious consequences of the further development of the principles involved in this Bill.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: My Lords, as I believe no noble Lord intends to move the rejection of this Bill, or to give it really any serious opposition, and as I believe that all the noble Lords who have spoken agree that the Welsh people are much interested in the results which will flow from this measure, I think it is a great pity that such a Bill as this should pass, or should appear to pass, in this House in any grudging spirit. I think, as long as we are a United Kingdom, there can be no harm in the Government doing as my noble Friend has accused them of doing, for it was almost an accusation—that is to say, conciliating Welsh feeling in this matter. And there is no doubt, as the Lord President of the Council has said, that the circumstances of Wales in this matter are peculiar. My Lords, I have every sympathy with the opinion expressed by the noble Lord who began this discussion, that we are very apt to adopt new principles in incidental Bills, which may afterwards have a wider application. But I am afraid that is the whole history of English legislation. The English people do not go in for grand principles all at once—they go step by step. That has been the whole history of our Constitution. Still, when I look at this Bill which it is said embodies a principle now for the first time introduced, I am not struck with the great dangers which are involved by it, as my noble Friend has urged, or with the mischievous tendencies as he has pointed out of the new principle embodied in this Bill. He says it is a new thing, absolutely new, for the State to give public money for intermediate education. My first question is what is meant by intermediate education? Is it possible to draw any clear line of distinction between the elementary education below, and the superior education above? Where does elementary education end? The Government has given State money both for the lower education, and for the higher education. But our whole system is one in which primary education is mixed with intermediate education. I may recall that under the old parochial system of Scotland it was quite common for boys to go high up in Latin, Greek, or mathematics for a very small addition to their fees. Those primary schools in Scotland were endowed by the State, and the Universities were also endowed by the State. By a Bill which is now in your Lordships' House a further sum of £41,000 a year is to be given to higher education in Scotland in its Universities. Now, my Lords, I ask what is the abstract basis of a principle which attempts to draw the line between primary education on the one hand, and superior education on the other, and distinguishing intermediate education for the middle classes. If your Lordships look at this Bill you will see that practically no line is drawn except to exclude schools which teach nothing but the three R's. It provides that—

“The expression intermediate education means a course of education which does not consist chiefly of elementary instruction in reading, writing and arithmetic, but which includes instruction in Latin, Greek, the Welsh and English language, and literature, modern languages, mathematics natural, and applied science, or in some of such studies, and generally in the higher branches of knowledge, but nothing in this Act shall prevent the establishment of scholarships in higher or other elementary schools.”

No line is attempted to be drawn there, and I hold it is impossible to draw a line between these different kinds of education. My Lords, this Bill is needed for Wales; it is adapted to Welsh circumstances, whether they have or not the original endowments which we possess, and I see no reason not only why we should decline to assent to this Bill, but why we should not assent to it heartily and willingly.

LORD KENSINGTON: My Lords, I should be very loth that this Bill should be read a second time without taking the opportunity to say I deeply regret that the noble Lord who spoke from behind the Government Benches should have thought it his duty to make the strong attack which he did upon the Nonconformists of Wales. I think it is a very great pity for any sectarian quarrels in any shape or form to be introduced in discussing a measure of this kind, which has been demanded for years in Wales by Nonconformists and Churchmen alike. I will not follow the noble Lord into that matter in any shape or way. I merely wish to say that I think he was mistaken in the view he propounded to your Lordships that grants from the State in aid of these intermediate schools would have the effect of stopping private enterprise in such undertakings. Has the past shown that such is the case? As soon as the Government gave grants to the Colleges of Bangor, Cardiff, and

It seems to me a strong matter that, on a question of finance, upon which, as I pointed out, the Sheriff may have no knowledge, he should be the absolute arbiter between what I am afraid in some cases may be two opposing parties. I think, therefore, there is a great deal to be said against the Sheriff voting on measures of finance; but, at the same time, my Lords, I venture to think that the manner in which the noble Earl proposes to carry out this proposition is not a very convenient one, and it is not a very convenient thing that one member of a Committee should be restricted, and he alone, as to the subjects with which he is to deal. I do not know that I should be prepared, therefore, to support the noble Earl in that particular Amendment; but I think it does show that the position of the Sheriff on the Finance Committee is a very inconvenient one.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: I very much agree with the general tone of the observations of my noble Friend who has just sat down. The Sheriff is not a ratepayer necessarily on the one hand, and on the other hand it would, I think, be invidious in the form now proposed to exclude him from voting on the Committee of which he is a member. I do not agree with the noble Marquess in the suggestion that the Sheriffs have no knowledge in these votes. I think they have. They are in communication with all parties in the county, and they have by virtue of their office and position a judicial and impartial mind. Speaking generally of the gentlemen who occupy the position of Sheriffs, I feel sure that they are well qualified and I should always be very glad to have their opinions even on questions connected with expenditure. I hope, therefore, the Amendment will not be pressed.

LORD NAPIER AND ETTRICK: I would submit to the noble Duke that it is not a question of giving an opinion merely. Let the Sheriff retain his seat. He would be at liberty to give his opinion, he would be there as a member though not as a voter. Up to the present time the Sheriff has been a member of the Commissioners of Supply; he sits there as I have often seen him. He is frequently referred to there by the members of the Commissioners' body, but I think he abstains a great deal from voting. He is a Consultative officer and he does not vote. When there is the least suspicion of any question of his being afterwards called upon to act in his judicial capacity he does not vote, and I do not think practically he would vote, at least in my county, on money questions.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: I sincerely hope this Amendment will not be agreed to, because this seems to me to be a very valuable provision. I think the noble Lord is mistaken if he supposes that the Sheriff is not there acting with the Commissioners of Supply with as full powers as the rest. It is certainly not my experience that if present he abstains from voting. But if the suggestion were carried out to make him merely a Consultative member and not to vote, the Sheriff would go away if he could not back up his opinion by his vote. I venture to think in the great majority of cases, if there is to be any serious conflict between the Commissioners of Supply, the Members of the Committee, and the Electoral Members, which I certainly hope will not be the case, that to have gentlemen of this description—these judicially minded persons—on the Committee would be a most valuable thing, and though the Sheriff might not, if he felt there was a pinch, record his vote, still I venture to think he would give his vote upon broad general grounds, and really I have every confidence that if it comes to contests, which I hope it will not as I have said before, between the County Councillors and the Commissioners of Supply, you could not put the decision of any questions which may come before the Committee in safer or better hands than those of the Sheriff or his substitute. I hope, therefore, the clause will be adhered to.

THE MARQUESS OF LOTHIAN: The noble Lord (Lord Elgin) talked of the opinion I expressed upon this matter; but I think he was mistaken in what he said. What I recollect to have said was that it was not incumbent either upon the Commissioners of Supply or the County Councillors to appoint the full number of seven. If the noble Lord will look at the clause it says, "such number not exceeding seven." That shows that the numbers need not come up to seven. It also states that six shall form a quo-

The Earl of Elgin

£300 a year. This went on for 22 years. Far from being alarmed in those days at the number of persons who were qualified to take part, though they frequently did not all do so, in the County Government, in the year 1854 the numbers of those persons were very largely extended. The qualification of Commissioners of Supply up to the year 1854 was the possession, as I have mentioned before, of lands or heritages of the value of £300 a year. At that time, by a Valuation Bill applying to Scotland, the qualification was lowered to £100 a year, and so I believe it remains at the present time. There are many reasons why it is not desirable to limit the number of these County Councils. I cannot understand the alarm which seems to be felt by the Government in so narrowly limiting their number. It is very undesirable, I think, that you should prevent people, who have a right to take part in County Government, participating in it. I am not acquainted practically with more than one or two counties, but I am perfectly certain that I have never seen the least inconvenience arise from the fact of the numbers of the Commissioners, though they are considerable, being so large as they are. I think as regards counties you should consider that you have to take your members for the counties from long distances, and that it is sometimes extremely inconvenient for them to attend; and it is on that ground inconvenient, I think, to limit the number of persons who might devote themselves to the business of County Government. Then you may often have a difficulty in finding persons to do Committee work, and sometimes difficulties may even be experienced in finding a quorum. Those occasionally are matters of difficulty, and the result is that persons in the immediate vicinity of the town are more called upon to act, and that those who live at a greater distance do not take the part which it is desirable that they should do in carrying on the work of County Government. I wish to show, my Lords, how very large and serious the reduction of numbers is according to the scheme under this Bill. It is very possible that persons who are connected with the large and populous counties may have an experience different from mine, but I wish merely to show how great the change is in point of numbers under this Bill. I will go to the largest county, though I admit it is scarcely a fair test, as it is quite an exceptional county, and that is Lanarkshire. The number of Commissioners of Supply there is 674. The proposal under this Bill is that the Councillors shall be 90 in number. According to my proposal, which is that one representative should be added to the Council for each parish within the county, that would add 40 more members to the County Council, and even adding that number would only bring such a county as Lanarkshire up to the total of 130 instead of the 674 persons who are at present privileged to take part in the County Government. Then in the other counties the same contrast prevails. In Ayrshire there are 310 Commissioners of Supply, and the proposal under this Bill is that the Council shall be only 52 in number henceforth. I would, by my proposal, add 40 representatives of parishes, and that would bring up the total to nearly 100. I maintain that nearly 100 Commissioners for so large a county as Ayr is not too numerous. It is, in fact, a very small number to appoint. I will not go through all the other counties, but I may mention that in the county of Perth there are 263 Commissioners of Supply, and the proposed number of Councillors for that county is 50. Fife has 242 Commissioners of Supply, and the proposed number of Councillors is 60, and so on in the same rate of proportion. I think your Lordships will agree that that is a very large diminution indeed. Then for the less populous parts in the South-East of Scotland, in which I am more interested personally, and which I have greater knowledge of than other parts, the county of Berwick has 92 Commissioners of Supply, and it is only henceforth to have 34 County Councillors. If my proposition were accepted, 32 more would be appointed, making 66 in all. Then the county of Roxburgh has 155 Commissioners of Supply, and the number of Commissioners will be 36. So that you are to choke off two-thirds of those who have already had the duty of attending to this county business, and unless there is some very good reason for such a large diminution I venture to think that the proposal which I make to increase their numbers is a very desirable one, and accordingly I move the Amendment which stands in my name.

Amendment proposed, page 1, line 16, to leave out "the Councillors of."—
(The Earl of Minto.)

THE SECRETARY FOR SCOTLAND (The Marquess of LOTHIAN): My Lords, I have listened with the greatest interest to the remarks of the noble Earl in moving his Amendment, but I am bound to say that all he has stated might, it seems to me, have been much better said on the Second Reading of the Bill, because the whole of his proposal would go directly against the principles of the Bill as it has passed the House of Commons and in this House the other evening. The whole principle of the Bill is that the counties of Scotland should be divided into single electoral divisions, and that each one of them should return a single member. The noble Lord's first remark was that there would not be sufficient variety under the proposals contained in the Bill. I do not know that the proposal of the noble Earl—namely, that in every single district there should be members from the Parochial Boards, that is to say, from every parish, would introduce variety. I think no variety would be added by that; and not only do I think so, but I think that under the proposals of the Bill there will be sufficient provision for variety in the representation on the Councils. I do not think, therefore, that the proposal of the noble Earl would have any beneficial effect. Then the noble Earl objects also to the reduction in the numbers of the County Councils. As I said just now, the whole principle of the Bill is not directly to reduce the number of those who would have to administer County business, but, as a matter of fact, the principle and object of the Bill is to transfer the powers at present exercised by existing to new bodies, and I think the figures given by the noble Earl himself go rather to show that the proposals in the Bill will have rather a beneficial effect. He stated that in the county of Lanarkshire there are 674 Commissioners of Supply. Now, the House of Commons consists of only 670 Members, and does the noble Earl really mean to say that to administer the county business of Lanarkshire requires as many representatives as to administer the entire business of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland? I think in the County of Lanarkshire, at any rate, it is very desirable that the business of the county should be administered by a smaller body than now exists, and, as I have indicated before, I am quite unable to accept the proposal of the noble Earl. It would be quite contrary to the spirit of the Bill, and it would entirely upset the constitution of the County Councils; because, if that were carried out, the leading members or some of the most important members of them would be those not selected by the county, which is the intention of the Bill, but those selected by the parochial bodies. As I have said, that would be entirely contrary to the principle of the Bill, and on those grounds I am afraid I am unable to accept the proposal of the noble Earl.

THE EARL OF MINTO: I may remind the noble Marquess that on the Second Reading of the Bill I took occasion to pronounce a strong eulogium on the manner in which the present system has been worked in Scotland, and that system was one by which much larger numbers were qualified to take part in the county business than actually did take part in it. The tendency of that was that the persons who did participate and give their time to the business of the county, did their work well and efficiently, though the great majority of the 674 were absent. The great majority of the Commissioners of Supply in Lanarkshire stayed away, but others did the work exceedingly well. I have the noble Marquess's own voucher in support of that statement.

Amendment negatived.

LORD NAPIER AND ETTRICK: My Lords, in moving the Amendment which stands in my name, I have only to point out that the principle adopted by Her Majesty's Government in framing this Bill, is that there shall be one Member for each electoral division. I think, in this respect, it may be regretted that there is the disadvantage attached to this system, as it appears to me, that in Scotland, at least, it will make a contest, in the first instance, almost inevitable in every place, and if you had larger electoral divisions each represented by two members, a door would be opened to conciliation and compromise between different parties and different persons representing different interests, and I think that there would be very likely, in some cases, at least, a harmonious agreement to elect representatives to represent the different interests. At the present moment there will be certainly a greater number of contests under this system as proposed by Her Majesty's Government. Contests are to be regretted in themselves, they are a positive evil, first, inasmuch as they will be productive of a considerable amount of expenditure, and secondly, because they will leave animosities and misunderstandings behind them. But in addition to this, I agree with my noble Friend behind me that the result of the various contests of this nature in Scotland will very possibly be the election of persons of a very inferior character. In these small electoral divisions contemplated by this Bill in Scotland there will probably be in numerous cases—in almost every case—a majority, sometimes perhaps a small majority, but still a majority, of a single complexion. I think it likely that the result in many cases will be the election of a uniform class of persons in whom there will be a very inadequate representation both of Conservative feeling and of proprietary interest. My Lords, I do not wish to embark on the perilous course of political prediction, in which persons of much better judgment than myself are apt to be confuted by the event, and I trust the results of the present measure may be better than those which I anticipate from the want of variety in the character of the persons elected. But, at any rate, the Amendment which I have placed upon the Paper does not contemplate any radical alteration of the principle which has been adopted by Her Majesty's Government. I do not attack the general principle here of one Member for each electoral division. My Amendment contemplates conferring a discretionary power upon the Secretary for Scotland to meet a difficulty which I am afraid will be found in framing these electoral divisions. I think there are small counties in Scotland in which the persons charged with the duty of framing the electoral divisions will not find it possible to so constitute a sufficient number of those electoral divisions if they are properly constituted as to give a sufficient number of persons to form an efficient County Council. I instance, as examples of those small counties, the County of Selkirk, the County of Peebles, the County of Nairn, the County of Kinross, the County of Bute, and some others. I will take the County of Selkirk as an example with which I am more particularly familiar, as I am connected both by birth and property with that county. My Lords, I understand it is the intention of the Secretary for Scotland to adopt 20 as the minimum number of members of the County Council. Let us see how that principle will be applied to the County of Selkirk. The noble Marquess proposes, I believe, to have 12 electoral divisions in the county, and he intends to add to those, eight delegates from a single Royal and Parliamentary burgh in order to complete this minimum number of 20. Now what is the constituency in the County of Selkirk? There will be approximately 759 voters who are to select 12 County Councillors. Divide 756 by 12 and you will find there will be only 63 electors for each electoral district, a very inadequate number as it seems to me. But I would ask the noble Marquess to consider this. The complement of 20 in the County of Selkirk is filled by sanctioning eight representatives from a single Parliamentary burgh, and that Parliamentary burgh at this moment has less than 7,000 inhabitants. But my Lords in a very short time, probably before two years have elapsed, the Burgh of Selkirk will have more than 7,000 inhabitants, and then that burgh will have a claim—I do not know whether that would be so absolutely, but certainly an equitable claim—to be withdrawn from the county and to become a perfect municipality by itself in all respects. The eight representatives must therefore be struck out of the County Council, and then how will the noble Marquess get eight representatives to make up the 20 from the County? He will have to divide this little thinly populated county into 20 electoral districts, and in that case each representative will be elected by 38 persons! Now I think that is really reducing matters to an absurdity, and the same result will, more or less, be discovered in other counties. I do not think I need go into particulars on the subject. My proposal is to give to the Secretary for Scotland a discretionary power of sanctioning the election of two representatives for one electoral division when he finds that properly-constituted electoral divisions cannot be formed and that the proper number of competent Councillors cannot be elected upon that system. The power given to the Secretary of State is simply a discretionary power only to be used in case of necessity. I beg, my Lords, to move the Amendment which stands in my name.

"In case, however, the Secretary for Scotland should be satisfied, after due inquiry, that under the foregoing provision, in consequence of exceptional conditions affecting any county, a sufficient number of County Councillors for the efficient transaction of business would not be obtainable, it shall be competent for the Secretary for Scotland to direct the election of two County Councillors for each electoral division in that county."—(The Lord Ettrick [Lord Napier].)

*LORD WATSON: My Lords, I should have thought that there was a great deal to be said in support of the Amendment of the noble Lord if this Bill had not already made provision against the evil which he anticipates. He fears, apparently, an absorption in course of time of part of the county constituency in burghs. If that should be the case it would be competent for the Secretary for Scotland at once to double the number of the County Council by directing that two County Councillors should be elected for each division instead of one. My Lords, the 50th section of the Bill provides that "On the representation of a County Council"—which I apprehend will be the first to experience the want of members—

"or of a Town Council the Secretary for Scotland may at any time, after the expiry of the powers of the Boundary Commissioners, by order provide for all or any of the following things :"—

I need hardly read them all, but the first Sub-section (a) is—

"For altering the number of County Councillors, the number, contents, and boundaries of electoral divisions, and the assignment of Councillors to counties and burghs."

It appears to me that these provisions are amply calculated to meet the evil which is anticipated should it ever exist, and that it gives a discretion of a much more unlimited kind than the noble

Lord Napier and Ettrick

Lord proposes, because it does not direct that the Council shall be at once doubled, but that such number of members shall be added to it as shall be necessary to make it an efficient body.

LORD NAPIER AND ETTRICK: As I read it, this clause does not authorise the election of more than two representatives for each electoral area.

*LORD WATSON: That is so, but that it seems to me is not an unqualified evil. Power is given to deal with electoral divisions as well as with the number of representatives.

LORD NAPIER AND ETTRICK: Then you will reduce the constituency to so small a number that there will be a representation for 10, 20 or 30 electors; so that you will produce this inevitable result that in the County of Selkirk there would be a representative for 38 persons. It seems to me that would be a ridiculous result, and I would ask whether it would not be better to have more representatives for a larger area than a single representative for so small an area.

THE MARQUESS OF LOTHIAN: My Lords, there is, no doubt, a great deal to be said in regard to the force of some of the remarks of the noble Lord opposite. But at the same time, I must point out that in introducing his remarks he at once traverses the principle of the Bill that there should be one representative for the area. That is the principle which he objects to having enforced.

LORD NAPIER AND ETTRICK: In exceptional cases.

THE MARQUESS OF LOTHIAN: In a Bill of this kind it is undesirable to have exceptional cases, and I think it is very much that the principle of the Bill should be carried out throughout from beginning to end. With regard to the county of Selkirk, of which the noble Lord has spoken, he is perfectly right in saying that 20 would be the minimum number of Councillors, but, at the same time, I have pointed out that there is nothing final in that number, and that the Secretary for Scotland has power to increase or decrease those numbers to whatever may be thought desirable in the interest of any County Council. If it turns out that the representatives for the County of Selkirk are too small in number, it is quite in his recommendation of the Commissioners of Supply of the county with which I am connected. I doubt not that those evils are fully recognised by the noble Marquess, who has become well acquainted with the condition of the Highland districts by recent inquiry, and who is familiar with the wants of the Border Districts by the ties of birth, property, and hereditary association. The noble Marquess may contend that the instrumentality of the agency which I recommend on this occasion is not the right remedy, and I therefore ask your Lordships to put to yourselves the question what are the alternatives before us. If the districts, which are now without telegraphic and telephonic communication, are to be furnished with those facilities which are so necessary in modern life, it must be either by voluntary combination on the part of the people, or by the action of the Government, or by the action of some Local Authority, acting in co-operation with individuals, and with the Government. I wish I could believe that those disadvantages and disabilities affecting extensive portions of the country are likely to be remedied by simple spontaneous action. I think that action must either be on the part of the proprietors, or the tenants, or it may be both. As far as I have been able to ascertain, we cannot expect to obtain a general facility or remedy of this character from the proprietors. In some cases, no doubt, an opulent proprietor, or a rich shooting tenant, may of his own motion, or for his own purposes, obtain telegraphic communication either by paying down a round sum to Government, or by engaging his property or his credit for a certain number of years. But so far as I have been able to ascertain much is not to be hoped from the proprietors. In the district to which I have referred, many of the proprietors are not resident, that are not therefore keenly alive to the necessities of the case. In others, the proprietors are suffering from great pecuniary disabilities and discouragements, and they are either unwilling or unable to subscribe, and even those who would be able or willing to subscribe to such a purpose, cannot join in such contracts, as they would be unable to transmit them to their heirs and successors. The proprietors cannot form an incorporated body which would be able to make engagements, and undertake contracts with the Postmaster General, or with the companies which are concerned in these constructions. With regard to the tenants, the case is even worse, because the position of the tenantry is at this moment so precarious and transitory in some parts of Scotland that one could not expect they would pledge their credit or their property for any prolonged period. Now it may be said that the duty should be undertaken by the Government. Government has not remained, I am glad to say, insensible to the claims of the Highland districts in this matter, but I do not think it would be possible to expect that Government should supply this want entirely at their own risk. The Government I think would do well to come to the assistance of localities which cannot help themselves. They would do well to incur some temporary loss if necessary, but they could not be expected to do everything. Their action would be facilitated no doubt if some co-operation were afforded to them on the part of the County Councils. There should be, in fact, some local agency which would have power to enter into contracts and engagements with the Postmaster General, to afford guarantees, it may be, against loss, to raise a rate or to have the power of raising loans, though I think that would not be necessary for this purpose. If this power were once conferred upon a recognised authority the rest would be easy. It may be urged that in principle it would be unjust for the Local Authority to tax the whole area of the country for the benefit of the more distant and the less favoured portions of it. I admit it would be necessary, perhaps, if the Council undertook this duty, that they should undergo some partial loss and some burden for a short period. I contend, however, that the burden put upon the ratepayers would not be an excessive one. I do not think too much is to be expected from voluntary agencies in the way of entering into direct contracts with the Government for the execution of such works; but I do think if the County Councils were empowered to enter into such contracts, the execution of those works within the county might be carried out much more economically than would be the case if the works were as the Road Trustees, who represent tenant farmers as well as owners. Again, I may take such an authority as the Local Authority with regard to the administration of the Cattle Diseases Acts. I hope the noble Lord will listen to any representations which may be made by any public bodies of the sort; because, after all, we have only one object in view now that we are giving a largely increased popular representation in this matter of county government—we want the Bill to be such as will satisfy the country, and I would point out that, while it is perfectly true that the numbers of the County Councils might be made too large, yet, on the other hand, if we make them too small, as is proposed by this paper, I am confident we should have a number of most unnecessary and objectionable contests. I think that is a very important point indeed, because in the counties of Scotland we have a number of men who have been in the habit of attending to county business, and have distinguished themselves in that Department, such as the business of the Road Trustees, and other business of local importance of a similar character; and it is most important, I think, that those men should be on the new Councils. It is most important they should not be opposed, if possible, but if we restrict the number of seats there will be a great many persons who, for the first time, will see a chance of getting on the Councils, and who will come forward not caring whom they supplant. The result will be a large number of contests, and in many cases possibly, the election of most undesirable County Councillors who ought not to have obtained seats. I have thrown out these remarks for the purpose of inducing the noble Lord to consider this matter, and to consider whether he is not putting the limit of numbers too low. I think it would give general satisfaction in Scotland if he found himself able to say that if representations are made to him by public bodies or by individuals such as I have suggested he will give them consideration.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: Before my noble Friend answers, I should like merely to say this. I have not studied very closely the Paper which he has laid on the Table of the House, and which is to be obtained in the Vote Office, but

I believe it gives a résumé of the intended numbers for the counties. I would earnestly suggest that the noble Marquess should not be in too great haste to fix the numbers, but that he should hold himself open to listen to recommendations from the various counties, public bodies and persons interested. We must remember that the whole of this is an experiment. We have had a stereotyped system in Scotland which has worked admirably. We were not there as regards County Government in the same position as they were in England. We were not in a state of chaos. Our County Government powers were not scattered among half-a-dozen different bodies. Undoubtedly this system is somewhat of an experiment. I confess I do not quite sympathise with my noble Friend, Lord Minto, who seemed to wish to have the numbers of these bodies increased, so that they would be almost like great Local Parliaments. He mentioned the case of the County of Lanarkshire, which, under the existing system, has between 600 and 700 Commissioners of Supply, but I should like to know from him, whether he can give the House any information as to the numbers of those Commissioners of Supply who have really attended to the county business. I apprehend that a very small number of those 600 or 700 Commissioners of Supply have ever attended or given their attention to the business of the administration of the county. I may say that I am acquainted with what goes on in one of the largest counties in Scotland—namely, Argyll. We have there a very large number of Commissioners of Supply, but I know that the business of the county has been conducted by very few of them. I do not think I ever saw more than 40 members assembled at Inverary to conduct the county business, and generally the business was conducted by about 30 to 35 gentlemen. And why did not the others attend? Simply because they had perfect confidence in those who did attend. But I am afraid that confidence will not be given in the new Councils at first. Undoubtedly it is an experiment. There is, I think, a good deal to be said upon the suggestion of my noble Friend that as such large powers are given to the Secretary of State he should add to the districts, and not cut up the counties into districts as proposed. But in many cases that would be ridiculous. I will take Selkirk as an instance. A large part of the County of Selkirk is purely pastoral. It is a mountainous district. People talk of the Highlands as being cleared of population, but in that respect they do not compare with Selkirk. My noble Friend himself has not a single crofter on his property in that county. The whole county is divided out in large farms, and it would be impossible for it to be cut up into smaller divisions. I do, therefore, urge very strongly that the noble Marquess should not be in a hurry to make up his mind conclusively on the question how many Councillors should be appointed, and how many divisions there should be for each of the Scotch counties.

LORD NAPIER AND ETTRICK: In Selkirk the work is usually done by some 50 or 60 Commissioners of Supply; but when a vacancy has to be filled up a large number of them attend.

THE EARL OF ELGIN: My Lords, I should like to say one word with regard to the County of Fife, with which I am intimately connected, because I see the number of Councillors put down by the noble Marquess for Fife is 60, which I quite admit is large enough for a County Council. I do not agree with the noble Earl in wishing to see these Councils composed of very large numbers. But what I should like to point out to the noble Marquess is this—that of these 60, 44 only represent the county itself, 16 being representatives of Royal and Parliamentary burghs. I will point out to the noble Marquess that there is a portion of these bodies—namely, the District Councils, on which the parochial representatives are to sit. When you come to that part of the Bill you will find that in the County of Fife we shall have considerably fewer representatives than those from the parochial bodies. Under those circumstances, we shall find that what was intended to be the superior body—namely, the County Council, will be in a difficult position as regards their relation to the District Council. I mention this matter to the noble Marquess for his consideration. In the County of Fife there are 63 parishes; therefore, the whole 60 members whom he has allotted to it would not give one representative each to the parochial bodies. I think it might be well to consider before the number is absolutely fixed whether that number should be increased or not.

THE EARL OF MINTO: With regard to what the noble Duke has said, I think he rather misapprehended my Amendment. I stated that Lanarkshire is an exceptional county, and that there are at present 674 Commissioners of Supply in that county; but even if the proposal I make were adopted, that every parish in the county should send from its Board one representative, in that very large county that would only amount to 130 persons. Now, I do not think 130 representatives are too numerous for such a county as Lanarkshire.

THE MARQUESS OF LOTHIAN: My Lords, the main object, as I understand, of the observations of the noble Lord, is that in many instances the number of the County Councillors would be too few as compared with the number of Commissioners of Supply. That point really arises upon the principle proposed by the Bill; but that proposal and principle not only affect Scotland but England. The Local Government scheme for England of last year had exactly the same effect; the number of Councillors now is not at all equal to what the number of Magistrates had been under the previous system. In answer to the appeal of the noble Earl and the noble Duke, I would merely say that this proposal which I have laid on the Table of the House is purely a provisional one. So far as the observation of the noble Duke goes, as he has anticipated, I have taken the opinion of those who are really responsible for the government of the counties in the matter; but, at the same time, as I have said, the proposal is purely provisional, and I should be glad if, as has been suggested by the noble Earl, the Commissioners of Supply or other bodies or individuals would send the Government their views as to what they consider the proper number for constituting the Councils. I may say that the principle on which I went in drawing the provisional plans now before your Lordships was this. First I took the number of parishes in the county, and having ascertained the number of the parishes I proposed to give one representative to each parish. Having then taken the population of the parishes into consideration I proposed, as nearly as possible, to give a proportionate representation to the burghs which sent representatives. That was the general basis upon which I proceeded in accordance with the views of the counties themselves. As the noble Earl has stated, the number of representatives from the County of Fife does not quite coincide with the number of parishes, and this affords an example of a case in which, on the representations of those locally interested, I have made a variation in the original proposal.

LORD HERSCHELL: My Lords, as the noble Marquess has referred to the case of England, I should like to say a few words with regard to the county representation here. I was in several of the English counties last autumn, and I found considerable dissatisfaction existing with regard to the number of County Councillors. It was thought they were fixed too low. It may be that the people in the counties have since become reconciled to the smaller numbers, but I think it would be worth while if the noble Marquess would ascertain what has been the expression of feeling generally upon that point.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of SALISBURY): I cannot entirely join with the noble Lord in that view. My impression is that the feeling he has referred to will become very materially modified after the first meetings of the Councils have been held. It is a very different thing wishing to become a member of a large body, and afterwards finding that the room is, perhaps, too small for their accommodation. I think that might be found to be the case, and that prudence would cause them to deprecate any increase in their numbers.

Clauses 6 and 7 agreed to.

Clause 8.

THE EARL OF MINTO: Before Clause 8 is finally disposed of, I should like to hear from the noble Marquess generally what his views are as to the destiny of that class of burghs which are contemplated by this clause. Burghs having more than 7,000 inhabitants at this moment are endowed with the whole constitution and privileges of independent communities; but burghs having at the present moment less than 7,000 inhabitants are incorporated, and perhaps wisely, for certain purposes with the counties in which they are situated, retaining, however, their independent Town Councils for their internal and domestic affairs. Some of the burghs in Scotland having more than 7,000 inhabitants are comparatively stagnant or reactionary burghs, places which have, in fact, no distinctive industrial character, and which are not in a state of progress; but some of those burghs which have very nearly 7,000 inhabitants are burghs which are extremely active and progressive, and their populations are increasing very rapidly; and I would like to know from the noble Marquess what is to become of them when they shall have more than 7,000 inhabitants. Why are they not to have all the privileges which are accorded to burghs of 7,000 inhabitants at the present moment? Supposing a burgh having only 7,000 or less than 7,000 inhabitants acquires in two or three years' time a population of 8,000, 9,000, or 10,000 inhabitants, with every indication of progress in population and constitution. Are they not to have the power of acquiring the independence and the status accorded to other burghs which would then in those respects be inferior to them? The noble Marquess has under Clause 50, as Secretary for Scotland, very large powers of altering and of giving new limits to co-institutions; but I would ask ought not the burghs themselves to have some claim to a more perfect constitution? Does he intend to keep these burghs of more than 7,000 inhabitants as part of the counties in future?

THE MARQUESS OF LOTHIAN: The question raised by the noble Lord is very wide one. As the Bill stands there is no power to do what he suggests, namely, to give to burghs of less than 7,000 inhabitants, but which are likely to increase in population, additional powers so as to put them in the position at present of Royal burghs of above 7,000 inhabitants. I presume the noble Lord is referring only to the Royal burghs?

THE EARL OF MINTO: Yes, to the Royal burghs.

THE MARQUESS OF LOTHIAN: Then I would point out that 7,000 is the number which has been fixed by the Bill in consequence of a recommendation tion of a Committee of the House of Commons in regard to the Burgh and Police (Scotland) Bill of last year. They fixed 7,000 as the number under which it was desirable that boroughs should not have their police management. At the same time 7,000 is a very low number, and while that number has been adopted as regards existing burghs, I think there is no reason why the numbers should be altered even if the population increases. In England the number where the burghs have their own police management is fixed at 25,000. However, that is the provision in the Bill, and there is no power to make any alteration in it at present. Of course, if any burghs should increase in wealth and population so far as to make it desirable that there should be a change made with regard to having the control of their own affairs, there is no reason whatever why a Bill should not be brought into Parliament for that purpose.

THE EARL OF MINTO: It would require a special Act.

THE MARQUESS OF LOTHIAN: No doubt it would require a special Act.

LORD HAMILTON: The noble Lord has said, as I understand, that this Bill refers only to Royal burghs.

THE MARQUESS OF LOTHIAN: To Royal and Parliamentary burghs.

LORD HAMILTON: Then I would point out that he has just put an Amendment into the Bill which uses the words "any burgh." He does not say "any Royal burgh." I merely want to know whether that is a mistake or not.

THE MARQUESS OF LOTHIAN: It is meant to refer to Royal Burghs in that clause, not to Police Burghs.

LORD HAMILTON: Then I do not understand why the word "Royal" is not used here.

*LORD BALFOUR: There are a certain number of burghs which are not Royal burghs, but are Parliamentary, and under this Amendment they are put under the same category.

THE MARQUESS OF LOTHIAN: That is so. The Royal and Parliamentary burghs are put in the same category.

Clauses 9 and 10 agreed to.

Clause 11.

LORD HAMILTON: On this clause the Amendment which has been put down by me on the Paper is with regard to the levying Income Tax. It is, to insert the words—

"And provided that nothing in this Act contained shall affect the powers and duties of the Commissioners of Supply with respect to the appointment of Commissioners for general purposes under the Property and Income Tax Acts, the assessing and levying of the Land Tax, and the division and allocation of old valued rent."

We have a very good system for that purpose in Scotland, which works well and economically, and I am told that, without some Amendment in this Bill, that system will be upset. I am also told that, unless some means are taken for filling up the Returns to the Income Tax Commissioners, we shall be in the happy position in Scotland of not paying Income Tax at all.

Amendment proposed, in page 4, line 26, after ("mentioned") insert—

("And provided that nothing in this Act contained shall affect the powers and duties of the Commissioners of Supply with respect to the appointment of Commissioners for general purposes under the Property and Income Tax Acts, the assessing and levying of the Land Tax, and the division and allocation of old valued rent.")—(The Lord Hamilton of Dalzell.)

THE MARQUESS OF LOTHIAN: I think what the noble and learned Lord has stated answers the objection. Under the Bill the body of Commissioners of Supply is kept up for one purpose only, namely, that of electing members to the Council and this would give them other powers not contemplated by the Bill. The noble and learned Lord has pointed out that the powers and duties are transferred under section 101, and therefore the fears expressed as to the non-payment of Income Tax will not be verified.

Amendment (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 12.

THE EARL OF ELGIN: My Lords, on Clause 12 I confess I should almost have preferred to take exception to that clause altogether, because it appears to me to be one of the blots remaining on the Bill. But this matter was discussed in another place, and the Government seem so determined to stand by the arrangement that I think it scarcely worth while to move an Amendment for

It seems to me a strong matter that, on a question of finance, upon which, as I pointed out, the Sheriff may have no knowledge, he should be the absolute arbiter between what I am afraid in some cases may be two opposing parties. I think, therefore, there is a great deal to be said against the Sheriff voting on measures of finance; but, at the same time, my Lords, I venture to think that the manner in which the noble Earl proposes to carry out this proposition is not a very convenient one, and it is not a very convenient thing that one member of a Committee should be restricted, and he alone, as to the subjects with which he is to deal. I do not know that I should be prepared, therefore, to support the noble Earl in that particular Amendment; but I think it does show that the position of the Sheriff on the Finance Committee is a very inconvenient one.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: I very much agree with the general tone of the observations of my noble Friend who has just sat down. The Sheriff is not a ratepayer necessarily on the one hand, and on the other hand it would, I think, be invidious in the form now proposed to exclude him from voting on the Committee of which he is a member. I do not agree with the noble Marquess in the suggestion that the Sheriffs have no knowledge in these votes. I think they have. They are in communication with all parties in the county, and they have by virtue of their office and position a judicial and impartial mind. Speaking generally of the gentlemen who occupy the position of Sheriffs, I feel sure that they are well qualified and I should always be very glad to have their opinions even on questions connected with expenditure. I hope, therefore, the Amendment will not be pressed.

LORD NAPIER AND ETTRICK: I would submit to the noble Duke that it is not a question of giving an opinion merely. Let the Sheriff retain his seat. He would be at liberty to give his opinion, he would be there as a member though not as a voter. Up to the present time the Sheriff has been a member of the Commissioners of Supply; he sits there as I have often seen him. He is frequently referred to there by the members of the Commissioners' Body, but I think he abstains a great deal from voting. He is a Consultative officer and he does not vote. When there is the least suspicion of any question of his being afterwards called upon to act in his judicial capacity he does not vote, and I do not think practically he would vote, at least in my county, on money questions.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: I sincerely hope this Amendment will not be agreed to, because this seems to me to be a very valuable provision. I think the noble Lord is mistaken if he supposes that the Sheriff is not there acting with the Commissioners of Supply with as full powers as the rest. It is certainly not my experience that if present he abstains from voting. But if the suggestion were carried out to make him merely a Consultative member and not to vote, the Sheriff would go away if he could not back up his opinion by his vote. I venture to think in the great majority of cases, if there is to be any serious conflict between the Commissioners of Supply, the Members of the Committee, and the Electoral Members, which I certainly hope will not be the case, that to have gentlemen of this description—these judicially minded persons—on the Committee would be a most valuable thing, and though the Sheriff might not, if he felt there was a pinch, record his vote, still I venture to think he would give his vote upon broad general grounds, and really I have every confidence that if it comes to contests, which I hope it will not as I have said before, between the County Councillors and the Commissioners of Supply, you could not put the decision of any questions which may come before the Committee in safer or better hands than those of the Sheriff or his substitute. I hope, therefore, the clause will be adhered to.

THE MARQUESS OF LOTHIAN: The noble Lord (Lord Elgin) talked of the opinion I expressed upon this matter; but I think he was mistaken in what he said. What I recollect to have said was that it was not incumbent either upon the Commissioners of Supply or the County Councillors to appoint the full number of seven. If the noble Lord will look at the clause it says, "such number not exceeding seven." That shows that the numbers need not come up to seven. It also states that six shall form a quorum of the Committee, and that also shows that the whole number need not be present. On the other hand I particularly pointed out what one object was of not making the election of the Commissioners of Supply depend upon the election by the County Council. It was in the hope of keeping them quite separate that it was provided the full number should not be appointed up to seven. I would also refer to what I said as to the odd number 15 being best. That was in view of the full number being appointed.

THE EARL OF ELGIN: May I ask one question? If one body appoints four members, must the other only appoint four?

THE MARQUESS OF LOTHIAN: No, the other body may appoint seven.

THE EARL OF ELGIN: Then the numbers will not be equal.

THE MARQUESS OF LOTHIAN: That is their own fault. Of course if there is a very small number present there will be no quorum.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: You might have this anomalous state of things, that the quorum is to be larger than the body actually sitting.

THE MARQUESS OF LOTHIAN: One really cannot anticipate all the exceedingly improbable difficulties which occur to noble Lords.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: That is rather an important point I think if you happened to have a larger quorum than your entire body.

*LORD WATSON: In that case it simply lays a statutory duty upon those two bodies of electing a number larger than the quorum.

THE EARL OF MINTO: I want to ask how the Commissioners of Supply are to be dealt with? I see the numbers are given, and in those numbers the ex officio members are stated. In the county of Lanark, which has been already referred to, I think there are 36 ex officio Commissioners of Supply. I think the noble Marquess ought to give an explanation of that, and state whether all those Commissioners are qualified to vote.

THE MARQUESS OF LOTHIAN: All those who are qualified Commissioners of Supply would have the power of voting.

THE EARL OF MINTO: That is to say the whole Commission?

THE MARQUESS OF LOTHIAN: Yes.

Amendment negatived.

Amendment proposed, Clause 18, page 11, line 17, to insert at the beginning of the sub-Section the words—

“The Standing Joint Committee shall meet on such days and at such intervals as may be determined at the first meeting of the Committee in each year, and.”—(The Earl of Elgin.)

THE EARL OF ELGIN: According to this sub-section no meeting can be held except upon six days' notice to be sent by registered letter. It was pointed out on the Committee of the County to which I belong, by the Chairman of the Police Committee, that at present there are statutory fixed sittings of the Committee, and that it would be inconvenient, to say the least of it, if no meeting of the Standing Joint Committee could be held except upon six days' notice supposing they were not statutory fixed meetings. It is in order to meet that difficulty that I have proposed the Amendment which stand in my name. Of course, the noble Marquess might object to the words, and might prefer to introduce them in another shape; but I think it is necessary that there should be fixed regular meetings of the Standing Committee of Police at any rate.

*LORD BALFOUR: Is not that rather a matter of arrangement for the Committee? If the Committee wished to do so they could do it under such bye-laws or standing orders as they choose to adopt for themselves. Notices can be sent on the days which have been previously arranged for.

Amendment (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

Amendment moved, to leave out Sub-section (7) and insert—

“Capital works shall include the erection or re-building of buildings, the construction or re-construction of roads and bridges, the construction or extension of drainage or water supply works, and the acquisition of land, or of any right or interest or servitude in or over land or water for the purposes of any capital work.”—(The Marquess of Huntly.)

*THE MARQUESS OF HUNTLY: My Lords, I have an Amendment to omit Sub-section 7, and to insert another section in its place. This is the point which I called attention to on the Motion for the Second Reading. Under this Bill all the highways in Scotland will in future be managed. Up to this time there were a number of Local Acts still in existence in Scotland which were not touched generally by the Roads and Bridges Act of 1878, although in one direction they were touched, that is to say, that the Roads and Bridges Act of 1878 enabled the counties which enjoyed the benefits of Local Acts to have extended powers of rating. In most of the Local Acts which I am aware of, there was a limit fixed to the rating. In Aberdeen it was 6d. in the £1, 3d. on the landlords, and 3d. on the tenants. The Roads and Bridges Act extended this provision, and Section 103 of that Act enabled those acting under it to exercise unlimited powers of rating. By this Bill, all those Local Acts are done away with, and although I deprecate it very much for old associations sake, still, it is necessary, no doubt, in a Bill of this sort. You repeal the provisions with regard to the method of election of Road Trustees, and you provide in the first place that the County Councils shall be elected; then, that the District Committee shall be formed; then that the District Committee, with one member nominated from the Parochial Board, shall be the Board to manage the roads and highways. These District Committees elected in that way will have the entire rating powers which the Act of 1878 confers. You give them full and absolute powers in that direction, and in Sub-section 6, which has just been carried, you say that no works involving capital expenditure shall be carried out without the consent in writing of the Standing Joint Committee. Now you come to Sub-section 7, which defines what these capital works are, and you find they include the erection and enlargement of buildings, bridges, and so on, and any large works the expenditure upon which is not wholly provided for out of the rates for the current financial year. What is the position into which we are now to be launched? Before 1878 we had a little hold over these Road Trustees. My noble Friend pointed out the extravagance which in some counties they were guilty of; but I can say, from my own experience, that we have carried out economically the system under which we worked. You will now have these works carried out by a small Body, with one nominee from the Parochial Boards, able to raise whatever rates they like, and able to carry out enormous works and even to acquire land. I do not know what works they may not launch into. This is a very dangerous power to give these District Committees, and my proposition is to leave out the words with regard to the enlargement of buildings and widening of roads, and to limit their powers as to providing for these works out of the rates for the current financial year, leaving these District Committees to come to the Joint Standing Committee if they really wish to get these capital works carried out.

THE MARQUESS OF LOTHIAN: I concur with the noble Marquess that perhaps the powers given under this clause are too wide, and therefore I am quite willing to accept the principal part of his Amendment. The only reason for including the enlargement of buildings and the widening of roads was that the expenditure upon them may, on the one hand, mean almost nothing at all, though, on the other, a large outlay of capital may be involved by them. With regard to the latter part of the noble Marquess's Amendment, I am willing to accept it.

THE MARQUESS OF HUNTLY: Is the noble Marquess willing to strike out from the words "water-supply works"?

THE MARQUESS OF LOTHIAN: Down to line 40.

THE EARL OF ELGIN: Surely, my Lords, that is a very important alteration. As I understand the clause as it stands in the Bill, the matters which come under the cognizance of this Joint Committee are simply these matters which are to be provided for out of borrowed money, and not matters which can be met out of the current rates of the year. The words which the noble Marquess now proposes to strike out are exactly the words which keep them to that matter only. That is as it stands in the Bill. Beyond that I do not see that there is so much objection to be taken to it; the District Committees could carry out any similar works which it might be necessary for them to do, so long as they do not exceed the amounts which they get on the current rates of the year, but if all capital works are to come under the cognizance of the Joint Committee I venture to say that very serious inconvenience will arise. Under these words as they stand now, without the Amendment, you could not rebuild a culvert without coming to the standing Joint Committee and getting their consent. It seems to me the principle of the clause, as it stands in the Bill, is a correct one. If I may make a suggestion on the clause, it would run:—

"Capital works shall mean works, the expenditure on which is not wholly provided for out of the current rates of the year."

*LORD WATSON: It appears to me that to adopt the suggestion of the noble Earl would simply import into this clause a new element, and convert into capital expenditure that which ought not, under any circumstances, to constitute capital expenditure. The words are:—

"Any works, the expenditure on which is not wholly provided for out of the rates for the current local financial year."

That means, according to my understanding, that whenever works which ought to be met out of current rates are constructed and the expenditure is not so met, it shall be at once charged to capital. If a large sum is spent in one year, on maintenance or repair of works, instead of being spread over three or four years, then expenditure which is chargeable on owners and occupiers and is in no sense capital, would be converted into capital outlay which is made chargeable upon landlords. Certainly it appears to me that the words which the noble Marquess has agreed to strike out ought never to have been in the Bill.

*THE MARQUESS OF HUNTLY: Is it proposed to leave in the words "and any other works"?

THE MARQUESS OF LOTHIAN: No; omit the words "water supply works."

On Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill," agreed to.

Moved that Clause 18, as amended, be added to the Bill.

*THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: On this question I desire to say a few words. In the discussion upon other matters attacks have been made on these County Joint Committees. I think my noble Friend Lord Hamilton went so far as to say that if you established anything in the nature of a Joint Committee you would establish class feeling. I cannot help feeling that my noble Friend must have imagined he was back again with his constituents, and descanting on a public platform upon all the woes and injustice, under which they labour. I cannot believe that when he used words of that sort he was really considering the Committee which it is proposed to appoint under this Bill, for if he was so considering it, all I can say is that I am afraid he did not understand what is contained in the Bill. For what is it? In the first place, you have these rates. These rates are of two kinds. One is to be paid wholly by the owner, the other is the consolidated rate, of which the owners are to pay half, and the other half is to be found by the occupiers. There is now a new body constituted, the great majority of whom will contribute little or nothing to those rates—namely, persons who have the Service Franchise, and those who have holdings under £4, for which the rates are commuted. Those will be the large majority of the ratepayers. Now, what is the moderate proposal which is put forward by this Bill? It is this—that whereas property is to contribute three-fourths of the rates, and a large proportion of the constituency are to be persons who will contribute very little, or in some cases nothing at all, when it comes to a question of borrowing or of making large outlay on capital works, there is to be a committee, composed one-half of representatives of property in the county, and the other half by the persons representing these large constituencies, and they are to say whether it is right or not to undertake this borrowing, and to make this capital outlay. That is the whole proposal. May I ask, is it not the most ordinary course to avoid doing this; and, in a sense, would it not be utterly ridiculous if you were to give borrowing powers to a constituency which we all agree contributes very little to these rates? But when you talk of class feeling, I cannot imagine any term which would be more inapplicable. These 14 men, or less than 14 men, whatever their number may be, will all be persons who have the strongest reasons for wishing to expend the money of the ratepayers in a frugal and sensible manner. I think, too, that the noble Lord has entirely forgotten that when it is proposed to lay out public money, precautions of this kind are always used. When a parish wants to lay out money, they have to go and obtain the consent of the Board of Supervision. Take the present Road Boards. When there is any question of capital expenditure, that is not allowed to be decided by the ordinary trustees, but it is decided by the Road Board, which you are really continuing in this Bill. Then if you consider the Public Health provisions, they are exactly on the same basis. In England you have to obtain the consent of the Local Government Board. This course is invariably followed, and I must say I have never seen anything to justify the attacks upon these Joint Committees.

THE DUKE OF MONTROSE: I would point out that there is no similar Committee in England in regard to capital expenditure.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: Before this clause passes I desire to say that I entirely agree with the observations which fell from my noble Friend Lord Camperdown. The great danger of all municipal Government is pecuniary jobbery. It has been terrible in the United States of America. Your Lordships probably have no idea of the extent to which pecuniary jobbery has gone in the municipalities of the United States. In New York it is not merely that there are corrupt officers of the constituencies; it is not merely that office-bearers under the Municipality are corrupt—that is not the kind of corruption to which I allude; it is that the whole constituencies are corrupt, and that they elect men on purpose to perpetrate jobs. I believe that the Municipalities of England and Scotland have hitherto been on the whole corrupt. Within this week a most stringent Bill has been assented to by this House against popular corruption. Nobody apparently took any notice of it. It was under the charge of Lord Herschell. It has gone back to the House of Commons, and I suppose it will pass this Session. That Bill provides that if any public body is guilty of what is defined by the Bill to be corruption, every member of it should be considered under the Act as having committed an offence. I hope, in the atmosphere of comparative purity which has existed in England and Scotland, that our Municipalities will be as pure in the future as they have been in the past, but surely it is a matter of common sense in establishing a new system which should make a bridge between the old and the new order of things, that we should secure in the new Administration, a strong element of those who have hitherto conducted the county business so well in Scotland. It is quite possible that this enactment which is proposed by Government may be of a beneficial character; it is quite possible that a more united, a more homogeneous system, may ultimately supersede the former system; but the question is with regard to the time now, whether we should take this leap in the dark without any precaution against pecuniary corruption. There are numerous temptations to corruption, and you ought to secure with regard to those bodies that they shall be free from that corruption which prevails elsewhere. That is the ground on which I support this clause. Although I quite admit there are theoretical objections to it, on the whole, it is nothing but a wise precaution against possible evils which are widely prevalent at this moment all over the world. I do not know whether your Lordships' attention has been directed to the state of Italy. The state of Italy just now in regard to its municipal institutions is, I believe, nothing short of disastrous. A great eulogism has been lately passed by Mr. Gladstone on the state of Italy, and, no doubt, since the unity of Italy has been accomplished, great progress has been made in that country; but if we go a little behind that ostensible progress, and investigate its financial condition and its general condition, both municipal and commercial, we shall find it is in a most dangerous condition. A paragraph appeared in the newspapers this week, I do not know what weight is to be attributed to it, stating that the ancient city of Pisa is absolutely bankrupt and unable to pay its creditors, and, it was added, half the cities of Southern Italy are in the same condition. What has that resulted from? It has resulted to some extent, no doubt, from keeping up an enormous Army and an enormous Navy; but besides the Imperial taxes there are the Communal taxes, and they are, I understand, the most oppressive of all. We ought not, I think, to give unlimited powers of taxation to any public body, without taking such precautions as wisdom suggests, to maintain the comparative administrative purity which has hitherto existed locally in this country.

THE EARL OF ELGIN: I should like to say in regard to this matter that although the noble Duke has given us illustrations from America and from Italy, it does not appear to me that those illustrations exactly meet our objections to this clause in the measure now before the House; because he has at the same time admitted that in England and Scotland we are able to boast, at any rate, of a comparative absence of corruption in regard to local finances. What I should venture to think is the real ground of objection taken to this clause, and I think it is the feeling prevalent in Scotland, is that the restrictions which are put on Local Government in counties by the institution of these Joint Committees is a restriction which is not found in the similar measure with regard to Local Government in England, nor, as matters stand in the great cities of Scotland, and which will be the position next year, when these local bodies will meet. I think I am correct in saying that no Town Council is subject to any check of this kind in the management of its finances, nor are the large cities subject to checks of the kind which are introduced by this clause in the matter of their Police. If we are to accept the view of the noble Duke that the Government look upon this Bill merely as a provisional matter, and that we may look forward at some date, perhaps, not far distant, to the abandonment of these provisions, and that the County Council will then be entrusted with the full management of their own concerns, our objections with regard to these clauses might be very materially modified. But I do say, as the matter stands, this clause does introduce what I venture to call a change in local affairs, because it introduces a feeling of suspicion on the part of the Government, who have in so many ways consulted the wishes of the people of Scotland as to the extent to which they are to be trusted with the management of their own affairs.

*LORD BALFOUR: I shall not detain the Committee more than a few moments, and I should not have risen at all, but for the remarks of the noble Lord who spoke last. He seemed to make it a special grievance that in this particular matter the people of Scotland are less trusted than were the people of England in the Act which was passed with regard to Local Government last year. As I am somewhat familiar with that Act, I may be, perhaps, permitted to point out that the conditions are not quite the same. In the first place, though not the most important matter, there are no Aldermen in Scotland as in England, and there are not any, therefore, proposed to be created under this Bill. It was suggested in England that maintaining the Aldermen would have a steadying effect on the Town Councils. But that is not the chief reason why I object to the parallel. I object to it on account of the differences between the two countries as regards the incidence of rating. In England the occupier pays the county rates; in Scotland the rates are to be divided between the owner and the occupier except in the case of the stereotyped rate. That does not mean that the rate is divided equally, say, 4d. in the £1 upon one, and 4d. in the £1 on the other. It means that if £2,000 has to be raised, the owners must find £1,000 and the occupier £1,000. It seems to me that that being so, any temptation should be removed from the occupier to unduly rate the owner for his own advantage. The occupier, if he finds the rates heavy, may move away, after he has burdened the owner's property in the district in which he lives, but the owner must stay. The owner is fixed, to a certain extent, where he is, and he will have to pay the burden imposed upon him by the vote of the occupier. There is a further point to which I would call attention. I venture to think your Lordships will agree that, at any rate in the last resort, it is the owner who pays the rates. The occupier, when he goes from one place to another, naturally takes into consideration the rating as well as the rent which he will have to pay. If the rating is less heavy he can afford to pay a larger rent, but if the rating is heavier than he has been accustomed to pay, he will only be able to offer a smaller amount of rent. I venture to think it is really not a mistrust of the people of Scotland, but a simple and ordinary business-like precaution which is imposed, and whatever noble Lords opposite may say, it has really a much larger amount of sympathy than they would appear to make out among the constituencies of Scotland. I almost owe the House an apology for intruding at this stage, but I do think that the attempt to draw a parallel between the two cases will not hold water for a moment.

THE EARL OF MINTO: I do not like to allow this subject to pass away from your Lordships' consideration entirely without giving a short expression to my opinion upon it. That opinion substantially coincides with the opinion which has already been expressed by my noble Friend below me. Although I perhaps would not have used quite as strong language in speaking on the subject as he did, I fully concur in the opinion which has been so warmly expressed by the noble Duke and others that it is desirable control should be extended in some matters over the local expenditure and borrowing powers of the new Councils, which are now being called into existence, especially in the inception of their authority. I am inclined to regret that this control has been deposited in the hands of a different class belonging to the same community; but I do not believe that that authority will be the less exercised—I trust it will even be exercised with sympathy for the large portion of the community. Still, there does appear to me to be something rather obnoxious in the principle. It is like setting one class of the community as a controlling body over another, and I think in Scotland there will be some feeling on the subject, which I hope will not be a durable or a strong one. I should have been satisfied myself if the control over capital expenditure and borrowing powers had been deposited with the Secretary for Scotland alone.

Clause 18, as amended, agreed to.

Clauses 19 to 26 agreed to, with Amendments.

Clause 27.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: In the absence of Lord Aberdeen, I rise to propose the proviso which stands in his name. The reason of this Amendment is that in certain counties where works entailing large expenditure have been carried out, in certain cases it has been done by extra assessment instead of by borrowing, and under the arrangements of this Bill it will be necessary to calculate what was the "average rate" (those are the words of the Bill) paid by the owners during the last 10 years. In cases of this sort it is obvious that the average rate of owners will be much higher than it would have been if the expenditure had been defrayed in the ordinary way—namely, partly by rate and partly by borrowing. The object of the Amendment is to provide that in cases of this sort the Sheriff shall use his discretion and decide how much of this expenditure should be provided in the ordinary way.

Amendment moved, in page 18, line 81, after "rate," add—

"Provided further that where such branch of expenditure, or any part thereof, has been provided for by assessments instead of by borrowing, the Sheriff shall include in the average rate such proportion only of those assessments as, in his opinion, would have been levied if the sums necessary to meet such expenditure had been raised by borrowing."—(The Earl of Camperdown.)

THE MARQUESS OF LOTHIAN: I admit at first sight there appears to be a good deal to be said for this Amendment, but I would ask your Lordships to consider that the proposal under the Bill, as it now stands, is purely in the nature of a compromise under the Bill as it was first introduced into the House of Commons. There was at first no provision in the Bill applying to cases of this sort. It was proposed in the other House that these rates should be exempted altogether from the stereotyped rate, and this Bill, as it stands, is the result of a compromise on this question. I would ask your Lordships further to consider that in rating for expenditure year by year there are very few counties (I am not sure that there is more than one) who have considered that the expenditure is expenditure which ought to fall upon the rate of the year. In adding to the rates year by year for any capital expenditure they have thought that it was a proper yearly expenditure and it was done entirely by their own action there was no force upon them, and if they thought that they would do better by borrowing money and paying it by instalments, they would have done so; but they thought it right in their own interests that the capital expenditure should be put upon the rates of the current year. Apart from that I see a practical difficulty in the way of the proposal of the noble Lord. It is proposed that the Sheriff shall include in the average rate such proportion only of those assessments as in his opinion would have been levied if the sums necessary to meet such expenditure had been raised by borrowing. Does it not occur to the noble Lord that that is an almost impossible duty to throw upon the Sheriff? You would have no data to go upon by which to judge accurately what the proportion should be. I would like the noble Earl to suggest any way by which the Sheriff could come to a just decision. For these reasons, first, that I do not think it is expedient that the expenditure which has been made out of the annual rate of the county should be deducted from the stereotyped rate; and, secondly, because I think that if such a proposal were carried it would be impossible for the Sheriff to carry out the duties imposed upon him, I do not propose to accept the Amendment of the noble Lord.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: I admit there is some force in the second reason that the noble Lord has just given; but with regard to the first, I do not think he meets the case at all, and after all that is much the most important of the two. The case which Lord Aberdeen puts is this. Take the case of a county which for reasons best known to itself, thought it was better, having certain capital expenditure to make, to make that by paying the money down at once, instead of by borrowing. The noble Lord says: then they determined that that course was for their own interest. Yes; but they did not see that the noble Lord was going by this Bill to stereotype rates against the owners which would tell against them for all time to come. The noble Lord will remember that this formality which he proposes in this Bill is without any precedent whatsoever. The reason for it we all know is that hitherto these rates have been borne entirely by the owners, whereas now they are to be divided between the owners and occupiers. There has never been anything like this proposal in Local Government Acts or anything else. You say the Sheriff shall calculate what these rates have been during the last 10 years, and upon that he shall base a charge for all time to come. When the noble Lord says that this is a most difficult task to impose upon the Sheriff, I merely reply that the noble Lord has already set the Sheriff a task which is nearly equal in difficulty. The whole arrangement is one of the most extraordinary character, and moreover the ratepayers of the county, if they had foreseen that the provisions of this Bill were going to come into force, would never have adopted that form of paying the capital expenditure. That is the case as it appears to me for Lord Aberdeen's Amendment, and it seems to me that what the noble Lord has said is no answer to that case at all.

\*LORD BALFOUR: The duty cast upon the Sheriff by the Bill as it stands will surely not be much more than putting into practice some very simple rules of arithmetic. By the Amendment a large amount of what would be conjecture is imported into this matter. I have not heard the exact amount which is supposed to be involved, but as far as I know, in any county which is interested in this matter it is only a very small amount. I have heard it put for one county, and I believe it to be the county which is most affected, Renfrew, and in that case I believe the utmost that is involved is  $\frac{1}{4}$ d. in the £1. I speak from good information, but I do not put it forward absolutely. I believe there is another objection to it, that the real object of stereotyping has been to prevent any burden which has hitherto been fully borne by owners being transferred to the occupiers; but in any possible reading of this Amendment, if put into the Bill, the first effect of it would be—I admit to a very small extent, but to some extent—to put a burden on the occupier next year and in subsequent years which has hitherto, rightly or wrongly, as a matter of practice been borne by the owner. On this account I think it would be undesirable to accept the Amendment.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: I will not press the Amendment at this present stage, but I would like to ask the noble Lord to consider this matter

before Report. The noble Lord said just now that hitherto this rate has been borne by the owner, and, therefore, he should not like to make any change. You are doing a great deal more than that, you are saying that because a county has acted for prudence sake in a particular way, therefore the owners are to be fined to that extent. I do not know what county Lord Aberdeen may have in view, but there are two or three counties in which they have actually levied rates—I know in Forfarshire there is a balance actually in hand of £2,000 at this moment, which has been levied by rates. If that money is not expended in some way the result will be that for all time to come there will be an additional charge upon all owners in that county. There is the same thing in Renfrew and in Linlithgow and other countries. I quite admit that we must do everything we can to prevent anything falling upon occupiers which has hitherto been borne by owners, but there is an equal duty to prevent the owner having burdens which he would certainly not have taken upon himself if he could have foreseen that this Act was going to come into force.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: I should be very glad if the noble Marquess would consider this matter before Report. There is no doubt that the principle of the Bill is not carried into effect unless the clause is rectified in this particular. There is no reason why you should deduct rates which have been expended upon public property if borrowed and not deduct also the same rates when, instead of being borrowed, they have been paid by the ratepayers. I cannot conceive any difficulty in ascertaining the sum, and as regards the amount it would be simply a matter of calculation, because the sums are usually borrowed for so many years, and the Sheriff will have nothing to do but to ascertain the amounts to be levied in this particular manner and to calculate when upon the usual rate of borrowing they would have to be repaid.

THE MARQUESS OF LOTHIAN: Although I still adhere to the opinion I have expressed, I cannot resist the request that I should at least consider this question before Report. I will do so, and will be very glad to have any suggestions that noble Lords may make upon the subject.

*THE MARQUESS OF HUNTLY: As the noble Marquess is so congenial I venture to hope that he will recognise that the principle that is embodied in this clause, or, as I think he called it, the arrangement that had been come to, the compromise, is a very good one. The object of my Amendment is to fix some date at which it will terminate. As I caught the expression of the noble Lord (Lord Balfour) he said that this rate was really a matter of arrangement between the owner and the occupier. The effect of this clause will be that for ever and for ever the estate of an owner will be practically mortgaged with this average rate; it will be stereotyped upon his property; the Sheriff under Sub-section (1) will fix the 10 years' average that the owner will have to pay in consideration of this rate, and this average rate will be absolutely fixed and for ever stereotyped upon his estate. According to Sub-section 3 the demand note will state the average rate and the increment thereof, that is—the increment which is to be demanded by the tax collector is to be paid equally by the owners and occupiers. If we acknowledge that sooner or later these rates do come to be a question of arrangement between the owner and the occupier, why do we not fix a term at which the arrangement under this Bill will come to an end. In Scotland the usual term is the 19 years' lease. I have proposed to take 10 years as the term of ending. I would remind the House also that every other rate in the Bill is proposed to be paid equally by the occupiers and the owners—the road rate, the sanitary rate, the public health rate. Yet you are going to stereotype for ever and ever the owners of the property with this rate.

THE MARQUESS OF LOTHIAN: I am afraid the noble Marquess will not find me in the conciliatory mood to which he referred at the beginning of his remarks. I can understand noble Lords' objection to stereotyped rates, and that is an objection which will probably be felt by a very great many owners throughout Scotland. At the same time, the provision that there should be a stereotyped rate upon owners is one that has been most carefully considered, and it is part of the Bill, and to accept the noble Marquess's proposal would be to alter one of the main parts of the Bill, so far as the rates are concerned. Under the Bill it is proposed that this stereotyping should be, as the noble Marquess has said, perpetual. It is a rate which will be under the Act, when it becomes an Act, a perpetual obligation upon the owners, although I understand that this proposal of the noble Marquess is that there should be a revision after 10 years. I would put it to the noble Marquess that if the principle is sound it is much better to enact it once and for all, because if there was any prospect of any such revision either of the amount of the stereotyped rate, or the abolition of the stereotyped rate altogether, it would necessarily create an indefiniteness in the stereotyped rate, which would be unfortunate in the interests both of the owners and the occupiers. I think it much better, as proposed by the Bill, that the stereotyped rate should remain a fixture, although I quite understand the disinclination of the noble Marquess and others to having a stereotyped rate on the property. The only indefiniteness now is the increase above the stereotyped rate which would be put upon owners by the action of the County Council. I am afraid I cannot accept the Amendment of the noble Marquess.

*THE MARQUESS OF HUNTLY: I wish to ask the noble Lord whether this has occurred to him: Suppose this average rate is fixed upon a county at the present rateable value, and suppose the rateable value of that county were to increase enormously; the rates would be fixed then, without any power of increasing or altering that rate. I think the County Council of Lanark, at any rate, would not know what to do.

*LORD BALFOUR: If the rateable value increases, there will be a less amount per £1 required. Therefore, if the rateable value increases, the whole present rate will not be required, and the owner will get the benefit.

*THE MARQUESS OF HUNTLY: I will withdraw the Amendment.

THE EARL OF ELGIN: The object of the Amendment, of which I have given notice, is to deal with the case of detached portions of a county in which there might be a difference between the average rate as between the county from which it is detached, and that to which it is attached; but, as I understand that the noble Lord has not had time to consider this Amendment, perhaps he would consider it before Report.

THE MARQUESS OF LOTHIAN: It did not appear to me to be necessary, but I prefer to consider it on Report, as I have not yet seen the Amendment of the noble Lord.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 28.

*THE MARQUESS OF TWEEDDALE: The object of the Amendment which stands in my name is to confer on Corporations representation in consideration of contribution to local rates. As the law stands at present, Corporations, such as Railway Companies and others, are entitled to very substantial representation on all the Local Boards of Scotland. Under the present Bill this representation is denied them altogether. I frankly admit that I do not anticipate a very hearty reception to this Amendment from the noble Marquess, but having in consideration the fact that the contribution of the Railway Companies amount to £200,000 a year, and the fact that in many counties they are the largest ratepayers, I think the noble Lord will not deny that they have a very large interest in the proper collection of rates, and in the efficient disposal of them. The representation which I ask for them is a very small one indeed, but it does recognise a principle which appears to me to be departed from in this Bill—the principle that where rates are paid representation should go hand in hand with them. At any rate I shall ask my noble Friend if he will explain on what ground, on what principle the representation is altogether denied to these bodies who, as I have said, contribute so largely to the local rates in Scotland.

Amendment moved, in page 21, line 10, after "county elector" add—

"And every company or corporation owning or occupying property shall be entitled to have the name of their chairman or secretary or other official placed on this supplementary register and that he be thereby constituted a county elector."—(The Marquess of Tweeddale.)

THE MARQUESS OF LOTHIAN: In answer to the last question of the noble Marquess, I think the burden of proof rather rests upon him than upon me. He asks that I should consent to put a certain position, under this Bill, upon persons who do not otherwise have it under the Bill, and which position would be entirely exceptional. I do not quite understand the object of the noble Marquess unless it is this, that in every district there should be some direct representation of some Corporation, or the particular Corporations, if I may say so, which he represents—namely, the Railway Companies, as the direct representation of the parish in every electoral district. In the first place, I should say that one single voter in each electoral district would not probably make very much difference one way or the other to the interests of a great company such as that which the noble Marquess represents. On the other hand, if there was special representation given to the interest he represents it would be going, as I said just now, against the principle of the Bill, for the electorate is based upon the Parliamentary register, and you will have to introduce another register to meet the proposal of the noble Marquess. But if the object is to have direct representation upon the County Council, then, of course, there comes a rather more important question. But I ask the noble Marquess to consider this—that it is not only the very large Corporations which would come under such a clause as that which he proposes, but Corporations of all sizes. Very large and important Corporations would be represented; but, if so, even small and unimportant Corporations would have to be represented also, and the question of gradation between the large and small Corporations would be quite inconsistent with the existing principles both of Imperial and local representation. I do not think the noble Marquess need be very much alarmed as to want of representation, because surely in the cases of Corporations such as that he represents there would be no difficulty in finding proper representatives in every district for the County Council. In his own county I have no doubt that the noble Marquess, as Chairman of the Company, would easily find a seat upon the County Council, as indeed I hope he will. However, I should say that there will be no difficulty whatever in any district. That remark would refer not only to such an interest as that of a Railway Company, but of all other Corporations of a large and important description. I think what the noble Marquess asks me to do is to introduce a new principle into the Bill altogether, and one which I do not think the object which he would seek to obtain would justify me in agreeing to, and therefore I am afraid that in this case I must also decline to accept his Amendment.

Amendment (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 29 to 39 agreed to.

Clause 40.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: I beg to move the omission of this clause. I may explain to your Lordships very briefly the history of these two parishes, which rejoice in the names of Cumbernauld and Kirkintilloch. They belonged, some time ago, to a noble Lord, and I think it suited him that those parishes should be comprised within the County of Dumbarton, and he arranged accordingly; and these two parishes, although they are not adjacent to the County of Dumbarton, and are separated from it, were, and still are—for all purposes except that of roads—part of the County of Dumbarton. When the Road Act of 1878 was passed no special arrangement was made with reference to these parishes, and, in pursuance of the terms of the Act, it came to pass that the County of Stirling—of which these two are the largest parishes—became the county to which, for road management, they belonged. In consequence of that arrangement, the County of Stirling has made a road district of which, I believe, these parishes form more than a half. A good deal of expenditure has fallen upon the county in consequence. This Bill proposes to take these two parishes, and to take them out of the County of Stirling, in which they have been for the last 10 years, and to put them into the County of Dumbarton. To that arrangement the County of Stirling strongly objects. With regard to the merits of the case, I do not wish to say anything, but the case which I have to present to the House is this, that by the clauses which come a little later in the Bill the Government is establishing Boundary Commissioners, whose duty it is to consider and to settle questions of this very sort, and it seems to me that this question which is contained in Clause 40 is exactly one of the questions which the Boundary Commissioners are appointed to settle. The County of Stirling complains very bitterly that it has not been heard on this Bill. It says that the clause was not in the Bill originally, and at a comparatively late stage in the progress through the House of Commons the clause was inserted, and the County of Stirling against whose interest it militates had no opportunity of stating their case against the clause. I do not think I need say anything further. Perhaps there is one little remark I ought to make. Suppose that this clause is struck out of the Bill, it is represented (and I think this is the strongest argument that can be produced against me) that these two parishes, which are now part of the County of Stirling for roads only, and are part of the County of Dumbarton for health and all other purposes, will become part of the County of Stirling for all purposes. I admit that that appears to be something of a case against me, but I would point out that the only effect really would be this, that it would make it imperative for you to delay this clause, and imperative upon the Commissioners to settle and decide this question, and that is exactly what I think ought to be done, and exactly what the principle of this Bill lays down as the duty of the Commissioners.

*THE DUKE OF MONTROSE: I rise to support the Amendment of the noble Lord. I may say I live in Stirlingshire, and am conversant with county business, and know how detrimental it will be to the County if these two Parishes are taken away too summarily by Act of Parliament. I do not suppose for a moment that Stirlingshire wishes to retain these two Counties if it is considered advisable that they should be handed over to Dumbartonshire, but there are financial questions of considerable importance, and, besides, there are several other parishes in the County of Stirling which are more or less on the same footing as those two, and it is for those reasons that the county considers that the question should be decided by the County Commissioners, and that no good cause has been shown for singling out those two Parishes out of the whole scheme for this special legislation. I hope the noble Marquess will see his way to omit this clause.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: After the two speeches we have listened to one would think that the tedium of discussions in this House is likely to be relieved by a revival of the battle of the clans. I rise on the part of the County of Dumbarton to protest against the Government agreeing to this amendment. There are very curious historical matters in connection with this clause. The County of Dumbarton is one of the oldest and most interesting historical counties in Scotland. It has a strong esprit de corps of its own; it has a history of its own. The ancient County of Dumbarton, as the noble Duke well knows (for a considerable part of the ancient territory belongs to him) was the Lennox, one of the old and most important historical divisions in Scotland, giving one of its oldest titles to the Royal Family of Scotland. The word Lennox is derived from the Valley of the Leven; it is a mere corruption of Levenax. As long ago as the 14th or 15th century there was a division made owing to certain circumstances of convenience at that time, in which two large divisions (parishes now) were annexed to the Parish of Dumbarton to the eastward of its old boundary, and in exchange for that no less than seven parishes were detached from the ancient Lennox, and given to the County of Stirling. It is an old bargain, 300 or 400 years old, and what is gravely proposed to this House now is that this old bargain should be revoked, and that the County of Stirling should annex the two great Parishes of Kirkintilloch and Cumbernauld in order to get their assessment within their own boundary without giving up the corresponding parishes.

*THE DUKE OF MONTROSE: The noble Duke misunderstands me.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: That is the effect of the repeal of this clause. My noble Friend has also stated it rather broadly to the House when he speaks of this as a change from the existing state of things. The effect of the 40th Clause is to keep the existing state of things. I have read with much astonishment the statement made by the Commissioners of Supply of the County of Stirling. They say distinctly that—

“The position of the Parishes of Kirkintilloch and Cumbernauld is exactly identical with the Parish of Kelenore and in former Acts of Parliament concerning Local Government, have been treated accordingly.”

That is quite at variance with the fact. The two last important Acts which have been passed for Local Government in Scotland, one in 1857 and the other in 1868, had a clause precisely similar to this. The one was an Act of 1857 for regulating the police in counties and burghs in Scotland, and the other in 1868 was for levying the general County Assessment. In both these Statutes there was a corresponding clause the two parishes of Kirkintilloch and Cumbernauld, and preserving them in their ancient historical connection with the County of Dumbarton. This will be a serious matter for the County of Dumbarton. The two parishes of Kirkintilloch and Cumbernauld originally at the time of the old contract were empty moor land and very poor land. They are now full of mineral riches and afford a large field for assessment by the County of Dumbarton, and the only pretence for leaving out this clause is that for road purposes these two parishes were created a separate district in connection with the County of Stirling. That is quite natural. For road purposes they are surrounded by two different counties, and it would be inconvenient that they should be separated from their coterminous boundaries. But as regards judicial work and police they have always preserved their connection with the County of Dumbarton, and the County of Dumbarton objects to having so large and accessible an area withdrawn from its ancient boundaries. The Government in putting in this 40th Clause have followed precisely the precedent followed by the two last Local Acts connected with the Government of Scotland, and I object exceedingly to the Amendment, and I hope the Government will resist it.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: I omitted to state what was really the very strongest argument I possessed, which is this, that if this Clause 40 is allowed to stand in the Bill the Commissioners will have no power to settle questions of expenditure which may arise, because the matter in question will have been disposed of. But it seemed just now as if there was going to be a regular Battle of the Clans. I thought Loch Lomond was going to rush down from Stirling to Inverary. But after all, the noble Duke and I are not so very far apart. He says he only wants to keep the existing state of things—that is all I want to keep. For the purposes of road management, these two parishes, in despite of all ancient history, have been part of the County of Stirling for the last 10 years. For the purposes of police, health, &c., they have been part of the County of Dumbarton. We do not want to change either of these things, but it is the noble Duke's friends who put into the Bill a clause which summarily removes these two parishes from Stirling, and settles the question in favour of Dumbarton. Our proposal is simply this. We say hand the existing state of things, both with regard to roads and police, over to the Boundary Commissioners as you proposed to do with all other questions. Let them settle the question in the manner which seems to them best; they are the only people who can settle it satisfactorily and fairly, because they are the only people who have power to settle financial questions between the two counties.

*LORD WATSON: Having had something to do with the Roads and Bridges Act of 1878, perhaps your Lordships will allow me to make an observation with respect to this question. I thought at that time that Dumbartonshire was somewhat severely treated, but with necessary severity, because there were certain great turnpike roads that ran through the two counties of Lanark and Stirling, and traversed this outlying part of Dumbartonshire. It was very expedient in the state of matters at that time that the road authorities of Stirlingshire should have charge and control within this district, but I must say that it never entered into the mind of anyone who had to do with the Measure that they ought in the least degree to impair the integrity of the somewhat small County of Dumbarton. I believe that owing to the spread of railway communication in Scotland and the ~~cess~~ of long-distance traffic over these main lines of road, the causes which rendered it very proper to incorporate for road purposes only these two parishes with the County of Stirling in the year 1878, have been gradually disappearing, and that the area now contains district roads only properly so called. At the same time there is a good deal to be said for part of the observations of the noble Earl. These two parishes have hitherto been dealt with as an integral part of one of the Stirlingshire Road Districts. There may have been liabilities incurred by Stirlingshire with respect to this part of Dumbartonshire, which for road purposes Dumbartonshire ought not to retain without taking over its due share of liabilities, and if the noble Marquess who has charge of the measure could see his way to it, I think the present clause might stand, with an addition to the effect of making a reference to the Boundary Commissioners under the Act to settle any question of disputed compensation between the two counties.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: I do not understand the 40th Clause to prevent the existing arrangement in regard to roads only continuing. I do not think it will.

*LORD WATSON: It puts an end to the existing road arrangements and is intended to do so, I believe.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: I have no objection myself, personally—I do not know what may be the opinion of the whole body of the Commissioners of Supply of the County of Dumbarton, but I see no objection to the continuance of the existing state of things as regards the roads only, but the striking out of this clause would be practically the annexation of these parishes to the County of Stirling.

THE DUKE OF HAMILTON: None of the noble Lords who have spoken have informed us what are the wishes and sentiment of the inhabitants of the two parishes upon this point. Would not the Boundary Commissioners be able to inform us upon the subject?

THE MARQUESS OF LOTHIAN: This is apparently a very difficult question. I have given a great deal of consideration to it, because the question has been brought very strongly before me in the interests both of the County of Stirling and the County of Dumbarton. First of all I would like to say, in reference to what has fallen from the noble Lord who has just spoken as to the feelings of the two parishes of Kirkintilloch and

Cumbernauld, that I think that what their views are may be fairly taken for granted from the course which they have hitherto followed. In 1857, as the noble Duke has said, under the Police Act, the position of these two parishes was maintained, but there was a proviso enabling the two parishes to be transferred to the County of Stirling if the ratepayers wished. The ratepayers never took advantage of those powers, and we may judge from that of what their wishes were. In 1868 an identical clause was inserted, and the ratepayers followed the same course. Therefore we may take it for granted that they do not wish to be transferred, but wish to remain part of the County of Dumbarton. With reference to what the noble Duke said just now as to these two parishes remaining in the County of Stirling simply under the Road Act, I do not think that that is possible. The effect of this clause as it stands would be to transfer the whole power both under the Road Act, and the Police Act, and all the other Acts to the County of Dumbarton. With regard to the financial aspect of the question the noble Earl seemed to confine his observations to the matter of roads only; but it must be recollected that the financial aspect also touches Dumbarton at this moment with reference to all the rates. The rateable value in these two parishes is enormous. Out of £450,000 the annual value of the whole county, these two parishes account for £81,000, or 18 per cent of the whole. If that was taken away from Dumbarton, as it would be according to the proposal of the noble Earl, it would make an enormous difference to the County of Dumbarton. With reference to what the noble Earl said just now as to the financial arrangements between the two counties with reference to any capital which might have been spent under the Road Act in these two parishes, I think there is very great force in what the noble Earl has said. I understand that the County of Stirling has spent about £2,000 of capital upon the roads in these two parishes of Dumbartonshire, and it certainly would be a very strong thing to transfer the two parishes to Dumbartonshire for road purposes without some compensation by which this £2,000 or some equivalent sum might be given back to

Stirling. The whole question before the Committee is whether really these two parishes should be placed within the jurisdiction of the Boundary Commissioners. My own opinion is that, under the Bill, the Boundary Commissioners have powers to deal with these parishes, but the clause, as it stands, does not take them out of the administration or powers of the Boundary Commissioners; but if there is any doubt upon that point, I should like to make it clear that it is not the intention of the Bill that they should be taken away for reference to the Boundary Commissioners, and I propose, therefore, at the end of Clause 40, to introduce words to this effect—

“That nothing in this section contained shall affect or limit the powers and duties of the Boundary Commissioners or the Secretary of State for Scotland under this Act.”

I think if those words were introduced, leaving Clause 40 as it now stands, it would give an indication to the Boundary Commissioners that in the opinion of Parliament these two parishes ought to remain as they now are, part of the County of Dumbarton, and to give to the Boundary Commissioners the right to take evidence and to make any arrangement they think fit as to pecuniary matters between Dumbarton and Stirling.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: I do not quite understand the proposal of my noble Friend. Does he mean that the Boundary Commissioners may transfer these parishes wholly, for all purposes, from Dumbarton to Stirling, because that I should certainly object to. To give the Boundary Commissioners power to trace boundaries between parishes, and arrange as to deviations and so forth, is a very different thing to giving power to such a body to cut off what has been a substantial part of a Scotch county from all its history and associations.

THE MARQUESS OF LOTHIAN: I am afraid that would be the effect of my proposal—it would give that power to the Boundary Commissioners, although I do not think that would be the result, but I do not see how otherwise it would be possible to make provision for payment of compensation for the differences between the two counties.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: My object is not to withdraw this question

from the cognisance of the Boundary Commissioners, and I am quite prepared to accept the proposal which has been made.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: It seems to me that the Amendment of my noble Friend is virtually the repeal of this clause, because this clause runs on all fours with the clauses in the previous Act of 1878. What I suggest to my noble Friend is that the Boundary Commissioners should have special power to make special arrangements in any case that may arise, but that they should not have the power to disintegrate altogether these two parishes.

*LORD WATSON: I entirely sympathise with the observations made by the noble Duke. If the clause has the meaning which the noble Marquess seems to attach to it it ought to have run thus:—

“The Commissioners in exercising their powers under this Act shall treat the County of Dumbarton as if it had contained these two parishes within its limits up to this date.”

That seems to be the view which he takes of this clause. I cannot so read it. It is a substantive enactment to the effect that for every purpose in this Bill these two parishes shall be considered as forming part of the County of Dumbarton, and after enacting that substantively in the first part of the clause, it is proposed to add a contradiction in terms—namely, that these shall not be for the purposes of this Act part of the County of Dumbarton if the Commissioners under the Act shall so will it.

*LORD BALFOUR: I can see nothing in the Bill to prevent the Boundary Commissioners dealing with these two parishes as the Bill now stands; all the Bill does is to alter the first presumption. The presumption throughout the whole Bill is that the contents of counties for the purposes of this Bill shall be the contents according to the Roads and Bridges Act. The effect of this clause as it stands is in respect of these two parishes to alter the presumption, and to put it the other way; but there is nothing in this clause, as I read it, to withdraw the matters affecting these two parishes from the cognisance of the Boundary Commissioners. I think it is fair to consider the great importance to the County of Dumbarton that the presumption should be put with them in respect of these parishes. The ancient connection of these two parishes is with the County of Dumbarton; so far as we can judge of the feelings and wishes of the people their wishes go with the County of Dumbarton. But, on the other hand, it would be obviously unfair, and everybody has admitted that the Stirlingshire people should get no compensation for the outlay at which they have been in regard to these two parishes if they are to be taken for road purposes out of their present district and put into the County of Dumbarton. Surely, the Bill as it stands is intended to operate thus, that while the presumption shall be with the County of Dumbarton, the Boundary Commissioners, under Clause 48, shall consider the whole circumstances of the case, and make such arrangements as shall seem to them fair. It may be that the Boundary Commissioners shall pay a money compensation to the County of Stirling. It may be that they will decree that these parishes should become part of the County of Stirling. It may be, on the other hand—at least I think there is nothing in the Bill to prevent it—that for all purposes except roads they shall be considered to be in Dumbarton, but that for road purposes they shall go Stirling. I think that is possible. We are simply considering on one side what the presumption shall be, and upon the facts stated by the noble Duke opposite, and on account of the historical connection with the County of Dumbarton, and of the great value of these parishes to that county in proportion to the whole value of the county, it is fair that the presumption should be in favour of Dumbarton. But I think the noble Marquess behind me who has charge of the Bill made it quite clear that even the Bill as it stands does not withdraw these two parishes from the cognisance of the Boundary Commissioners.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: I should like to have the opinion of the noble and learned Lord as to the construction of this clause. As it stands I certainly read it as a substantive clause, and so does the noble and learned Lord on the Cross Benches, and as he is one of the Judicial Members of your Lordships' House, I think his opinion on the construction of the clause is more relevant to this discussion than the opinions of my noble Friends opposite, although they are responsible for the drafting of the Bill. What I would like to know from the noble and learned Lord is whether he adheres to the interpretation he puts on it, that it does withdraw the case of these two parishes from the free discretion of the Boundary Commissioners?

*LORD WATSON: I am not fond of giving, and indeed cannot pretend to give, judicial decisions in Committee of your Lordships' House; but I do not hesitate to say that, in my opinion, the enactment is absolute, and that the County of Dumbarton would be much better off under the clause as it stands than under the clause as the noble Marquess proposes to extend it.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: I hope that before Report the noble Marquess will do this, which I think will be a fair compromise—that he will maintain the principle of the two previous existing local Acts, that there should be a distinct declaration on the part of Parliament that these two parishes are an integral part of the County of Dumbarton. They have been so for 400 years; they are an important part of the assessable value of the county; but with regard to the management of roads, and all the applications connected with it, the Boundary Commissioners should have full power over it.

THE MARQUESS OF LOTHIAN: I have no desire to change the presumption in this Bill, that is to say, that the two parishes should remain integral parts of the County of Dumbarton; but in consequence of the difficulty which has arisen, I am quite ready to consider the proposal of the noble Duke, and to state upon Report what conclusion we arrive at.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 41 agreed to.

Clause 42.

THE EARL OF ELGIN, in rising to move the insertion of a new clause, said: This clause is to meet the local circumstances of Fife. The Commissioners of Supply of the County of Fife do not possess any county buildings; they are all held under local Acts by the Court House Commissioners; and, as this Bill proposes to throw upon the County Council the duty of providing rooms for the meetings of the Commissioners of Supply, the Justices, and other Bodies, it is thought it would be necessary that they

to offer a smaller amount of rent. I venture to think it is really not a mistrust of the people of Scotland, but a simple and ordinary business-like precaution which is imposed, and whatever noble Lords opposite may say, it has really a much larger amount of sympathy than they would appear to make out among the constituencies of Scotland. I almost owe the House an apology for intruding at this stage, but I do think that the attempt to draw a parallel between the two cases will not hold water for a moment.

THE EARL OF MINTO: I do not like to allow this subject to pass away from your Lordships' consideration entirely without giving a short expression to my opinion upon it. That opinion substantially coincides with the opinion which has already been expressed by my noble Friend below me. Although I perhaps would not have used quite as strong language in speaking on the subject as he did, I fully concur in the opinion which has been so warmly expressed by the noble Duke and others that it is desirable control should be extended in some matters over the local expenditure and borrowing powers of the new Councils, which are now being called into existence, especially in the inception of their authority. I am inclined to regret that this control has been deposited in the hands of a different class belonging to the same community; but I do not believe that that authority will be the less exercised—I trust it will even be exercised with sympathy for the large portion of the community. Still, there does appear to me to be something rather obnoxious in the principle. It is like setting one class of the community as a controlling body over another, and I think in Scotland there will be some feeling on the subject, which I hope will not be a durable or a strong one. I should have been satisfied myself if the control over capital expenditure and borrowing powers had been deposited with the Secretary for Scotland alone.

Clause 18, as amended, agreed to.

Clauses 19 to 26 agreed to, with Amendments.

Clause 27.

propose the proviso which stands in his name. The reason of this Amendment is that in certain counties where works entailing large expenditure have been carried out, in certain cases it has been done by extra assessment instead of by borrowing, and under the arrangements of this Bill it will be necessary to calculate what was the "average rate" (those are the words of the Bill) paid by the owners during the last 10 years. In cases of this sort it is obvious that the average rate of owners will be much higher than it would have been if the expenditure had been defrayed in the ordinary way—namely, partly by rate and partly by borrowing. The object of the Amendment is to provide that in cases of this sort the Sheriff shall use his discretion and decide how much of this expenditure should be provided in the ordinary way.

"Provided further that where such branch of expenditure, or any part thereof, has been provided for by assessments instead of by borrowing, the Sheriff shall include in the average rate such proportion only of those assessments as, in his opinion, would have been levied if the sums necessary to meet such expenditure had been raised by borrowing."—(The Earl of Camperdown.)

THE MARQUESS OF LOTHIAN: I admit at first sight there appears to be a good deal to be said for this Amendment, but I would ask your Lordships to consider that the proposal under the Bill, as it now stands, is purely in the nature of a compromise under the Bill as it was first introduced into the House of Commons. There was at first no provision in the Bill applying to cases of this sort. It was proposed in the other House that these rates should be exempted altogether from the stereotyped rate, and this Bill, as it stands, is the result of a compromise on this question. I would ask your Lordships further to consider that in rating for expenditure year by year there are very few counties (I am not sure that there is more than one) who have considered that the expenditure is expenditure which ought to fall upon the rate of the year. In adding to the rates year by year for any capital expenditure they have thought that it was a proper yearly expenditure and it was done entirely by their own action.

there was no force upon them, and if they thought that they would do better by borrowing money and paying it by instalments, they would have done so; but they thought it right in their own interests that the capital expenditure should be put upon the rates of the current year. Apart from that I see a practical difficulty in the way of the proposal of the noble Lord. It is proposed that the Sheriff shall include in the average rate such proportion only of those assessments as in his opinion would have been levied if the sums necessary to meet such expenditure had been raised by borrowing. Does it not occur to the noble Lord that that is an almost impossible duty to throw upon the Sheriff? You would have no data to go upon by which to judge accurately what the proportion should be. I would like the noble Earl to suggest any way by which the Sheriff could come to a just decision. For these reasons, first, that I do not think it is expedient that the expenditure which has been made out of the annual rate of the county should be deducted from the stereotyped rate; and, secondly, because I think that if such a proposal were carried it would be impossible for the Sheriff to carry out the duties imposed upon him, I do not propose to accept the Amendment of the noble Lord.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: I admit there is some force in the second reason that the noble Lord has just given; but with regard to the first, I do not think he meets the case at all, and after all that is much the most important of the two. The case which Lord Aberdeen puts is this. Take the case of a county which for reasons best known to itself, thought it was better, having certain capital expenditure to make, to make that by paying the money down at once, instead of by borrowing. The noble Lord says: then they determined that that course was for their own interest. Yes; but they did not see that the noble Lord was going by this Bill to stereotype rates against the owners which would tell against them for all time to come. The noble Lord will remember that this formality which he proposes in this Bill is without any precedent whatsoever. The reason for it we all know is that hitherto these rates have been borne entirely by the owners, whereas now they are to be divided between the owners and occupiers. There has never been anything like this proposal in Local Government Acts or anything else. You say the Sheriff shall calculate what these rates have been during the last 10 years, and upon that he shall base a charge for all time to come. When the noble Lord says that this is a most difficult task to impose upon the Sheriff, I merely reply that the noble Lord has already set the Sheriff a task which is nearly equal in difficulty. The whole arrangement is one of the most extraordinary character, and moreover the ratepayers of the county, if they had foreseen that the provisions of this Bill were going to come into force, would never have adopted that form of paying the capital expenditure. That is the case as it appears to me for Lord Aberdeen's Amendment, and it seems to me that what the noble Lord has said is no answer to that case at all.

\*LORD BALFOUR: The duty cast upon the Sheriff by the Bill as it stands will surely not be much more than putting into practice some very simple rules of arithmetic. By the Amendment a large amount of what would be conjecture is imported into this matter. I have not heard the exact amount which is supposed to be involved, but as far as I know, in any county which is interested in this matter it is only a very small amount. I have heard it put for one county, and I believe it to be the county which is most affected, Renfrew, and in that case I believe the utmost that is involved is  $\frac{1}{2}$ d. in the £1. I speak from good information, but I do not put it forward absolutely. I believe there is another objection to it, that the real object of stereotyping has been to prevent any burden which has hitherto been fully borne by owners being transferred to the occupiers; but in any possible reading of this Amendment, if put into the Bill, the first effect of it would be—I admit to a very small extent, but to some extent—to put a burden on the occupier next year and in subsequent years which has hitherto, rightly or wrongly, as a matter of practice been borne by the owner. On this account I think it would be undesirable to accept the Amendment.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: I will not press the Amendment at this present stage, but I would like to ask the noble Lord to consider this matter

before Report. The noble Lord said just now that hitherto this rate has been borne by the owner, and, therefore, he should not like to make any change. You are doing a great deal more than that, you are saying that because a county has acted for prudence sake in a particular way, therefore the owners are to be fined to that extent. I do not know what county Lord Aberdeen may have in view, but there are two or three counties in which they have actually levied rates—I know in Forfarshire there is a balance actually in hand of £2,000 at this moment, which has been levied by rates. If that money is not expended in some way the result will be that for all time to come there will be an additional charge upon all owners in that county. There is the same thing in Renfrew and in Linlithgow and other countries. I quite admit that we must do everything we can to prevent anything falling upon occupiers which has hitherto been borne by owners, but there is an equal duty to prevent the owner having burdens which he would certainly not have taken upon himself if he could have foreseen that this Act was going to come into force.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: I should be very glad if the noble Marquess would consider this matter before Report. There is no doubt that the principle of the Bill is not carried into effect unless the clause is rectified in this particular. There is no reason why you should deduct rates which have been expended upon public property if borrowed and not deduct also the same rates when, instead of being borrowed, they have been paid by the ratepayers. I cannot conceive any difficulty in ascertaining the sum, and as regards the amount it would be simply a matter of calculation, because the sums are usually borrowed for so many years, and the Sheriff will have nothing to do but to ascertain the amounts to be levied in this particular manner and to calculate when upon the usual rate of borrowing they would have to be repaid.

THE MARQUESS OF LOTHIAN: Although I still adhere to the opinion I have expressed, I cannot resist the request that I should at least consider this question before Report. I will do so, and will be very glad to have any suggestions that noble Lords may make upon the subject.

*THE MARQUESS OF HUNTLY: As the noble Marquess is so congenial I venture to hope that he will recognise that the principle that is embodied in this clause, or, as I think he called it, the arrangement that had been come to, the compromise, is a very good one. The object of my Amendment is to fix some date at which it will terminate. As I caught the expression of the noble Lord (Lord Balfour) he said that this rate was really a matter of arrangement between the owner and the occupier. The effect of this clause will be that for ever and for ever the estate of an owner will be practically mortgaged with this average rate; it will be stereotyped upon his property; the Sheriff under Sub-section (1) will fix the 10 years' average that the owner will have to pay in consideration of this rate, and this average rate will be absolutely fixed and for ever stereotyped upon his estate. According to Sub-section 3 the demand note will state the average rate and the increment thereof, that is—the increment which is to be demanded by the tax collector is to be paid equally by the owners and occupiers. If we acknowledge that sooner or later these rates do come to be a question of arrangement between the owner and the occupier, why do we not fix a term at which the arrangement under this Bill will come to an end. In Scotland the usual term is the 19 years' lease. I have proposed to take 10 years as the term of ending. I would remind the House also that every other rate in the Bill is proposed to be paid equally by the occupiers and the owners—the road rate, the sanitary rate, the public health rate. Yet you are going to stereotype for ever and ever the owners of the property with this rate.

THE MARQUESS OF LOTHIAN: I am afraid the noble Marquess will not find me in the conciliatory mood to which he referred at the beginning of his remarks. I can understand noble Lords' objection to stereotyped rates, and that is an objection which will probably be felt by a very great many owners throughout Scotland. At the same time, the provision that there should be a stereotyped rate upon owners is one that has been most carefully considered, and it is part of the Bill, and to accept the noble Marquess's proposal would be to alter one of the main parts of the Bill, so far as the rates are concerned. Under the Bill it is proposed that this stereotyping should be, as the noble Marquess has said, perpetual. It is a rate which will be under the Act, when it becomes an Act, a perpetual obligation upon the owners, although I understand that this proposal of the noble Marquess is that there should be a revision after 10 years. I would put it to the noble Marquess that if the principle is sound it is much better to enact it once and for all, because if there was any prospect of any such revision either of the amount of the stereotyped rate, or the abolition of the stereotyped rate altogether, it would necessarily create an indefiniteness in the stereotyped rate, which would be unfortunate in the interests both of the owners and the occupiers. I think it much better, as proposed by the Bill, that the stereotyped rate should remain a fixture, although I quite understand the disinclination of the noble Marquess and others to having a stereotyped rate on the property. The only indefiniteness now is the increase above the stereotyped rate which would be put upon owners by the action of the County Council. I am afraid I cannot accept the Amendment of the noble Marquess.

*THE MARQUESS OF HUNTLY: I wish to ask the noble Lord whether this has occurred to him: Suppose this average rate is fixed upon a county at the present rateable value, and suppose the rateable value of that county were to increase enormously; the rates would be fixed then, without any power of increasing or altering that rate. I think the County Council of Lanark, at any rate, would not know what to do.

*LORD BALFOUR: If the rateable value increases, there will be a less amount per £1 required. Therefore, if the rateable value increases, the whole present rate will not be required, and the owner will get the benefit.

*THE MARQUESS OF HUNTLY: I will withdraw the Amendment.

THE EARL OF ELGIN: The object of the Amendment, of which I have given notice, is to deal with the case of detached portions of a county in which there might be a difference between the average rate as between the county from which it is detached, and that to which it is attached; but, as I understand that the noble Lord has not had time to consider this Amendment, perhaps he would consider it before Report.

THE MARQUESS OF LOTHIAN: It did not appear to me to be necessary, but I prefer to consider it on Report, as I have not yet seen the Amendment of the noble Lord.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 28.

*THE MARQUESS OF TWEEDDALE: The object of the Amendment which stands in my name is to confer on Corporations representation in consideration of contribution to local rates. As the law stands at present, Corporations, such as Railway Companies and others, are entitled to very substantial representation on all the Local Boards of Scotland. Under the present Bill this representation is denied them altogether. I frankly admit that I do not anticipate a very hearty reception to this Amendment from the noble Marquess, but having in consideration the fact that the contribution of the Railway Companies amount to £200,000 a year, and the fact that in many counties they are the largest ratepayers, I think the noble Lord will not deny that they have a very large interest in the proper collection of rates, and in the efficient disposal of them. The representation which I ask for them is a very small one indeed, but it does recognise a principle which appears to me to be departed from in this Bill—the principle that where rates are paid representation should go hand in hand with them. At any rate I shall ask my noble Friend if he will explain on what ground, on what principle the representation is altogether denied to these bodies who, as I have said, contribute so largely to the local rates in Scotland.

Amendment moved, in page 21, line 10, after "county elector" add—

"And every company or corporation owning or occupying property shall be entitled to have the name of their chairman or secretary or other official placed on this supplementary register and that he be thereby constituted a county elector."—(The Marquess of Tweeddale.)

THE MARQUESS OF LOTHIAN: In answer to the last question of the noble Marquess, I think the burden of proof rather rests upon him than upon me. He asks that I should consent to put a certain position, under this Bill, upon persons who do not otherwise have it under the Bill, and which position would be entirely exceptional. I do not quite understand the object of the noble Marquess unless it is this, that in every district there should be some direct representation of some Corporation, or the particular Corporations, if I may say so, which he represents—namely, the Railway Companies, as the direct representation of the parish in every electoral district. In the first place, I should say that one single voter in each electoral district would not probably make very much difference one way or the other to the interests of a great company such as that which the noble Marquess represents. On the other hand, if there was special representation given to the interest he represents it would be going, as I said just now, against the principle of the Bill, for the electorate is based upon the Parliamentary register, and you will have to introduce another register to meet the proposal of the noble Marquess. But if the object is to have direct representation upon the County Council, then, of course, there comes a rather more important question. But I ask the noble Marquess to consider this—that it is not only the very large Corporations which would come under such a clause as that which he proposes, but Corporations of all sizes. Very large and important Corporations would be represented; but, if so, even small and unimportant Corporations would have to be represented also, and the question of gradation between the large and small Corporations would be quite inconsistent with the existing principles both of Imperial and local representation. I do not think the noble Marquess need be very much alarmed as to want of representation, because surely in the cases of Corporations such as that he represents there would be no difficulty in finding proper representatives in every district for the County Council. In his own county I have no doubt that the noble Marquess, as Chairman of the Company, would easily find a seat upon the County Council, as indeed I hope he will. However, I should say that there will be no difficulty whatever in any district. That remark would refer not only to such an interest as that of a Railway Company, but of all other Corporations of a large and important description. I think what the noble Marquess asks me to do is to introduce a new principle into the Bill altogether, and one which I do not think the object which he would seek to obtain would justify me in agreeing to, and therefore I am afraid that in this case I must also decline to accept his Amendment.

Amendment (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 29 to 39 agreed to.

Clause 40.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: I beg to move the omission of this clause. I may explain to your Lordships very briefly the history of these two parishes, which rejoice in the names of Cumbernauld and Kirkintilloch. They belonged, some time ago, to a noble Lord, and I think it suited him that those parishes should be comprised within the County of Dumbarton, and he arranged accordingly; and these two parishes, although they are not adjacent to the County of Dumbarton, and are separated from it, were, and still are—for all purposes except that of roads—part of the County of Dumbarton. When the Road Act of 1878 was passed no special arrangement was made with reference to these parishes, and, in pursuance of the terms of the Act, it came to pass that the County of Stirling—of which these two are the largest parishes—became the county to which, for road management, they belonged. In consequence of that arrangement, the County of Stirling has made a road district of which, I believe, these parishes form more than a half. A good deal of expenditure has fallen upon the county in consequence. This Bill proposes to take these two parishes, and to take them out of the County of Stirling, in which they have been for the last 10 years, and to put them into the County of Dumbarton. To that arrangement the County of Stirling strongly objects. With regard to the merits of the case, I do not wish to say anything, but the case which I have to present to the House is this, that by the clauses which come a little later in the Bill the Government is establishing Boundary Commissioners, whose duty it is to consider and to settle questions of this very sort, and it seems to me that this question which is contained in Clause 40 is exactly one of the questions which the Boundary Commissioners are appointed to settle. The County of Stirling complains very bitterly that it has not been heard on this Bill. It says that the clause was not in the Bill originally, and at a comparatively late stage in the progress through the House of Commons the clause was inserted, and the County of Stirling against whose interest it militates had no opportunity of stating their case against the clause. I do not think I need say anything further. Perhaps there is one little remark I ought to make. Suppose that this clause is struck out of the Bill, it is represented (and I think this is the strongest argument that can be produced against me) that these two parishes, which are now part of the County of Stirling for roads only, and are part of the County of Dumbarton for health and all other purposes, will become part of the County of Stirling for all purposes. I admit that that appears to be something of a case against me, but I would point out that the only effect really would be this, that it would make it imperative for you to delay this clause, and imperative upon the Commissioners to settle and decide this question, and that is exactly what I think ought to be done, and exactly what the principle of this Bill lays down as the duty of the Commissioners.

*THE DUKE OF MONTROSE: I rise to support the Amendment of the noble Lord. I may say I live in Stirlingshire, and am conversant with county business, and know how detrimental it will be to the County if these two Parishes are taken away too summarily by Act of Parliament. I do not suppose for a moment that Stirlingshire wishes to retain these two Counties if it is considered advisable that they should be handed over to Dumbartonshire, but there are financial questions of considerable importance, and, besides, there are several other parishes in the County of Stirling which are more or less on the same footing as those two, and it is for those reasons that the county considers that the question should be decided by the County Commissioners, and that no good cause has been shown for singling out those two Parishes out of the whole scheme for this special legislation. I hope the noble Marquess will see his way to omit this clause.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: After the two speeches we have listened to one would think that the tedium of discussions in this House is likely to be relieved by a revival of the battle of the clans. I rise on the part of the County of Dumbarton to protest against the Government agreeing to this amendment. There are very curious historical matters in connection with this clause. The County of Dumbarton is one of the oldest and most interesting historical counties in Scotland. It has a strong esprit de corps of its own; it has a history of its own. The ancient County of Dumbarton, as the noble Duke well knows (for a considerable part of the ancient territory belongs to him) was the Lennox, one of the old and most important historical divisions in Scotland, giving one of its oldest titles to the Royal Family of Scotland. The word Lennox is derived from the Valley of the Leven; it is a mere corruption of Levenax. As long ago as the 14th or 15th century there was a division made owing to certain circumstances of convenience at that time, in which two large divisions (parishes now) were annexed to the Parish of Dumbarton to the eastward of its old boundary, and in exchange for that no less than seven parishes were detached from the ancient Lennox, and given to the County of Stirling. It is an old bargain, 300 or 400 years old, and what is gravely proposed to this House now is that this old bargain should be revoked, and that the County of Stirling should annex the two great Parishes of Kirkintilloch and Cumbernauld in order to get their assessment within their own boundary without giving up the corresponding parishes.

*THE DUKE OF MONTROSE: The noble Duke misunderstands me.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: That is the effect of the repeal of this clause. My noble Friend has also stated it rather broadly to the House when he speaks of this as a change from the existing state of things. The effect of the 40th Clause is to keep the existing state of things. I have read with much astonishment the statement made by the Commissioners of Supply of the County of Stirling. They say distinctly that—

“The position of the Parishes of Kirkintilloch and Cumbernauld is exactly identical with the Parish of Kelenore and in former Acts of Parliament concerning Local Government, have been treated accordingly.”

That is quite at variance with the fact. The two last important Acts which have been passed for Local Government in Scotland, one in 1857 and the other in 1868, had a clause precisely similar to this. The one was an Act of 1857 for regulating the police in counties and burghs in Scotland, and the other in 1868 was for levying the general County Assessment. In both these Statutes there was a corresponding clause the two parishes of Kirkintilloch and Cumbernauld, and preserving them in their ancient historical connection with the County of Dumbarton. This will be a serious matter for the County of Dumbarton. The two parishes of Kirkintilloch and Cumbernauld originally at the time of the old contract were empty moor land and very poor land. They are now full of mineral riches and afford a large field for assessment by the County of Dumbarton, and the only pretence for leaving out this clause is that for road purposes these two parishes were created a separate district in connection with the County of Stirling. That is quite natural. For road purposes they are surrounded by two different counties, and it would be inconvenient that they should be separated from their coterminous boundaries. But as regards judicial work and police they have always preserved their connection with the County of Dumbarton, and the County of Dumbarton objects to having so large and accessible an area withdrawn from its ancient boundaries. The Government in putting in this 40th Clause have followed precisely the precedent followed by the two last Local Acts connected with the Government of Scotland, and I object exceedingly to the Amendment, and I hope the Government will resist it.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: I omitted to state what was really the very strongest argument I possessed, which is this, that if this Clause 40 is allowed to stand in the Bill the Commissioners will have no power to settle questions of expenditure which may arise, because the matter in question will have been disposed of. But it seemed just now as if there was going to be a regular Battle of the Clans. I thought Loch Lomond was going to rush down from Stirling to Inverary. But after all, the noble Duke and I are not so very far apart. He says he only wants to keep the existing state of things—that is all I want to keep. For the purposes of road management, these two parishes, in despite of all ancient history, have been part of the County of Stirling for the last 10 years. For the purposes of police, health, &c., they have been part of the County of Dumbarton. We do not want to change either of these things, but it is the noble Duke's friends who put into the Bill a clause which summarily removes these two parishes from Stirling, and settles the question in favour of Dumbarton. Our proposal is simply this. We say hand the existing state of things, both with regard to roads and police, over to the Boundary Commissioners as you proposed to do with all other questions. Let them settle the question in the manner which seems to them best; they are the only people who can settle it satisfactorily and fairly, because they are the only people who have power to settle financial questions between the two counties.

*LORD WATSON: Having had something to do with the Roads and Bridges Act of 1878, perhaps your Lordships will allow me to make an observation with respect to this question. I thought at that time that Dumbartonshire was somewhat severely treated, but with necessary severity, because there were certain great turnpike roads that ran through the two counties of Lanark and Stirling, and traversed this outlying part of Dumbartonshire. It was very expedient in the state of matters at that time that the road authorities of Stirlingshire should have charge and control within this district, but I must say that it never entered into the mind of anyone who had to do with the Measure that they ought in the least degree to impair the integrity of the somewhat small County of Dumbarton. I believe that owing to the spread of railway communication in Scotland and the consequent of long-distance traffic over these main lines of road, the causes which rendered it very proper to incorporate for road purposes only these two parishes with the County of Stirling in the year 1878, have been gradually disappearing, and that the area now contains district roads only properly so called. At the same time there is a good deal to be said for part of the observations of the noble Earl. These two parishes have hitherto been dealt with as an integral part of one of the Stirlingshire Road Districts. There may have been liabilities incurred by Stirlingshire with respect to this part of Dumbartonshire, which for road purposes Dumbartonshire ought not to retain without taking over its due share of liabilities, and if the noble Marquess who has charge of the measure could see his way to it, I think the present clause might stand, with an addition to the effect of making a reference to the Boundary Commissioners under the Act to settle any question of disputed compensation between the two counties.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: I do not understand the 40th Clause to prevent the existing arrangement in regard to roads only continuing. I do not think it will.

*LORD WATSON: It puts an end to the existing road arrangements and is intended to do so, I believe.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: I have no objection myself, personally—I do not know what may be the opinion of the whole body of the Commissioners of Supply of the County of Dumbarton, but I see no objection to the continuance of the existing state of things as regards the roads only, but the striking out of this clause would be practically the annexation of these parishes to the County of Stirling.

THE DUKE OF HAMILTON: None of the noble Lords who have spoken have informed us what are the wishes and sentiment of the inhabitants of the two parishes upon this point. Would not the Boundary Commissioners be able to inform us upon the subject?

THE MARQUESS OF LOTHIAN: This is apparently a very difficult question. I have given a great deal of consideration to it, because the question has been brought very strongly before me in the interests both of the County of Stirling and the County of Dumbarton. First of all I would like to say, in reference to what has fallen from the noble Lord who has just spoken as to the feelings of the two parishes of Kirkintilloch and

Cumbernauld, that I think that what their views are may be fairly taken for granted from the course which they have hitherto followed. In 1857, as the noble Duke has said, under the Police Act, the position of these two parishes was maintained, but there was a proviso enabling the two parishes to be transferred to the County of Stirling if the ratepayers wished. The ratepayers never took advantage of those powers, and we may judge from that of what their wishes were. In 1868 an identical clause was inserted, and the ratepayers followed the same course. Therefore we may take it for granted that they do not wish to be transferred, but wish to remain part of the County of Dumbarton. With reference to what the noble Duke said just now as to these two parishes remaining in the County of Stirling simply under the Road Act, I do not think that that is possible. The effect of this clause as it stands would be to transfer the whole power both under the Road Act, and the Police Act, and all the other Acts to the County of Dumbarton. With regard to the financial aspect of the question the noble Earl seemed to confine his observations to the matter of roads only; but it must be recollected that the financial aspect also touches Dumbarton at this moment with reference to all the rates. The rateable value in these two parishes is enormous. Out of £450,000 the annual value of the whole county, these two parishes account for £81,000, or 18 per cent of the whole. If that was taken away from Dumbarton, as it would be according to the proposal of the noble Earl, it would make an enormous difference to the County of Dumbarton. With reference to what the noble Earl said just now as to the financial arrangements between the two counties with reference to any capital which might have been spent under the Road Act in these two parishes, I think there is very great force in what the noble Earl has said. I understand that the County of Stirling has spent about £2,000 of capital upon the roads in these two parishes of Dumbartonshire, and it certainly would be a very strong thing to transfer the two parishes to Dumbartonshire for road purposes without some compensation by which this £2,000 or some equivalent sum might be given back to

Stirling. The whole question before the Committee is whether really these two parishes should be placed within the jurisdiction of the Boundary Commissioners. My own opinion is that, under the Bill, the Boundary Commissioners have powers to deal with these parishes, but the clause, as it stands, does not take them out of the administration or powers of the Boundary Commissioners; but if there is any doubt upon that point, I should like to make it clear that it is not the intention of the Bill that they should be taken away for reference to the Boundary Commissioners, and I propose, therefore, at the end of Clause 40, to introduce words to this effect—

“That nothing in this section contained shall affect or limit the powers and duties of the Boundary Commissioners or the Secretary of State for Scotland under this Act.”

I think if those words were introduced, leaving Clause 40 as it now stands, it would give an indication to the Boundary Commissioners that in the opinion of Parliament these two parishes ought to remain as they now are, part of the County of Dumbarton, and to give to the Boundary Commissioners the right to take evidence and to make any arrangement they think fit as to pecuniary matters between Dumbarton and Stirling.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: I do not quite understand the proposal of my noble Friend. Does he mean that the Boundary Commissioners may transfer these parishes wholly, for all purposes, from Dumbarton to Stirling, because that I should certainly object to. To give the Boundary Commissioners power to trace boundaries between parishes, and arrange as to deviations and so forth, is a very different thing to giving power to such a body to cut off what has been a substantial part of a Scotch county from all its history and associations.

THE MARQUESS OF LOTHIAN: I am afraid that would be the effect of my proposal—it would give that power to the Boundary Commissioners, although I do not think that would be the result, but I do not see how otherwise it would be possible to make provision for payment of compensation for the differences between the two counties.

from the cognisance of the Boundary Commissioners, and I am quite prepared to accept the proposal which has been made.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: It seems to me that the Amendment of my noble Friend is virtually the repeal of this clause, because this clause runs on all fours with the clauses in the previous Act of 1878. What I suggest to my noble Friend is that the Boundary Commissioners should have special power to make special arrangements in any case that may arise, but that they should not have the power to disintegrate altogether these two parishes.

*LORD WATSON: I entirely sympathise with the observations made by the noble Duke. If the clause has the meaning which the noble Marquess seems to attach to it it ought to have run thus:—

“The Commissioners in exercising their powers under this Act shall treat the County of Dumbarton as if it had contained these two parishes within its limits up to this date.”

That seems to be the view which he takes of this clause. I cannot so read it. It is a substantive enactment to the effect that for every purpose in this Bill these two parishes shall be considered as forming part of the County of Dumbarton, and after enacting that substantively in the first part of the clause, it is proposed to add a contradiction in terms—namely, that these shall not be for the purposes of this Act part of the County of Dumbarton if the Commissioners under the Act shall so will it.

*LORD BALFOUR: I can see nothing in the Bill to prevent the Boundary Commissioners dealing with these two parishes as the Bill now stands; all the Bill does is to alter the first presumption. The presumption throughout the whole Bill is that the contents of counties for the purposes of this Bill shall be the contents according to the Roads and Bridges Act. The effect of this clause as it stands is in respect of these two parishes to alter the presumption, and to put it the other way; but there is nothing in this clause, as I read it, to withdraw the matters affecting these two parishes from the cognisance of the Boundary Commissioners. I think it is fair to consider the great importance to the County of Dumbarton that the presumption should be put with them in respect of these parishes. The ancient connection of these two parishes is with the County of Dumbarton; so far as we can judge of the feelings and wishes of the people their wishes go with the County of Dumbarton. But, on the other hand, it would be obviously unfair, and everybody has admitted that the Stirlingshire people should get no compensation for the outlay at which they have been in regard to these two parishes if they are to be taken for road purposes out of their present district and put into the County of Dumbarton. Surely, the Bill as it stands is intended to operate thus, that while the presumption shall be with the County of Dumbarton, the Boundary Commissioners, under Clause 48, shall consider the whole circumstances of the case, and make such arrangements as shall seem to them fair. It may be that the Boundary Commissioners shall pay a money compensation to the County of Stirling. It may be that they will decree that these parishes should become part of the County of Stirling. It may be, on the other hand—at least I think there is nothing in the Bill to prevent it—that for all purposes except roads they shall be considered to be in Dumbarton, but that for road purposes they shall go Stirling. I think that is possible. We are simply considering on one side what the presumption shall be, and upon the facts stated by the noble Duke opposite, and on account of the historical connection with the County of Dumbarton, and of the great value of these parishes to that county in proportion to the whole value of the county, it is fair that the presumption should be in favour of Dumbarton. But I think the noble Marquess behind me who has charge of the Bill made it quite clear that even the Bill as it stands does not withdraw these two parishes from the cognisance of the Boundary Commissioners.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: I should like to have the opinion of the noble and learned Lord as to the construction of this clause. As it stands I certainly read it as a substantive clause, and so does the noble and learned Lord on the Cross Benches, and as he is one of the Judicial Members of your Lordships' House, I think his opinion on the construction of the clause is more relevant to this discussion than the opinions of my noble Friends opposite, although they are responsible for the drafting of the Bill. What I would like to know from the noble and learned Lord is whether he adheres to the interpretation he puts on it, that it does withdraw the case of these two parishes from the free discretion of the Boundary Commissioners?

*LORD WATSON: I am not fond of giving, and indeed cannot pretend to give, judicial decisions in Committee of your Lordships' House; but I do not hesitate to say that, in my opinion, the enactment is absolute, and that the County of Dumbarton would be much better off under the clause as it stands than under the clause as the noble Marquess proposes to extend it.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: I hope that before Report the noble Marquess will do this, which I think will be a fair compromise—that he will maintain the principle of the two previous existing local Acts, that there should be a distinct declaration on the part of Parliament that these two parishes are an integral part of the County of Dumbarton. They have been so for 400 years; they are an important part of the assessable value of the county; but with regard to the management of roads, and all the applications connected with it, the Boundary Commissioners should have full power over it.

THE MARQUESS OF LOTHIAN: I have no desire to change the presumption in this Bill, that is to say, that the two parishes should remain integral parts of the County of Dumbarton; but in consequence of the difficulty which has arisen, I am quite ready to consider the proposal of the noble Duke, and to state upon Report what conclusion we arrive at.

Clause 42.

THE EARL OF ELGIN, in rising to move the insertion of a new clause, said: This clause is to meet the local circumstances of Fife. The Commissioners of Supply of the County of Fife do not possess any county buildings; they are all held under local Acts by the Court House Commissioners; and, as this Bill proposes to throw upon the County Council the duty of providing rooms for the meetings of the Commissioners of Supply, the Justices, and other Bodies, it is thought it would be necessary that they should have possession of the county buildings. There does not seem to be any reason for maintaining the separate existence of the Court House Commissioners, and therefore, by this new clause, I propose that all their duties and obligations should be transferred to the County Council.

Amendment moved, in page 30, after Clause 41, insert as a new Clause—

“With respect to the application of this Act to the county of Fife, there shall be enacted the following provision, namely: The Acts fifth and sixth William the Fourth, chapter sixty, intituled ‘An Act for providing in or near the burgh of Cupar more extensive accommodation for holding the courts and meetings of the sheriff, justices of the peace, and commissioners of supply of the county of Fife, and for the custody of the records of the said county,’ and the Act tenth Victoria, chapter thirty-two, known as ‘The Dunfermline and Cupar Court Houses Act, 1847,’ are hereby repealed, and all the powers and rights conferred by said Acts, and the duties, obligations, and liabilities imposed by said Acts or otherwise upon the commissioners for whose appointment said Acts provide, and all lands, buildings, funds, effects, and property of whatever description belonging to or vested in said commissioners, and all debts and obligations of whatever nature of said commissioners, are hereby transferred to the county council of the county of Fife.”—(The Earl of Elgin.)

Clause 44 (in the Bill 43).

THE EARL OF ELGIN: If I am right in understanding that the sub-section of this clause will have the effect of attaching every detached portion of a county as it is attached under the Roads and Bridges Act for all purposes, and, at the same time, that that will not withdraw it from the cognizance of the Boundary Commissioners hereafter, to determine whether it would not be better to attach it to some other county, then the Amendment which I have on the Paper would not be necessary.

THE MARQUESS OF LOTHIAN: The interpretation which the noble Lord has just put on the sub-section is quite correct, and I was going to ask the noble Lord to withdraw his Amendment, because it is not necessary.

Remaining Clauses to Clause 76 (in the Bill 75) agreed to.

Clause 77 (in the Bill 76).

LORD ELGIN: I wish to point out to the noble Marquess that it appears to me he has omitted to provide in this clause for the case of a County that does not divide itself into districts. The proviso states that a county, if it think it expedient, need not divide itself into districts in certain cases, but if that happens what is to be done with regard to the powers and the duties of the district itself? The following clause, which lays down the constitution of the district itself, is specially limited to that denomination, and I imagine that under this constitution, if a County Council resolves that it would not divide itself into districts there would be no means of introducing into the County Council for the management of the roads and the administration of the Public Health Act, the representatives of the Parochial Board and the representatives of the burghs, who are admitted under the next following clause. Now I do not quite follow how the administration would be carried out. Under these circumstances I beg to move the proviso of which I have given notice, unless the noble Marquess would like to consider it further.

Amendment moved, in page 53, after line 27, insert—

“Provided also that where a county is not divided into districts the County Council shall, for the purposes of this section, be constituted in like manner as a District Committee under this Act.”—(The Lord Elgin.)

THE MARQUESS OF LOTHIAN: I think the suggestion of the noble Lord is very reasonable one, but it has only just been put into my hands, and I would like to consider it before Report.

Amendment (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

Clause 81 (in the Bill 80.)

*THE MARQUESS OF TWEEDDALE: It would appear that if a special war supply district became included in a district formed under this Bill, which will include several parishes, the District Council would be entitled to levy a rate upon the whole district, and not upon the special water districts. Suppose a special district is formed in one parish, and that parish forms part of one of the new districts about to be formed. The rate for the special water district would be levied on the whole. That would be unfair to the parishes which it is proposed to unite in forming districts under the Bill. I beg therefore to move the following Amendment.

Amendment moved, in page 55, at end of clause add as new Sub-section—

"(4.) All expenditure incurred by such Local Authority in any water supply or drainage district, including repayment of debt and interest, shall be assessed, as hitherto on the lands and heritages within such water supply or drainage district. Clause 82, page 55, line 32, leave out from the first "the" to end of line 9, page 56; Sub-section 3, page 56, line 10, leave out "may" and insert "shall."—(The Marquess of Tweeddale.)

THE MARQUESS OF LOTHIAN: I think the noble Marquess has pointed out a difficulty which may exist under the wording of the Bill, but I cannot say at this moment that I am prepared to accept the exact words of the Amendment, and I would like to have an opportunity of considering this with the other matters which have been postponed and putting it right upon Report.

Amendment, by leave of the House, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 82 (in the Bill Clause 81) agreed to.

Clause 83 (in the Bill Clause 82.)

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: The Amendment standing in the name of the noble Lord Elgin is much the same as an Amendment which I have put down on the Paper, and my noble Friend has asked me to state our reasons for it. In some observations which I addressed to your Lordships to-night, I referred to the Treasury as a terrible Department. I am afraid we have here an example of the effect of the Treasury influence upon the drafting of Bills. I believe these clauses were put in in the other House of Parliament at the last moment and attracted very little notice or attention. I have not spoken to any one person connected with Scotland who has not most seriously objected to them. The state of the matter is this: In 1857, Parliament passed an Act enabling the Commissioners of Supply of all the Scotch counties to appoint a Revenue Officer as their County Valuer, and holding out to them the advantage that if they did so the expense of the valuation would be borne by the Treasury. That is more than 30 years ago. A very large number of the counties of Scotland have taken advantage of that provision. It so happens that the county with which I have chiefly the honour of being connected did not adopt it. We have an Assessor of our own who conducts all the valuations for public purposes; he is a very able officer, and I trust the County Council will not be likely to change him. Out of all the counties of Scotland, all but four did take advantage of this Act of 1857. For 30 years they have been in the habit of appointing as their own Valuer some public officer of the Revenue, and I believe the arrangement has worked most satisfactorily. I have often heard Mr. Gladstone in former days, when I was his colleague, speak of the effective manner in which these matters were conducted in Scotland, and the punctuality with which public taxes were paid. Very much of this depends on the unity of action between the County and the Treasury in these matters. This has been going on for more than 30 years and given great satisfaction, and yet now in this Local Government Bill comes this formidable proviso, "Provided that where the Assessor is an officer of Inland Revenue any regulations made by the County Council with respect to his duties and conduct shall be subject to the approval of the Treasury."

That is to say that we can no longer appoint a Government officer without making ourselves, through him, the servant of the Treasury obliged to receive any orders the Treasury may issue in respect of valuations, I suppose, or in respect of the duties of that office. That is a very serious demand, and it is quite possible that it may lead to the abandonment by the Scotch counties of that happy system under which the two authorities have been working together, of employing officers mutually appointed for all common purposes, at least for purposes which are common to them in a very large extent. Now, what is the object of this new arrangement? I cannot conceive it. Of course, under the present system, when we appoint a Revenue officer we do not withdraw him from the cognisance and superintendence of the Treasury. The Treasury may dismiss any of their officers whenever they please, and the County would then have to look for another Assessor, but practically I believe such a disagreement has never happened. On page 57, at the top, there is another proviso—

“Provided that where the Assessor is an officer of Inland Revenue, the amount of the salary, wages, and allowances awarded to him shall be subject to the approval of the Treasury.”

Now, I am unwilling to ascribe to the Treasury any object which is not openly avowed; but it looks uncommonly as if the Treasury wished to withdraw the advantage which, under the present Act of Parliament, we now enjoy, and which was held out to us by the Act of 1857, that in such case the expense attending the assessment by such officers should be defrayed by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue. It is quite clear that if the Treasury have an absolute power of dictating what the salary shall be, they may exact a bargain from all the counties that the salary shall be such as to relieve them of half the expense which they now pay on the cost of valuations. If that is the object of the Treasury I think it should be avowed and provided for in a special clause; but as the Bill now stands it is dissociated from any public purpose of any value, and is open to grave suspicion as regards its object, and certainly may be construed as exercising an effect upon the future position of the County Councils. If the Government wish to deal with this question separately I have nothing to say—if they wish to revise the bargain which was made in 1857 with the Scotch counties on this subject I have no objection; but it is hardly fair to introduce into this Bill a clause which will have this effect without its having been really discussed or contemplated by the counties of Scotland.

THE EARL OF ELGIN: After what the noble Duke has said I will say nothing further than that I was myself going to move to delete the last part of this clause, and that I was asked to do so by the Town Council of the Burgh of Inverary, and also by the Bills Committee of the Commissioners of Supply of Aberdeen. I believe that a Select Committee is sitting at the present time to inquire into the valuation of rating in Scotland, and I think it would be very much better to wait at all events till that Committee had reported, and then to deal with the whole subject.

Amendment moved, in page 56, line 19, to leave out from “provided,” to “Burgh,” in line 28.—(The Duke of Argyll.)

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: There is no subject more interesting to a well-constituted Parliamentary mind than examination into the motives which guide the Treasury. A perfect wealth of interesting problems are suggested by that study; but I must say I think the noble Lord has in this case attributed too grave and sinister a meaning to these clauses. I think that they are simply the thought of the draftsman to protect the Treasury from any exceptional diminution of the functions and powers which it already possesses; because if the noble Lord will consider, he will see that according to our present conception of the law every one of the things which is enacted by these provisos the Treasury can secure itself by threatening to dismiss the man unless they are fulfilled. Therefore I conclude that the draftsman has been afraid that the language of the clause would oust the Treasury of this natural jurisdiction. That jurisdiction must remain to it. The Treasury must have the power of dismissing its officers if it chooses, and of course if it can dismiss its officers when it chooses, it can insist that any regulations made with respect to their duties and conduct are such as it approves of. In the same way it insists that the amount of the salaries and allowances shall be such as it approves of, or the officer goes; and either that they thought it a more respectful mode of dealing with County Councils, or as I think is more probable that it is one of those things which the draftsman put in ex abundanti cautela in order to prevent in legislative action that which is not necessary, they have put in what to the lay mind seems mere surplusage. I am afraid I cannot say that I have any message from the Treasury; but the Treasury do not live very far from here, and are in a state of vitality in the course of the day, and their view can be easily ascertained, but I am convinced that it has no such dark and sinister meaning as the noble Lord attaches to it.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: All that is asked by those who oppose this clause is that the position with regard to the Assessors in the Scottish counties should be left exactly as it is. That has existed, as the noble Duke has pointed out, for 30 years, and I suppose that during that time the Treasury have had control over their officers in all respects as the noble Marquess opposite would desire for them. I wish also to emphasize what the noble Lord opposite has said, that this matter is one which was specially brought before a Select Committee of the other House last year, which was appointed for the very purpose of inquiring into the valuation question in Scotland. This question was brought before the Committee by the representatives of the Inland Revenue in Edinburgh, and the very proposals which are now embodied in this Bill were brought forward by that officer as an alteration which he desired to make in the law. Therefore, I think the particular provisions cannot have been introduced as the noble Marquess has said by accident.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I did not say that. I said ex abundanti cautela.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: Exactly; but they must have been introduced by the Treasury in order to bear out the views which their officer expressed before the Select Committee. That Select Committee has been re-appointed this year; it has not presented its Report, and under the circumstances I think it is only fair to the Scotch counties that, as the noble Duke behind me (the Duke of Argyll) suggested, the whole subject should be left over to be treated separately if the Government were so advised, after the Report of the Select Committee.

THE EARL OF GALLOWAY: I think it would obviate the objections to this clause if these words were added:—

"That the Commissioners of Supply in counties and Magistrates in burghs in appointing the Inland Revenue Officers as Assessors in their respective spheres, should retain the privileges given them in so doing under the Land Valuation Amendment Act of 1857, 17 and 18 Victoria, Chapter 88."

It seems to me that that would be a solution which would meet the views of everybody.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: Before my noble Friend answers I would suggest that these clauses, which I believe to be unnecessary as regards the power of the Treasury, should be struck out until the Committee of the House of Commons, which is now sitting upon this very subject, has reported. If my information is not incorrect, the officer of the Treasury who recommended to that Committee some change of this kind did not conceal that his desire rested on the ground of reconsidering and altering the financial arrangement between the Treasury and the counties, and that he would, in fact, throw again the whole expense of valuations upon the counties. As I have already said, that is a matter for consideration in any general arrangement, and I think it should not be introduced in the way it is in this Bill. With regard to the suggestion that these words are merely put into the Bill ex abundanti cautela, I would point out that in line 55 there is a proviso saving existing appointments, which shows that it does contemplate an alteration in the present state of things. Under the present state of things the Government may dismiss any man they like, but there is a special provision that in the case of men now holding office, this clause should not apply.

THE MARQUESS OF LOTHIAN: I think after what has been said by the noble Marquess the Prime Minister, it is unnecessary for me to go in any detail into this question, because he suggested, and I understood that the House has accepted the proposal, that the question should be further considered on Report after the Government had ascertained more distinctly what are the views of the Treasury. The noble Duke seemed to think that the Treasury by this proposal have some sort of idea of altering the financial arrangements as between the counties and themselves with reference to the payment of their officers for making up the valuation of the county. I would like to say with reference to that, that I am quite certain that it is not the intention of the Treasury in the smallest degree to take advantage of anything under this Bill to make any change of the kind; not only is it not their intention, but I am firmly convinced that it is not in their power to do it, because under the Act of 1857 the Commissioners of Supply were enabled to appoint an officer of the Inland Revenue as Assessor for the Valuation Roll, and the arrangement with the Treasury then was that the Treasury should pay the whole of the salary of that officer for making up the Valuation Roll. By this Bill that Act of 1857 is not repealed nor any portion of it; and, therefore, I think that so long as that Act remains in force the Treasury are bound, by the arrangement and the obligations under which they came in virtue of that Act. I only wish to say that, in reference to what has fallen from the noble Duke with reference to the other question raised by the Amendment, I think that had better be deferred till Report.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I suggest that course because it is quite possible that we may introduce some formal words which may meet all the views which have been expressed.

Amendment, by leave of the House, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Remaining clauses down to Clause 108 (in the Bill Clause 107) agreed to.

Clause 109 (in the Bill Clause 108).

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: I beg to move the omission of this clause. The object of the clause is to insure that the Lord Lieutenant of the County, the Convener of the County, the Chairman of the County Road Trustees, and the Chairman of the Local Authority of the County, shall be placed upon the first County Council. I believe that if the clause is carried, it will have an effect exactly contrary to that which the framers of the Bill intend. Certainly these officials will be members of the first County Council, but they will be placed in a position of very great difficulty after that time, because when their term of office expires they will have no seat of their own, and unless some of the existing members of the Council wish to resign, these officials, who are manifestly some of the most prominent men in the county, will find themselves placed in the disagreeable position of having to oppose some other person who has a seat. It is very probable, too, that some of these four officials may prefer to stand on their own merits instead of on their ex officio qualifications. If they do, they will almost to a certainty not be elected, because the electors will say—"Why, these four officers have seats found for them by the Act, and yet they are not content, but must also aspire to have a seat of their own as well," and many persons will vote against them for that very reason. The feeling which underlies this clause, and which has dictated it, is one which is very reasonable indeed—that these four persons ought to be on the new County Council. I am exactly of that opinion, and I do not believe that the persons who have discharged any of these county offices with credit, will find any difficulty in obtaining a seat upon the new Council, always provided that we have a reasonably sufficient number of County Councillors. I think the clause is rather an invidious one, and that it will have an effect quite different from that which the framers intend, and for that reason I beg to move its omission.

Moved, "To omit Clause 108."—(The Earl of Camperdown.)

THE MARQUESS OF LOTHIAN: I am sorry that the noble Lord has thought it necessary to move the omission of this clause. I quite appreciate the difficulties which he has suggested, but I do not anticipate that they will be realised to the extent which he fears. The noble Earl speaks as if it was absolutely certain that these four persons who are included in this clause as the ex officio members, will be elected on the General Council at the first election. I do not know what guarantee the noble Earl has for that. I think it is quite possible that persons who have shown great aptitude and great interest before in county business would be elected at the first election, but on the other hand there is no guarantee whatever for that. The noble Lord rightly understands that the object the Government have had in view in inserting this provision is to ensure that these four ex officio members should be added to the County Council for the first term of its existence. There is no guarantee whatever as to who will be elected to the County Councils, they may be altogether, or a large number of them may be and are very likely to be those who have had any knowledge or taken any part in county business and in the interests of the work of the County Councils, in the future it is very desirable indeed that certain members of the existing administration, who have had great experience, and have great knowledge, and have taken a great interest in the affairs of their counties shall be placed upon the County Council without the possibility of their being excluded. I think your Lordships will require no argument to appreciate the desirability of there being some sort of connecting link between the old system and the new one. I do not believe that there will be the difficulty which the noble Lord seems to anticipate with regard to the future election of members who are ex officio upon the first Council. Surely these four representative persons in the County Council will find some means of standing for an election without displacing anyone whom they would wish to see still upon the Council at some future election. I do not anticipate these difficulties. I feel perfectly certain, in the interests of the future work and future conduct of business by the County Councils, that it is of the greatest possible advantage to them that they should have the advice and guidance of those who are intimately acquainted with the county business as it has hitherto been carried on. On these grounds I think your Lordships will be advised well if you agree to the clause as it stands.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: I would like to say with regard to this clause that I have had communication with a good many gentlemen who will come under its operation, and I have not found one who is in its favour. No doubt it is extremely desirable there should be a connecting link between the old administration and the new, but the question with regard to this clause is whether that connecting link is introduced in the manner that will make it of the greatest advantage. It appears to me that the introduction of the connecting link by means of ex officio members is to place it under the greatest possible disadvantage, because those members who are put on a footing of that kind will be or may be regarded by others on the County Council as suspected individuals—that they are introduced into a body by a method which is devised specially for them, and that they are not able to undergo the free election which the other members of the Council submit to. Besides that I think there is a real grievance that the members themselves are put under as regards the second election. It is all very well to say they can stand at the first election. The difficulty will certainly arise that the noble Earl has pointed out—if they stand at the first election they will certainly be told by anybody who opposes them that they have already got a seat and, therefore, need not be elected, and if they come forward at the next election they will have to look all round the country to find somebody whom it would be expedient for them to oust. I think this is one of those clauses in the Bill in which the Government, unfortunately, introduce a provision which is of very little value in itself, and must give rise to great inconvenience and dissatisfaction.

*LORD BALFOUR: I admit there is a certain amount of difference of opinion on the part of those who are supposed to be privileged by this clause; but, upon the whole, the balance of advantage is in favour of keeping the clause as it stands. The idea which has been put forward, both by the noble Lord who has last spoken and the noble Lord who moved to reject the clause, that at the second election persons privileged at the first election will have a difficulty in finding a seat, seems to me to be quite without foundation. It would be the case, perhaps, if you were bound to be elected only for the division of the county in which you reside; but for the purposes of county elections, provided you are registered as a county elector, you may stand for any division. To suppose that everybody who is in the first County Council will desire to stand for the second is, I think, obviously a mistake, and it will surely not be difficult for those of the nominated Councillors, who wish to go on to the second election, to find one at least of the divisions in which there would be a retiring Councillor. I quite admit that a difference of opinion exists about this provision; it is a clause which has had a good deal of discussion both in Scotland and in "another place." It was challenged in the other House of Parliament, and, on a division, it was resolved to be adhered to; therefore, upon the whole, I think it would be unwise to take the step of rejecting it at this stage, especially having regard to the fact that no previous notice has been given of the intention to move the rejection of it.

Clause agreed to.

THE MARQUESS OF LOTHIAN: Considering the lateness of the hour and the amount of labour that we have gone through on a Scotch subject already, I would simply ask your Lordships' permission to read the Bill a second time, proposing on the Committee stage to make whatever statement may be necessary to commend the Bill to the House.

PRINCE OF WALES' CHILDREN BILL.
(No. 212.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: My Lords, when Her Majesty's gracious Message was sent to this House, informing this House of the projected marriage of the Prince of Wales's daughter with the then Earl of Fife, your Lordships passed an Address to Her Majesty expressing your congratulations, and your willingness to concur in any provision which might be necessary for the purpose of that marriage. This Bill is, in part, the fulfilment of that pledge. I need not describe its provisions; they are very well known. It provides that the sum of £36,000 shall be yearly paid in trust to his Royal Highness and two other Official Trustees, to be applied for the benefit of his children during the existing reign. By the custom of Parliament this House cannot alter the provisions thus made. If we were to alter them, it would be fatal to the Bill. Under those circumstances, and also in consideration of the lateness of the hour, I think I shall best consult the convenience of your Lordships by not making any further observations upon the motives or the character of the provisions made; but only express what I am sure is the feelings of all your Lordships—of our hearty good wishes for the illustrious individuals in reference to whom this provision has been made.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2<sup>a</sup>."

EARL GRANVILLE: It is not necessary for me to add anything to the words which have fallen from the noble Marquess, who has correctly stated the answer of your Lordships to the gracious Message of Her Majesty. On that occasion I said that I anticipated that we should most cordially agree to any reasonable provision that was proposed by the Government and which received the sanction of the House of Commons. It certainly would be very incongruous with that cordiality which I believe your Lordships all feel on the subject if I were to refer to any critical or controversial matters, or to any incidents which happened in the passing of this Bill. At the same time I should like to allude to two facts which I am sure must be satisfactory to your Lordships. The first is—and, though I do not wish to exaggerate it, it is a fact of at all events very great negative importance—that the Queen and the Prince of Wales have during the present reign, unlike nearly all their predecessors, never come to Parliament with any applications for the payment of their debts. Further than that, I am sure your Lordships will agree in acknowledging the gracious assurance Her Majesty has given through Her Majesty's Government that she does not intend to apply to Parliament for any provision for the children of her other children except the Prince of Wales. I can only say that I and all my Friends entirely concur in the good wishes which the noble Marquess has expressed for the happiness of the couple who are now united.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I only wish to remind the noble Earl that he has not quite correctly quoted the language in which the communication was made, "that Her Majesty did not press the claims of her other children." The matter is not of present importance; but I thought it desirable that the right words should be used. Further than that I do not think it necessary to add anything to the statement I have already made.

Bill read 2<sup>a</sup> (according to order), and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

House adjourned at Eleven o'clock, to Thursday next, a quarter past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, 6th August, 1889.

QUESTIONS.

PLEURO-PNEUMONIA.

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.): I beg to ask the Vice Chamberlain, with reference to pleuro-pneumonia in South East Essex, why Foreign cattle landed at Thames Haven are allowed to be trained through the infected area at Tilbury for London, and English beasts are not permitted to be trained through the same area from Stamford for Gravesend; and, whether the Privy Council will consider the necessity of giving Local Authorities some jurisdiction in the matter of slaughter and otherwise?

THE VICE CHAMBERLAIN (Viscount LEWISHAM, Lewisham): There is nothing to prevent movement of animals through an infected area if they are not untrucked, otherwise they can only be moved out by license of the Local Authority. The inconvenience arises from Tilbury Station being included in the area, and if the Local Authority desires that it be excluded an application to that effect will be considered by the Privy Council. The Privy Council are not prepared to revoke the Order which requires the slaughter of animals that have been in contact with animals suffering from pleuro-pneumonia.

IRELAND—THE BALTINGLASS UNION

MR. BYRNE (Wicklow, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the half-yearly Report of Mr. Robinson, Local Government Board Inspector, dated 20th April 1888, on the Baltinglass Union, drawing attention to the engineer's Report on the defective drainage of the workhouse, pointing out that the health of the inmates demanded a prompt and immediate remedy; whether the Guardians are prepared to have this work done at once but, being without funds for this purpose, desire to borrow the money under the Public Health Act or Poor Relief Act; and, whether he will induce the Local Government Board to advance the requisite funds for this urgent outlay?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): My attention has been called to the Report of the Local Government Board Inspector, drawing attention to the defective drainage of the workhouse of the Baltinglass Union. The Board of Guardians are willing to borrow money to remedy the defects, and the Local Government Board are in communication with the Public Works Commissioners, with a view of ascertaining if a loan can be granted.

MR. BYRNE: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he is in a position to state when the Land Commission will hold their next sitting in Baltinglass for the fixing of fair rents for Donard and other districts in West Wicklow?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Land Commissioners report that a Sub-Commission is at present sitting in East Wicklow. It will continue its sitting after the Vacation, taking up the West Wicklow district in its turn; but it is not possible at present to give the exact date of the sitting.

THE SHANNON DRAINAGE WORKS.

MR. COX (Clare, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the fact that on Wednesday last, when Sir Thomas Brady and Mr. Hornsby, Inspectors of Fisheries, opened an inquiry at Athlone, by order of the Government, as to whether injury was likely to be done to the fishing interests of the Shannon by the drainage works now in progress, and intended to be carried out by the Irish Board of Works, several professional gentlemen, representing the various interests concerned, were present, at great expense, but that the inquiry had to be adjourned to the 3rd instant to Limerick in consequence of the non-attendance of Mr. Crosthwaite, the Board of Works representative; whether Sir Thomas Brady is correctly reported to have stated that "ample notice was given to the Board of Works. It is very extraordinary;" whether Mr. Hornsby stated—

"If the Board of Works had not common courtesy, they should, at all events, have acted with common sense; but they had shown neither the one nor the other;"

and, what action the Government intend taking in the matter?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: This is a question which should be addressed to the Secretary to the Treasury. A similar question was on the Paper yesterday, and I have no doubt that it was answered.

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (MR. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): Yes, Sir; I did answer the question yesterday.

MR. COX: Will the Report of the inquiry as to the injury likely to be done to the fishing interests of the Shannon by the drainage works be laid before the House before the money to provide the cost is voted?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Government have no control over the inquiry, nor am I able to state the date when it will be concluded. It is, therefore, quite impossible for me to answer the question.

MR. COX: This is a Government inquiry.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: All the Government had to do was to put it in motion.

SCOTLAND—MAIL ARRANGEMENTS.

MR. CALDWELL (Glasgow, St. Rollox): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether it would be possible to arrange that the mails from Stornoway to the South should overtake the morning mail from Dingwall, instead of being delayed till the afternoon as at present?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (MR. RAIKES, University of Cambridge): I quite agree with the hon. Member as to the obvious desirability of arranging a correspondence between the Southward Mail from Stornoway and the Morning Mail from Dingwall. But I understand that insuperable difficulties have hitherto interfered with an earlier despatch from Stornoway, and that the expense attendant upon a special service from Dingwall to overtake the Southern Mail at Inverness appears to be prohibitory. I will, however, gladly receive any further suggestions which may serve to facilitate a more convenient arrangement of the Mails.

THE VENEZUELA PANAMA GOLD MINE COMPANY.

MR. STAVELEY HILL (Staffordshire, Kingswinford): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether a Correspondence has taken place between a British Company called the Venezuela Panama Gold Mine Company, Limited, and the Government, with reference to the confiscation by the late President of Venezuela, Don Guzman Blanco, of their property in the Yuruari territory, now administered by Venezuela; and whether he has any objection to lay the Correspondence upon the Table of the House?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSSON, Manchester, N.E.): Her Majesty's Government have been appealed to by the company on account of the cancelling of their concession, and an adverse judgment of the Venezuelan Courts; but they have not considered that a sufficient case is made out for their intervention. The matter is not one of such public importance as to justify the presentation of the Correspondence.

MR. S. HILL: Will the right hon. Gentleman allow me to see the correspondence?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: Yes; I think there will be no objection.

CULTIVATION OF SUGAR IN JAMAICA

MR. ALFRED PEASE (York): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies if he can give, with regard to the cultivation of sugar in the Island of Jamaica, the number of properties with under 10 acres, over 10 acres and under 50 acres, over 50 acres and under 100 acres, over 100 acres and under 200 acres, and over 200 acres in canes respectively?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (BARON H. DE WORMS, Liverpool, East Toxteth): From the latest Returns in the Secretary of State's possession, it appears that in 1886-7 there were in Jamaica 68 estates with more than 200 acres in cane; 77 estates with between 100 and 200; 27 estates with between 50 and 100; and 7 estates with between 10 and 50; but he has no information as to the number of properties with under 10 acres in cane cultivation. If the honourable Member thinks it worth while to pursue the question further, the Colonial Government will be requested to prepare a special Return.

THE ROMAN CATHOLIC SCHOOL AT BLANTYRE.

MR. PHILIPPS (Lanark, Mid): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether, with regard to certain charges made against the managers of St. Joseph's Roman Catholic School at Blantyre, of having diverted certain money derived from public grants to other than educational purposes, into which the Education Department held a thorough investigation, the result of their inquiry has been that the charges have been completely disproved?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): The charges brought against the managers of St. Joseph's Roman Catholic School related to the alleged incorrectness of the Returns of income and expenditure furnished by them. The matter was the subject of careful investigation, and the managers were asked to produce accounts and vouchers. The examination of these led to the conclusion that there was no case calling for their Lordships' further interference.

THE SHAH'S VISIT.

*MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he will lay upon the Table of the House a detailed statement of the Supplementary Estimate of £7,650, being "expenses connected with the visit of His Majesty the Shah to this Country?"

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: The details are very simple. I stated on May 30 that Her Majesty would entertain the Shah during his residence at the Palace; but that there would be some provision necessary for the purposes of his visit. The sum asked for is limited to the travelling expenses in this country, including cost of special steamers from Gravesend to Westminster £2,665; hotel charges of suite, entertainments, carriage hire, and engagement of the necessary interpreters, £1,835; extra carriages and attendance in London, £2,000; travelling expenses of officers in attendance and other contingent expenses, £1,150. Total, £7,650.

IRELAND—SEIZURE FOR RENT.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that at 4.15 A.M. on 29th July, a bailiff named Wales, assisted by police, forced open the door of Mr. Bernard Reynolds, one of the tenants on the Crocker Estate, in South Donegal, against whom a decree for rent had been obtained at the suit of the landlord, and that, having forced open the door, rushed into the house, and demanded from Mrs. Reynolds, who was only partially dressed, the keys of the outhouses in which the cattle, the subjects of the proposed seizure for rent, were; and, on the keys being refused, the police and bailiff broke open the doors of the outhouses, and seized the cattle; and whether he will be able to say whether the police in thus assisting the bailiff were acting within their duty.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. Goschen, St. George's, Hanover Square): My right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary, who is not at this moment in his place, has requested me to state that he has not yet received the necessary information to enable him to answer the question.

DISEASED CATTLE.

MR. O'KEEFFE (Limerick): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board if it is a fact that at the Liverpool abattoirs a fortnight since certain English dairy cows, although having passed the market inspector at Stanley Market, were, after being slaughtered, seized by the meat market inspector; if Irish cattle run a similar risk of being seized after sale and slaughter, although being certified as sound by veterinary surgeon inspectors at shipping ports and on their arrival in England; and, if such should arise, who will compensate the exporters for their losses?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. Ritchie, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): I have been in communication with the Corporation of Liverpool on the subject of the question of the hon. Member, and I am informed that it is the fact that certain dairy cows from the Stanley Market were, after being slaughtered, seized by the meat inspector as being unfit for human food. The market inspector at Stanley Market examines for contagious diseases only under the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Acts, and the cows in question were not suffering from contagious disease, and consequently were not interfered with by the inspector at Stanley Market. Irish cattle run a similar risk of being seized after sale and slaughter if they are found to be unfit for human food and are exposed or deposited for sale. It is not the duty of the veterinary surgeon inspector to certify cattle as being sound; but he passes all that are free from contagious disease. Exporters receive no compensation for their loss when meat is condemned on the ground of its being unfit for human food. On the contrary, those who expose for sale for human food meat of this character are, under the Public Health Act, liable to heavy penalties.

BRITISH SUBJECTS IN EGYPT.

SIR WALTER FOSTER (Derbyshire, Ilkeston): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether his attention has been called to a petition from certain British subjects complaining that they had been illegally confined in Egyptian Government gaols, under Egyptian officials, at Alexandria, instead of being placed in a British Consular prison; whether such complaint was well-founded; and, if so, whether the illegality complained of has been remedied; and, whether British subjects have been tried at Alexandria by juries of five, often not Englishmen, but Greeks and Levantines with British passports?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: Such a petition has been received, and is now under inquiry; inquiry is also being made in regard to the constitution of juries.

DISABLING GUNS.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if any experiments have been made to ascertain what is the smallest size of shot which will disable a 40 or 60-ton gun when the shot hits the large gun on the side of the latter?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. Stanhope, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): The subject has engaged the serious attention of the Ordnance Select Committee, and experiments have been tried. But I am advised that in the interests of the public service it is not desirable to make public either the results or the opinion of the Committee.

COLONEL NOLAN: I will put a question to the First Lord of the Admiralty on the subject in reference to guns mounted en barbette in the Fleet.

MERCHANT SHIPPING (TONNAGE) BILL.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether the Board will frame rules for the direction of Surveyors of the Board in the discharge of their functions under the new Merchant Ship ping (Tonnage) Bill, especially with reference to the provisions of Section 2 in regard to overdeck light and air spaces?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir MICHAEL HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): Rules on this matter are in course of preparation, but of course cannot be issued until the Bill has become law.

Mr. SEXTON: Will it be made public?

*Sir MICHAEL HICKS BEACH: Yes, Sir; I dare say they might be laid on the Table.

CONVEYANCE OF SCOTCH MAILS.

Mr. FRASER-MACKINTOSH (Invernesshire): I beg to ask the Postmaster General what is the amount of postal subsidy granted to Mr. M'Brayne for conveying the mails by steamer to and from Strone Ferry and Stornoway; whether he is aware that, from the inefficiency of the steamer employed the connection with the railway to Strone Ferry is frequently lost and delays arise in reaching Stornoway, and that these delays have sometimes occurred from the steamer diverging from the direct route and proceeding to Portree to take up goods and passengers; and, whether, in these circumstances, if there be no fixed period of contract, he will consider the expediency of publicly inviting tenders for a direct and exclusive service between Strone Ferry and Stornoway?

*Mr. RAIKES: The contract payment for the conveyance of the mails by steamer to and from Strone Ferry and Stornoway is £2,250 a year. I find, upon inquiry, that during the year ended the 27th ultimo the steamer lost

*Mr. RAIKES: Representations as to the nature of the particular vessel have been made to the Post Office, and we think there is no reason to complain.

THE MAILS FROM INVERNESS.

Mr. FRASER-MACKINTOSH: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he would state generally the data upon which the Department has come to the conclusion that a mid-day service, by steamer, of the mails from Inverness to Fort Augustus would, for the months of August and September, involve a loss to the Post Office of £250; and, if he would give the figures justifying the statement of the Department that the cost of the existing service is considerably in excess of the revenue derived from the correspondence?

*Mr. RAIKES: The cost of maintaining the present Postal Service between Inverness and Fort Augustus and the neighbourhood is about £767 a year, as compared with an available revenue of about £525 a year, so that there is already a loss of about £242 a year. If the desired service from Inverness at mid-day during August and September were afforded, it would be necessary to make an additional payment of £200 to the proprietors of the steamer, and the Department itself would incur a further expenditure of about £50 a year. The loss would thus be augmented by £250 a year, and there would be no savings to set against it.

CHRIST'S HOSPITAL.

Mr. MUNDELLA (Sheffield, Brightside): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether any decision has been given by the Privy Council in the matter of Christ's Hospital; and what is the present position of the scheme of the Charity Commissioners relating thereto?

*THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): The appeals against the scheme for Christ's Hospital were heard by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council towards the end of June. At the close of the hearing their Lordships reserved judgment, which has not yet been delivered. Further proceedings in regard to the scheme must await the delivery of that judgment.

POST OFFICE SORTERS.

MR. PICKERSGILL: I beg to ask the Postmaster General when he will be able to give a definite reply to the petition of the sorters employed on Sunday duty in the Circulation Department (Inland Branch), which was originally presented so long ago as 1884, and in respect of which he informed the Member for South West Bethnal Green, in June 1888, that "a decision would shortly be arrived at?"

*MR. RAIKES: The matter to which the hon. Member refers has been very fully examined by the Department, and I have now under consideration a proposal which I hope to be able to submit to the Treasury in a day or two.

THE WHITECHAPEL MURDER.

MR. PICKERSGILL: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Home Department whether it is correct that William Wallace Brodie, who was recently charged on his own confession with the Whitechapel murder, was, in May, 1887, sentenced to 14 years' penal servitude, and was, in August, 1888, discharged on license; and, if so, of what offence was he convicted, and why was he discharged?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (MR. STUART WORTLEY, Sheffield, Hallam): William Brodie was convicted in May, 1877, not in 1887, of larceny in a dwelling-house and sentenced to 14 years' penal servitude. He was discharged on license in the ordinary course in August, 1888, after serving rather more than 11 years of his sentence.

FENIT PIER.

MR. MAHONY (Meath, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that in the instructions issued by the Lord Lieutenant to the cesspayers of the Baronies connected with the Fenit Pier Loan, and on faith of which the cesspayers gave a guarantee for £95,000, the following passage occurs:—

"No portion of it (the loan) can be expended on the present canal, or in payment of the balance of the canal debt due to the Public Works Loan Commissioners, or of the instalments of the present loan;"

but that, in spite of this passage in the instructions, £2,500 was paid to the National Bank in discharge of a debt due by the canal, £300 and £290 were paid to the Public Works Loan Commissioners in discharge of the debt due by the canal, and £3,192. 11s. 4d. was paid to the Irish Board of Works in discharge of the instalments on the Fenit Pier Loan referred to in the Lord Lieutenant's instructions as the present loan; whether interest has to be paid and capital repaid by the taxpayers as regards these sums, although these sums were paid by the Fenit Harbour Commissioners in direct contravention of the Lord Lieutenant's instructions, on the faith of which the taxpayers gave their guarantee; and, whether, if these facts be as stated, he will take steps to enforce the instructions of the Lord Lieutenant?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The instructions mentioned in the question were issued by the Lord Lieutenant. The payments enumerated were made from the loan of £95,000 by the Harbour Commissioners. They do not appear to have been justified in applying the capital funds to any of these purposes. It is right to add that it appears from a communication received from their Secretary that they only intended to advance the sums temporarily from the loan and that a portion of the item of £290 has already been paid by the canal funds. It also seems that when the Board of Works ascertained that the first five half-yearly instalments amounting to £3,192 11s. 4d. had been repaid to them out of the loan they took steps to remedy this action of the Harbour Commissioners by applying for a presentment for the amount. This application, however, was overruled by the Lord Chief Baron, whose decision was confirmed in the Court of Queen's Bench, whereby it was held that the Act 43 & 44 Vic. c. 14 guarded against the sums due by the Baronies being accumulated from one Assizes to another. I may mention that it would seem as regards this sum of £3,192 11s. 4d., that the Baronies are not at any actual loss by its payment from the loan, as had it been presented for at the Assizes from time to time as it accrued due, the Baronies would then have been obliged to have paid. The Government are considering the matter as to what steps, if any, they are in a position to take.

Mr. MAHONY: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the pier has not been properly finished owing to the shortness of funds?

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: I am not aware of that fact. I understand the point to be that the Harbour Commissioners have paid interest out of capital and that a loss has thereby occurred. I do not know that that is so, but I think it is very probable.

Mr. MAHONY: It is quite clear that interest has been wrongly paid out of capital, and, therefore, I will ask the right hon. Gentleman if he will take steps to obtain a Report upon the matter?

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: As I understand the matter, the Lord Lieutenant's instructions can only refer to the future, and not to any improper payments out of capital which may have been made previously.

Mr. MAHONY: Were not the Lord Lieutenant's instructions issued prior to the guarantee of this loan—prior to the time when the taxpayers gave the guarantee? The taxpayers at a Baronial meeting, which was to a certain extent representative, gave the guarantee on the faith of the Lord Lieutenant's instructions. Where the taxpayers give a guarantee for the carrying out of public works under instructions issued by the Lord Lieutenant, is it to be the duty of the taxpayer to see that the instructions are carried out?

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: As I have said, I am not acquainted with the facts of the case, but anything the Government can do to remedy the evil they are prepared to do.

Mr. E. HARRINGTON (Kerry, W.): As this is a question which affects my constituents may I ask whether it is not the fact that this Public Board excluded the Press from their deliberations?

coast, petitioned the Secretary of State for the Colonies against the grant of responsible government to Western Australia without the recognition of their right to fish beyond the three-mile limit untaxed; whether protests have been lodged by the North-west Pearl Fishing Fleet, by the London Chamber of Commerce, and by the Chamber of Shipping against the Western Australia Pearl Fisheries Act passed by the Federal Council of Australia in February, 1889; whether representations have reached him that the principles introduced in this Act will infringe the main principles recognised by the Chamberlain Commission, and may tend to the transfer of the pearling fleet to a foreign flag; and whether the Secretary of State is willing to advise the Crown on this Act on its merits, and what action has been taken in the matter?

BARON H. DE WORMS: A petition to the effect stated by the hon. Member was received by the Secretary of State in October, 1887, and was referred for the consideration of the Government of Western Australia, and extracts from the Governor's reply were communicated to the parties interested in the Petition. Protests such as are described in the question were also received at the Colonial Office, in more than one of which attention was drawn to the injury which it was alleged must occur to Colonial pearl fishing vessels. The subject of this Reserved Bill has been carefully considered by Her Majesty's Government, who have been advised that it is within the powers conferred upon the Federal Council by the Federal Council of Australasia Act, 1885, and they have decided that they would not be justified in recommending Her Majesty to disallow the Bill.

IRELAND—EVICTIONS ON LORD CLANRICARDE'S ESTATE.

Mr. SEXTON: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland what particulars he can give of the recent evictions on Lord Clanricarde's estate in the Portumna district; whether any further evictions there are in contemplation; what offers of settlement, if any, were made on the part of the landlord and of the tenants respectively; and whether he will lay upon the Table a copy of any correspondence between any member or officer of the Irish Government and any persons acting in the interest of the landlord, or of the tenants, with respect to this estate?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am not in possession of information which will enable me to answer the question as to further evictions being in contemplation. I understand that a placard offering terms was put up in the district, and that the tenants evicted on June 19 were prepared to accept them if evicted tenants were reinstated. The placard is to the following effect:—

“As to tenants holding under £50 annual rent—(a) those paying the rent due up to November 1, 1888, to receive an abatement of 4s. in the £1 on all they owe; (b) those not paying up to November 1, 1888, an abatement of 3s. in the £1 on each whole year's rent paid. The cases of tenants holding over £50 annual rent and tenants in towns to be dealt with separately, and as the circumstances of each may require. From tenants who could reasonably satisfy the agent that they were unable to then pay more, half a year's rent would be accepted and fair time given to further reduce the debt. The foregoing abatements not to apply to judicial rents.”

I am not aware of any correspondence which it would be proper to lay on the Table of the House.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central): Have not a large number of persons been evicted, upon whose behalf more favourable terms than those which the agents have since expressed their willingness to accept, were offered?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am aware that a large number of persons have been offered terms from time to time; but I cannot charge my memory with the fact whether they were in excess or less than those which have been recently offered. I will be glad to find out if I can.

MR. SEXTON: The right hon. Gentleman says he is not aware of any correspondence which he can lay upon the Table. Is it not the fact that the evictions upon the Portumna Estate of Lord Clanricarde have been restrained by means of a correspondence between the right hon. Gentleman himself, as the Head of the Executive in Ireland, and the agents of this estate?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am not aware, speaking off-hand, that there is any correspondence of the kind alluded to by the right hon. Gentleman. But if there is, I still maintain that it comes under the same category.

Mr. Sexton

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: I received only to-day a letter from Bishop Healy, in which he stated that he intended his letters to the Chief Secretary to be made public.

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

MR. SEXTON: I wish, if possible, to ascertain upon what principle the right hon. Gentleman maintains before this House that letters addressed to him as the working Head of the Executive in Ireland in regard to the enforcement of the law and of legal rights are to be withheld, if they are preserved in the official records?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It must rest in the discretion of the Head of the Department to publish the correspondence or not; but I entirely deny that the correspondence is official to which reference has been made.

POSTAL ARRANGEMENTS IN BELFAST.

MR. SEXTON: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he is aware that the inhabitants of a large and populous district of Belfast are subject to inconvenience and disadvantage by reason of the circumstance that the Falls Road Post Office, which is a receiving office for telegrams, is not a delivering office; and, whether he will constitute it a delivering office?

*MR. RAIKES: I am having inquiry made whether the Falls Road Post Office can be constituted a Delivery Office for telegrams, and so soon as I receive the necessary Reports I will communicate with the hon. Member.

RAILWAY CLASSIFICATION.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK (University of London): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that in conferences between traders and railway managers (arranged in compliance with the Board of Trade Circular of 10th June last), the railway managers contended that the classification mentioned in the Act was a Parliamentary classification which could not be arranged as a working classification; that traders are of opinion that the classification can be compiled as a working classification; and that as a result of this difference of opinion the conference between the leading groups of traders and the railway managers have proved abortive; and, whether he can take any steps to secure that the Parliamentary classification of "The Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1888," shall be adapted or compiled so as to serve as a working classification?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: The conferences referred to by the hon. Member have by no means proved abortive in all cases, but, on the contrary, in several instances have produced results apparently satisfactory to the traders. I am aware of the contention alluded to by the hon. Member which has been put forward by an important section of traders. But the contention appears to me to be based on a misapprehension. When the Parliamentary classification is fixed there will be nothing to prevent the Railway Companies, subject to the provisions of the law as regards undue preference, from charging a lower rate for any article or group of articles than the maximum rate authorised by Parliament, and if they choose to arrange to charge for any of the articles placed by Parliament in a certain class the rates authorised for a lower class, there is nothing to prevent them from doing so, nor is it in the interests of trade that they should be prevented from doing so. A letter embodying the views of the Department on this point will be shortly addressed to the traders, and so also will a circular announcing the procedure the Board of Trade will adopt at the hearing of objections, and the time when they will commence to hear objections.

EGYPT.

MR. GOURLEY (Sunderland): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether Her Majesty's Government intend instructing the Government of Egypt to embrace the opportunity afforded by the success of General Grenfell against the Dervishes, of again obtaining access to the navigable waters of the Upper Nile and the Bahr Gazelle, by despatching a sufficient number of war-fighting steamers during the rising of the Nile, for the purpose of obtaining and holding possession of Dongola and Berber, and thus retain the acknowledged strategical and commercial keys requisite for the safety of Egypt as well as the diminution of slavery?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (MR. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): The hon. Gentleman is under a misapprehension in addressing this question of whether we intend instructing the Government of Egypt to me. We cannot instruct the Egyptian Government as if it were a Department of the English Government. The policy of Her Majesty's Government remains the same as it has always been—that is, to maintain the engagements into which the country has entered.

RAILWAY REGULATIONS BILL.

MR. O'KEEFFE: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if it is the intention of the Government to extend the Railway Regulations (No. 2) Bill to Ireland?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The Bill to which the hon. Gentleman refers will extend to the whole of the United Kingdom.

SLAVERY IN PEMBA AND ZANZIBAR.

SIR JOHN KENNAWAY (Devon, Honiton): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the time has now arrived when Her Majesty's Government should urge upon the Sultan of Zanzibar to decree the abolition of domestic slavery in the islands of Pemba and Zanzibar?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: It would be inconvenient, and would not conduce to the objects which my hon. Friend has in view, to make a declaration upon this matter, but the subject must in any case come under consideration in connection with the contemplated Conference upon the Slave Trade. Her Majesty's Government will neglect no opportunity of lessening both the area and the evils of slavery as far as their influence extends.

AID TO LOCAL RATES.

MR. ISAACS (Newington, Walworth): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board when the ratepayers of the Metropolis will receive the relief out of the Probate Duties and other sources of Imperial Revenue promised them in the Budget of the Chancellor of the Exchequer for the financial year 1888-9?

*MR. RITCHIE: Since the 27th of March last a sum of £127,620 has been paid to the Guardians of the Metropolitan unions and parishes in addition to the grants previously received by them. It is very difficult to arrive at any accurate estimate of the amount which the Local Government Board will be in a position to pay to the London County Council out of the local taxation account in November next, but it will probably be about £120,000. It will be borne in mind that the sum payable to the London County Council prior to that date would be much larger were it not that the proportion of the cost of the Metropolitan Police, which was formerly paid out of the Parliamentary grant, is now paid out of the local taxation account and deducted from the sums payable to the London County Council.

IRELAND—FAIR RENTS.

MR. CAREW (Kildare, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can now state on what day he will introduce his proposed Bill for accelerating the fixing of fair rents in Ireland; and whether it is intended that the two lay Commissioners are to sit with the County Court Judge of the county as originally indicated?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Bill to which the question of the hon. Gentleman refers is on the Paper for this evening.

INSPECTOR OF LUNACY.

DR. KENNY (Cork, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether it is a fact that one of the Inspectors of Lunatics in Ireland has tendered his resignation; whether any steps, and, if so, what, are being taken to deal with the vacancy thus created; and whether there is any truth in the report that it is in contemplation to appoint one of the Scotch Assistant Commissioners of Lunacy to an administrative position in the Irish Lunacy Service?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: One of the Inspectors of Lunatics in Ireland has retired on superannuation. The question as to the necessity of filling the vacancy is under consideration. There is no foundation for the rumour that it is in contemplation to appoint one of the Scotch Assistant Commissioners of Lunacy to an administrative position in the Irish Lunacy Service.

GENERAL WILLIAM SANKEY.

DR. KENNY: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he has noticed in the list of shareholders of the "Land Corporation Company," published in the Freeman of 30th ultimo, the name of General William Sankey as a holder of 20 shares in said company; is he able to state whether the said General William Sankey is the same person as the General Sankey who is Chairman of the Board of Commissioners of Public Works in Ireland; and, whether it is in accordance with the rules of the Service that the Chairman of a Public Board, which has to discharge such important functions as those entrusted to the Board of Public Works in Ireland, should be a shareholder in a company with which the Board of Public Works has frequently to deal, and the chief objects of the said company being moreover mainly of a political character?

MR. JACKSON: There is no foundation whatever for the suggestion in the question. Any of the ordinary sources of information, such as Whitaker's Almanack or Thom's Directory, will show that the Chairman of the Board of Public Works is Lieutenant General R. H. Sankey, not General William Sankey. I am sure that the hon. Member will regret that he should have put the question.

DR. KENNY: I cast no reflection on General Sankey. I should be sorry to do so.

BRITISH GUIANA—CONSTITUTIONAL REFORM.

MR. WATT (Glasgow, Camlachie): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the Government have under consideration the question of conceding a measure of Constitutional Reform to the Colony of British Guiana, similar to that granted to other West Indian Colonies; and, whether he can state a date when he will probably be able to intimate to the Colony the decision of Her Majesty's Government on the subject?

BARON H. DE WORMS: Her Majesty's Government have under consideration the question of a reform of the Constitution of British Guiana, but cannot at present state when it will be possible to make any definite announcement on the subject.

BRITISH GUIANA AND BRAZIL.

MR. WATTS: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether negotiations are now in progress with the Empire of Brazil for the appointment of a Joint Commission of Delimitation to determine and fix a definite line of frontier between the Colony of British Guiana and the Empire of Brazil; and whether he can now give the House any information on the subject?

*MR. J. FERGUSSON: Proposals were made on the subject by the Brazilian Government some time ago and are still under discussion, but the matter is not in a position in which any further information can with advantage be given.

MR. CONYBEARE.

SIR W. FOSTER: I wish to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland if he has received any Medical Report in reference to the health of the hon. Member for Camborne (Mr. Conybeare) in Derry Gaol?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have not received any Medical Report absolutely up to date; but subsequent to the time of the first question on the subject by the hon. Gentleman the Reports are satisfactory.

MR. MAC NEILL: I understood that on Saturday last the hon. Member for Camborne wished to send me a Report which I have not yet received. Can the right hon. Gentleman say whether it will be forwarded before the Prisons Vote comes on?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I cannot make any promise of that kind, not knowing how far Medical Reports are allowed by the Prison Rules to be sent to private Members.

MR. MAC NEILL: This is not a Medical Report, but a Report framed by the hon. Member himself.

PUBLIC BUSINESS.

MR. S. HILL: May I ask when the Tithes Bill will be taken?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The Tithes and Charge Bill stands on the Paper for Thursday. If it is not reached on that day, I will inform my hon. Friend when it is likely to be taken.

MR. S. HILL: At what time will it be taken on Thursday?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: We shall take it at any time.

In reply to Mr. SHAW LEFEBVRE,

*MR. W. H. SMITH said: We propose to take the Constabulary Vote to-night, and then to go back to the Irish Estimates in Class 2 in the order in which they stand. I think the first is the Vote for the Lord Lieutenant. If the Irish Estimates are not concluded on Thursday, they will be proceeded with de die in diem, and after they are disposed of the Tithes Bill will be taken.

MR. STOREY (Sunderland): What do the Government propose to do with the Drainage Bills?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I hope to pass the Bann Drainage Bill this Session. I also hope to pass the Shannon and Barrow Bills, but will be guided by circumstances.

MR. STOREY: I am quite aware that the Shannon and Barrow Drainage Bills must go over until next Session; but I wish further to press my question respecting the Bann Drainage Bill. The Bill has several stages yet to pass through. I would remind the right hon. Gentleman that there is a possibility of prolonged opposition from English and Scotch Members, and opposition, too, from the localities. Under the circumstances, I would like to know whether he will not commit the "happy dispatch" and tell us that the Bann Drainage Bill is also to go?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I will give the hon. Gentleman an undertaking that the Bann Drainage Bill will be taken after the Light Railways Bills. As to the Shannon and Barrow Bills they will have to be dropped.

MR. CAUSTON (Southwark, W.): Is it intended to take the London County Council (Money) Bill to-night?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: No, Sir; it will not be taken to-night.

SIR W. FOSTER: Will the Notification of Infectious Diseases Bill be the first Order on Friday?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I cannot undertake to make it the first Order. The Government must at this period of the Session take the business that remains to be considered when they are able to reach it.

IRISH RESIDENT MAGISTRATES.

MR. FLYNN: May I ask the Chief Secretary if it will be convenient to take No. 4 of the Notices of Motion—a Return giving the names of the Resident Magistrates with the dates of their appointment by seniority, present salary, and other particulars, as an unopposed Return?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am unable at present to treat it as an unopposed Return. A very comprehensive Return is already before the House.

MR. SEXTON: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that in the case of certain Magistrates it is alleged that the principle of seniority has been violated? This Return is, therefore, asked for to enable us to judge how far that principle has been violated.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not admit that the principle of seniority is at all binding.

MR. SEXTON: I suppose the right hon. Gentleman will admit that promotion by seniority ought to be the principle except in the case of special merit. We ask for the Return, so that we may be enabled to see whether, where seniority was disregarded, there was good cause.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not go to the same extent as the right hon. Gentleman. I quite admit that seniority is an element; but I do not go further.

MR. FLYNN: Is it not the fact that former Returns were given very much in this shape showing the seniority, and that it is only recently the rule has been changed?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am not aware that Returns have been given in conformity to the description given by the hon. Gentleman.

UNIVERSITIES, &amp;c. (SCOTLAND) PUBLIC MONEY.

Ordered—

“Returns of the sums annually voted by Parliament, and of the sums chargeable on the Consolidated Fund, to each of the four Universities of Scotland, and to the Royal Observatory and Royal Botanic Gardens at Edinburgh, for each of the ten years ending the 31st day of March 1889;

Of the sums chargeable as pensions to the retired Professors of each of the four Universities for the same period;

Of the sums spent for the erection or maintenance of University Buildings for the same period;

And separately, of the sums paid to the Professors of the several Universities from the funds of the Deanery of the Chapel Royal in Scotland during the same period (in continuation of Parliamentary Paper, No. 263, of Session 1887.”—(Mr. J. Campbell.)

UNIVERSITY (SCOTLAND).

Ordered—

Return of Rules made under Sec. 21 of the Act 21 and 22 Vic. c. 83, now in force, with respect to the amount of the Pensions from public funds that may be awarded to Principals, Professors, and other officers (if any) of Scottish Universities, the age at which they may be claimed, and the period of service which must have preceded each claim.

Nominal Return of Principals, Professors, and other officers (if any) in each of the Scottish Universities entitled, after the required period of service, to retire upon Pensions, with their respective ages, dates of appointment, and the amount, for each of the three years ended the 31st day of March, 1889, of the salaries, fees, and other emoluments which would be taken into account in determining the amount of pension that might be granted in each case.

And, Return showing, for each of the Universities, the Name and Office of each Person to whom a Pension has been granted from public funds since 1858, with the amount of each Pension, the age at which it was granted, and the date at which any Pension lapsed (in continuation of Parliamentary Paper, No. 245, of Session 1887).—(Mr. J. Campbell.)

FRIENDLY SOCIETIES ACT, 1875.

Report from the Select Committee, with Minutes of Evidence and Appendix, brought up, and read.

Report to lie upon the Table, and to be printed. [No. 304.]

NEW WRIT.

For Belfast (Northern Division), in the room of Sir William Ewart, baronet, deceased.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

CLASS III.

Motion made, and Question proposed.

“That a sum, not exceeding £889,371, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the charge which will be in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1890, for the expenses of the Royal Irish Constabulary.”

*MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): I think the Irish Members are entitled to complete that the Government should have introduced so important a Vote at so late a period of the Session. It is an innovation of the Constitutional system, and of late years it has tended to become more and more the practice of the Irish Executive, and of those connected with the administration of Irish affairs. More than one half of the financial year has now been allowed to lapse, and I presume I am right in concluding that more than one half of the money asked for in the vote has been expended. We are asked to criticise the administration of affairs for which the money is required at a time of the Session when the energies of hon. Members are supposed to be more or less dissipated. It may have been possible on other occasions for the Chief Secretary to tell us that the delay has occurred in order to consult the convenience of the Irish Members; but that has certainly not been the case this Session, because there has been a strong wish that the Irish Votes should be taken at an early period, in accordance with Constitutional practice and the usage of this House, so that the Estimates might be criticised in the way they deserve to be criticised. In regard to the present Vote, the first thing that will strike those hon. Members who are interested in economy is the continuous increase of the sum of money asked for under this head. I find that in 1871 the Constabulary Vote, including that for the Dublin Metropolitan Police, came to a total of £1,016,000, and this year we that in Sunderland it is 1s. 5d. per head; Leicester, 1s. 9½d.; Dundee, 1s. 11d.; Bradford, 2s. 1d.; Leeds, 2s. 3d., and Birmingham, 2s. 4d. The average cost of the police in the Dublin Metropolitan District is 8s. per head, or more than four times as much as that of principal centres of population in England. These facts are startling in their significance, and ought to invite the serious consideration of every Member of this House who is interested in keeping down the expenditure of the country. But this expenditure, enormous as it is, would not be objected to if it were productive of good to the people in whose behalf it is expended, but not alone is the system bad, but the administration of the system is as bad as it can possibly be. Indeed, that is the reason why the Vote increases so rapidly. The chief duties of a well-organised Constabulary Force are the protection of life and property and the preservation of order. But we maintain that the Irish police are largely employed in propping up the property of a small fraction of the population to the destruction of that of the toiling hundreds of thousands, who form the real buttresses of the prosperity of Ireland. We further complain that the bulk of the money, instead of being expended in the preservation of order in Ireland, is expended in a manner that is provocative of the greatest disorder. The cases which I am about to bring before the Committee I have taken at random, but they go far to proving beyond a doubt that the manner in which the Irish police force is at present administered does not tend to good Government or to the tranquillity of the country. We are informed by the newspapers that not long ago in the County of Tipperary a policeman was brought before County Court Judge Anderson, charged with a wanton assault. It appears that the prosecutor went to the railway station to meet a friend, and seeing that Dr. Tanner was in the train he had the temerity to cry out "Three cheers for the hon. and gallant Member for Mid Cork," whereupon the police-constable James Rippon struck him on the head with his truncheon. The jury found for the prosecutor, with £5 damages and costs. In this case the prosecutor was able to bring the case before a jury and recover damages because he could identify his aggressor, and there would be hundreds of similar cases brought before juries if it were not part of the tactics of the Chief Secretary to extend the protection of the Executive to the police in matters of this kind where savage assaults are committed by the police upon an unoffending people. Every application to obtain the name of the policeman by whom an assault has been committed is refused. If the application is made in this House it is met with equivocation and prevarication, and it is impossible to obtain the name of the constable who, as a general rule, has been drafted from some distant place. That is the reason why we have been able to bring comparatively few cases before the Civil Tribunals to expose the proceedings of the constabulary in the way they deserve. I will tell the House as briefly as possible what occurred on the occasion of the brutal assault by the police on my hon. Friend the Member for North Monaghan (Mr. Patrick O'Brien). The hon. Member for North-East Cork (Mr. William O'Brien) was returning from a journey, and the hon. Member for North Monaghan went to the railway platform with some friends and some ladies to meet him. There were comparatively few persons on the platform, because the fact of the return of the hon. Member for North-East Cork had been purposely concealed in order to preclude the possibility of an attack upon the people. The police on the platform placed the hon. Member for North-East Cork under arrest. Mr. O'Brien asked for the production of the warrant, and while the warrant was being produced some enthusiastic gentleman in the rear of the crowd cried out "Three cheers for William O'Brien." An order was immediately given to the police to "Draw batons," which caused them to commit a furious assault upon the bystanders with truncheons and clubbed rifles, not only upon the people assembled on the platform, but on the passengers. Various persons present, including many clergymen, affirmed that the hon. Member for North Monaghan was beaten with truncheons on the back and head and knocked to the ground, and struck while on the ground by some policemen with their clubbed rifles. He tried to rise, with blood pouring from two or three wounds, but was knocked senseless on the pavement, when some police bore him off in a cab to a doctor. I have evidence, and I can substantiate it on oath, that the attack on my hon. Friend was premeditated, that before the train arrived he was pointed out by two or three constables, as was also the gentlemen who accompanied him, and the moment the train arrived the assault was made. The reason is believed to be that the hon. Member had been successful that day in holding a series of meetings in defiance of an illegal proclamation which had been issued suppressing meetings near Cork. We asked in this House for an explanation of the assault, and we received two—one by the Chief Secretary, and the other by the Solicitor General for Ireland. The latter dismissed the suggestion that there had been an attempted rescue of the hon. Member for North-East Cork as an utterly absurd and baseless fiction of the right hon. Gentleman's creation, or of that of his subordinates in Ireland, while the Chief Secretary, not knowing what had been said, deliberately suggested, with the airy nonchalance which we all admire, but which is hardly consistent with the grave duties he has to discharge, an attempted rescue as the cause of the disturbance. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will give a fair, straightforward, and honourable answer to this question. Will he assist us by giving the name of the head constable who gave the order to draw batons, the result of which was the wanton assault upon my hon. Friend which I have described. The right hon. Gentleman has already said that the Inspector gave no order, but that the head constable said, "Draw batons." I am not very well versed in the regulations of the Constabulary, and I should like to know whether an order to draw batons is sufficient to justify a brutal attack of this kind? Let us know who gave the order, and we will test once for all before an impartial tribunal the responsibility of the action of the police on this occasion. The nature of the attack can be proved by the results which followed. 14 or 15 persons were taken to the infirmary more or less injured, and the indiscriminate nature of the assault may be seen from the fact that a number of the passengers who were injured were gentlemen opposed to the Nationalist Party, among them being

son of Sir John Arnott, of Cork, who was returning from a fishing excursion, and the Mayor's sergeant, who went down to the station to meet his wife on her return from a trip into the country. While the hon. Member for North-East Cork was under arrest the train arrived at Charleville, at 12 o'clock at night. A small crowd of persons were on the platform to meet friends returning from Cork, and when it was found that Mr. O'Brien was in the train, some cheers were raised and an attempt was made to shake hands with him. As the train was in motion, a shot was fired by District Inspector Concannon, and two other shots were fired by constables. Had any one been killed by those shots there can be no doubt that it would have been wanton and unprovoked murder on the part of the police. District Inspector Concannon's shot took effect in the thigh of a young man who was sitting on a wall at some distance from the train, and had it proved fatal all the sophistry of the Chief Secretary would be insufficient to clear the police from the dreadful charge of deliberate murder. In reference to this matter the Chief Secretary appears to have discovered for himself, or to have adopted the most extraordinary theory, that shots were fired by the crowd upon the police. In the first place, the police were in an ordinary train returning from Cork, and there were very few people assembled at the Charleville Station, as I can prove to the right hon. Gentleman will afford me the chance of an inquiry. There were none of the local police on the platform, which is hardly consistent with the fact that a criminal so notorious and so dreaded as my hon. Friend the Member for North-East Cork was known to be in the train. In the second place, the railway station of which I speak is 40 miles distant from Cork. It was a Sunday, and there was no possibility of communicating with the town of Charleville till 10 o'clock in the morning. The crowd who were awaiting the return of their friends heard that the hon. Member for North-East Cork was in the train; they cheered him, and attempted to shake hands with him, and thereupon the constables, headed by their District Inspector, fired three revolver shots. Such circumstances demand some more satisfactory explanation from the right hon. Gentleman than that he has yet given. Passing from this matter I come to the question of the employment of the Constabulary at evictions in Ireland. I do not believe there can be two opinions in the House that the real cause, or at any rate one of the principal causes, of the enormous and continuous increase in the Constabulary Vote is the manner in which the police are placed at the disposal of every landlord and County Sheriff who requires them. I do not contend that the Constabulary cannot be called upon or cannot be employed by the Executive in the enforcement of law, and the carrying out of evictions; but I maintain it is an absolute misuse of an expensive force of this kind to place them solely at the beck and call of one particular set of creditors in Ireland. It is a matter of some difficulty for the ordinary creditor to get the Sheriff to move at all; but these extraordinary, these unjust debts, take the first place in the estimation of the Executive, because the landlords are their friends, and because in collecting rents they are carrying out the policy which recommends itself to individual members of the Executive. Why, in the name of common sense, should a body of able-bodied constables be placed at the disposal of any body of creditors in a different manner to that in which they are placed at the disposal of ordinary creditors? Some of the evictions in Ireland are carried out, if not under the immediate presence, at any rate under the patronage of the right hon. Gentleman. It is, no doubt, an instructive lesson in law and order to see the Constabulary sitting down near the homes of the wretched people being evicted drinking champagne with the Private Secretary and Colleague of the Chief Secretary. What lesson can the people draw from that? Does it tend to give them any belief in the impartiality of the Irish Government? With regard to the actual presence of police at these evictions, I want to ask the attention of the Committee to one or two instances as showing a close connection between the landlord, the heads of the Irish Executive, and the principal officers of the Irish Constabulary. The Luggacurran evictions were carried out under the immediate patronage of the right hon. Gentleman. There we had the landlords' figures as to acreage, rent, valuation, and arrears, in the hands of whom? In the hands of the private secretary of the Divisional Magistrate in charge of the police, the private secretary himself being an officer in the Constabulary. It seems an extraordinary thing that when reporters came down they should, instead of proceeding to the tenant's or the landlord's agents for information, proceed to the private secretary of the Divisional Magistrate, who had obtained his information in the landlord's office. Is that part of the business of the Executive of the country? What business had the private secretary there at all? When he was giving the figures to the reporters around him he used a formula which is very instructive. He said, the tenant need not be evicted if he paid so much. I asked him, "But would that clear the tenant up to the present date, or to the last gale day." His reply was, "Oh, no, if the tenant paid so much he would get a clear receipt up to September, 1886," nearly three years ago. The business of the private secretary or District Inspector was simply to mislead the representatives of the Press present. There are other matters in connection with the presence of police at evictions to be referred to. I have said that evictions are distressing and saddening spectacles. It does seem extraordinary that large sums paid by the taxpayers of Great Britain should be expended upon work of this kind. The right hon. Gentleman says it is unavoidable. He attributes these evictions to the Plan of Campaign. We shall discuss that point on another occasion. But at the Ponsonby evictions there was a force of Constabulary of between 300 and 400, supplemented by a large number of soldiers, all under the charge and command of the notorious Divisional Magistrate, Captain Plunket. Have hon. Members seen the secret letter—secret because it was not intended to be known to us—written by the agent of the estate, in which he practically acknowledged that the landlord's claims were unjust and extortionate, that the tenants' claims were less than just? The letter was written by Mr. Townshend to the Secretary of the Land Corporation, and the writer said—

"From what I have seen of the Ponsonby Estate, I am sorry to say I believe the Land Commission, if it ever goes before it, will reduce the rents on it very heavily. . . . The existing rents of light tillage land, which might have been fair 15 or 20 years ago, are far above the present value. A good deal of the land I saw I was told was rented at 20s., but it will go under the Land Court at 12s. or 13s., and that is the reason I advised Mr. Smith Barry and the other members of the syndicate to make public as soon as possible that they are only fighting against the way in which the tenants want to cut the rents down."

I invite the attention of the Committee to the fact that the hon. Member for South Huntingdon (Mr. Smith Barry) can put pressure on the Irish Executive to bring enormous forces of constabulary upon the scene to evict, under circumstances of great brutality and hardship, large numbers of industrious tenants, when all the time the injustice and the iniquity of the whole transaction is actually acknowledged by this letter to the agent of the syndicate, whom the Chief Secretary has not scrupled to defend in this House on more than one occasion. All these are circumstances which ought to cause the Committee to pause before voting the enormous sum of close on £1,600,000 for a force which is absolutely exasperating the people of Ireland, which is so expensive to the people of England, which is not productive of any solid or useful benefit to the country, and which, instead of being used legitimately for the protection of life and property and the preservation of order, is being used as a political machine by the Executive and the landlords of Ireland, and is producing an amount of disorder it would be impossible to counteract, were it not for the help and exhortation which comes from quarters in Great Britain to which the Irish people look with confidence.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, 8.): Since the Chief Secretary accepted his present post the Irish administration has been characterised by overwhelming cruelty, and the right hon. Gentleman's chief agents in carrying out the policy of cruelty have been the Royal Irish Constabulary. It is, no doubt, difficult for English Members to understand what the Royal Irish Constabulary means. In England the constable is the person to whom the people go for protection and support, but in Ireland he is a member of a foreign force engaged in carrying out a policy antagonistic to the wishes of the people. The Irish police are military force. They have officers and military accoutrements and rifles. They only lack colours to complete their military character. I would recommend the right hon. Gentleman to signalise his administration by presenting the force with colours, upon which "Do not hesitate to shoot the people" would be a very fitting motto. This order was the first command given under the right hon. Gentleman's administration to the members of the Irish Constabulary. It was telegraphed by Captain Plunket, and that telegram was the initiation of the policy which has characterised the Chief Secretary's three years' administration. I invite the Committee to consider that during the last 10 years there has been a decrease in the population of Ireland to the extent of half a million, while on the other hand there has been an increase of the constabulary by 2,000 men. In no other country with which I am acquainted has there been a steady decline of population, and at the same time a steady increase in the armed men engaged to keep the population down. The cost of the constabulary during the last decade has risen from £1,400,000 to £1,600,000. There is in Ireland at the present moment, including police and military, one armed man to every 17 of the population, not to every 17 fighting men, but to every 17 men, women and children. I submit the reason of this is, that the police are not employed as a protecting force, that they are not employed to enforce just debts between man and man, but that they are employed for the partisan purposes of the Government. I desire to direct attention to three phases of constabulary government in Ireland—namely, to the relation between the Irish Constabulary and the people at large, the relation between the Irish Constabulary and a newspaper called the Times, and the relation between the Irish Constabulary and the landlord class in Ireland. My hon. Friend (Mr. Flynn) has not cited a single case of police brutality towards the people. It will be remembered that the hon. Member for the Holmfirth Division (Mr. H. Wilson) and I have frequently asked the Chief Secretary and the Solicitor General for Ireland that the Irish Constabulary should be numbered or lettered for the purpose of identification. The Irish police are clothed in the same uniform as the Rifles, and we all know that as the

Rifles are used largely for skirmishing their uniform has been adopted in the hope of avoiding detection. Let me give several cases in which the police have acted brutally, and refused to give their names. I find that an aggravated and brutal assault was committed by the Irish police at the Clonmel Railway Station—railway stations seem to be the happy hunting grounds of Irish constables. On the 3rd of March, when Dr. Tanner arrived at Clonmel Station he was cheered by the people. There was the usual baton charge by the police. A reporter from Tipperary was grossly maltreated by a constable, who politely refused to give his name. On the 4th of May, at Kanturk, a Poor Law Guardian was assaulted by a sub-constable. The head-constable, with whom complaint as to the assault was lodged, refused to give the offender's name. At Fermoy the police burst into a meeting which was attended by a Mr. Barry, who had been imprisoned under the Coercion Act, inquired what the people were doing, assaulted men, and refused to give their names. Early in February a crowd in Killarney was dispersed by a baton charge, offence cheering Mr. William O'Brien. On the 23rd of March, at the same place, a crowd was batoned, offence cheering Mr. William O'Brien. The Committee will remember that Mr. Patrick O'Brien was recently assaulted so brutally that for some days his life was in danger, and that even now—a month after the occurrence—he is unable to appear in Court to give evidence in a case vitally concerning himself, and which arose out of one of the numerous libels of the Times' correspondent. A lady, the wife of an English Member of Parliament, desired to attend the meeting at which Mr. Patrick O'Brien was assaulted. Knowing the eagerness of the police to baton and assault I dissuaded the lady from attending the meeting. I feared that if she attended she would be maltreated by the police, who would probably think that an easy way to earn promotion would be to assault the wife of a Member of this House. The police in Ireland are adepts at creating offences. In proof of that charge I need only refer to the notorious Milltownmalbay case. The parish priest of that place having requested the publicans to close their houses on the occasion of a particular trial of an exciting character, his sole object being to prevent the least disturbance of the peace, the police visited 26 of the closed establishments, though they were not in want of refreshments, and asked for drink. The drink was refused them. Twenty-one of the publicans were summoned before a Coercion Court and sentenced to one month's imprisonment apiece. Eleven did not apologise—I wish they had all refused to do so—but suffered imprisonment. The conduct of the constables must be very bad to provoke the indignation of the right hon. Gentleman's "removables," and yet they have often drawn on themselves the censure of these not over scrupulous gentlemen. In the Court-house at Letterkenny on the occasion of one of the numerous remands of Father M'Fadden, a constable named Boyle was seen earmarking the prisoners for another constable to identify. The man was ordered out of Court by Mr. Hamilton, but was afterwards seen sneaking back again for the purpose of carrying on the same operation. Another constable on the occasion of one of the numerous remands of Father M'Fadden was removed from the Court in a state of intoxication. I will not say anything about the note-taking Constable Robinson, who was declared by the Presiding Magistrate to be untrustworthy. The Committee may ask itself why constables like this man Robinson take notes which cannot be relied on. The answer is, because it is better for an Irish constable to convict an Irish Member of Parliament than it is for a military man to get the Victoria Cross. Such is their anxiety to get hold of Irish Members that they have been known after molesting a gentleman to apologise and say, "I beg pardon, but you have a tall hat on, and I thought you were a Member of Parliament." The dealings of the police with Roman Catholic priests, to whose good work in Ireland I can testify, although I kneel at a different altar to them, has been marked by insult and brutality. Father Clarke, of Wicklow, who advised the tenants in regard to the Plan of Campaign, had a warrant out against him; and, though he made it known that he was perfectly prepared to meet it, the police broke into his house to serve the warrant at a little before 4 o'clock in the morning, when he was absent, and terrified some of the female servants by rushing into their room. In another case the police went at midnight to arrest a priest who had previously stated his readiness to meet the warrant taken out against him, the object of such proceeding being obviously to terrorise the people. The same thing also was done in another case, the warrant having been in abeyance for five weeks, and the arrest being at last made at midnight. To be persecuted by the Government is a great honour to us, the Irish Members, and by trying to degrade us you only exalt us; and the same may be said of the Irish priests, for whom you simply inspire greater reverence by your action. I will not refer in detail to the death of District Inspector Martin, which took place on Sunday, February 3. I will merely say that on Saturday evening, February 2, the Chief Secretary for Ireland, in that speech which we will take care shall never be forgotten while the right hon. Gentleman remains in his present office, and which was addressed to the Liberal Unionists of Dublin, who were ashamed to give their names as being present—in that speech, delivered in absolute unconsciousness of the irony of the situation, the right hon. Gentleman congratulated the miserable toadies and place-hunters who surrounded him on the excellent relations existing between the police and the people. That speech was reported in the newspapers on the Monday morning, and side by side with the report was an account of the death of Inspector Martin. It is a small thing, no doubt, but a straw shows which way the wind blows; and this set the Government are making against priests and Members of Parliament is a straw in the present situation. At the last Spring Assizes, at the Court-house of Tralee, an over-zealous constable seeing a Roman Catholic priest listening to the trial went up to him and hustled him out of Court. This peccadillo on the part of the constable was admitted by the Solicitor General for Ireland when questioned about the incident. The hon. and learned Gentleman admitted it, and said it was an error of judgment; but I regard these things as not so much errors of judgment as errors of heart, and I say they arise through the systematic attitude of the Government towards the Irish people. With regard to the seat of war in

Donegal—and I think the use of the phrase "seat of war" is permissible—on the 6th of May the right hon. Gentleman in a moment of candour spoke of County Donegal as being in a state of revolution; but when this expression was afterwards commented upon the right hon. Gentleman said that that state of revolution extended only to one barony. Well, I have often heard of a storm in a tea-cup, but never before of a revolution in a barony. What was the state of Donegal before the right hon. Gentleman's administration? Why that county which now, according to the Chief Secretary, is in a confused and disturbed state was the most peaceful district. I do not know if hon. Members have ever been in a country in armed occupation. If they have not they will hardly understand the state of things which has existed in the County of Donegal—a state of things which one could understand in Russia, but which within the Queen's dominions it is impossible to understand. After the death of Inspector Martin wholesale arrests were made without warrant and without evidence, and passes were given to the peasants to allow them to go to their duties. Constable Mahony—now Head Constable Mahony, for every policeman in Ireland who distinguishes himself by his brutality to the people gets promoted—gave this pass which I now hold in my hand to a peasant, "Please let so-and-so pass," and it is signed by this man. There were wholesale arrests made after the murder of Inspector Martin, none of them, however, on sworn information or warrant. In one case a large number were handcuffed and kept for four hours in an open boat on an angry sea. Is it not amazing that in a country calling itself Christian such brutality should be allowed? I can assure hon. Gentlemen he said that the police were afraid of a popular tumult breaking out. I travelled in the special train myself—although if I had been found out I might have got a month's imprisonment at the hands of one of the removables—but this enables me to say how needless was the expenditure. There has been a reckless, wicked, and profligate expenditure on the part of the Administration; and I ask—will the right hon. Gentleman justify that expenditure out of the Constabulary Vote? As to the spying operations of the police the Irish Members do not mind it, but it comes somewhat hard on English Members like the hon. Member for the Holmfirth Division. That hon. Member went to Ireland to inquire into the unfortunate state of the people on March 16. He was dogged and followed by the constables from one end of Donegal to the other. He could not go into an hotel without being immediately followed there by a policeman, who tried to find out what he was doing, and where he was going. The carmen who drove him were stopped and interrogated. In one case a tourist who had gone over to see the country went to a Chief Inspector and said it was hard to be pursued by the police, and the answer he received was, "You are a respectable person—we will not mind you. It is only Members of Parliament we watch." One person—a Member of Parliament—however, was allowed to go from one end of Donegal to the other without being dogged, and that was because he was the friend of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary. It is only those Members who have the interests of the peasantry at heart who are insulted; the friends of the Chief Secretary and writers in the Times being allowed to wander where they like without being watched. In Donegal the police are quite numerous enough to prevent evicted tenants from returning to their wretched hovels; but they cannot protect the tenants from the robberies of the military. I would here instance again the case of the poor woman whose eight ducks were stolen by the soldiers, and I am surprised that I do not hear the cackle from the hon. Member for South Tyrone with which he greeted the case when it was first mentioned. In another case a girl was brutally assaulted by an Emergency in the presence of Mr. Harrier another gentleman, and although those two gentlemen swore informations, Mr. Cameron, the police officer, refused to receive them. Mr. Cameron has been promoted, but a man called Markham, who once withdrew the police under his command in order to avoid bloodshed, was degraded. This man did not act up to the Chief Secretary's motto, "Do not hesitate to shoot," and he did not belong to that class, half serf, half squireen, from whom District Inspectors are mostly chosen. He was a man who had risen from the ranks, and consequently had sufficient sympathy for the peasant class to wish to avoid a reckless use of the bayonet on them. I possess a tabulated statement showing that the law is administered one way in favour of the police, and another way against the people. And now I bring this charge against those who have authority over the Royal Irish Constabulary, that whilst it is their proper duty to maintain law and order in Ireland—or, at all events, that wretched substitute which there stands in the place of law and order—they have been transferred to London as the mere dustmen of the Times, and I will show that the men drafted to London were as much the agents of the Times as were Pigott or Houston. Is it not a strange thing that the same men, or the same class of men, who were employed for collecting evidence for the Times were also employed to prevent the collection of evidence on behalf of the Irish Members? It seems to me beyond the possibility of doubt that the men acted upon some hint from headquarters. These men catch the tone of their masters. They know what their masters think with dog-like fidelity and carry out their master's wish, but not like dogs. Dogs generally are actuated by affection, but the Irish Constabulary are stimulated by the low, gross motive—the hope of pecuniary reward. Constables have been known of late to molest men collecting for the Parnell Defence Fund, to seize their collecting cards and disperse a small gathering of Nationalists. Recently also there has been a case of constables tearing down placards asking for subscriptions in aid of the legal expenses of the Irish Members, and three young men who were engaged in innocently tabulating statistics of crime to be produced before the Special Commission were followed by police and deprived of their papers—though these subsequently were grudgingly restored after questions galore had been addressed to the Chief Secretary on the subject in this House. How was the Times treated by the Government—of course in their private capacity—according to the statements of Head Constable Quinn, Michael Roche, and Iago—and a better name for a witness for the Times was never devised? Why, it is clear that the police were employed to get up the Times' case. On the 11th April we find there was close connection between the constabulary and the Times. A secret Police Circular was issued to the constabulary early in November, the first sitting of the Commission Court taking place on the 22nd of October. This circular was sent to every police station by every District Inspector with instructions to find out, almost in the language of the Charges Commission, the connection between the League and crime. We have read this circular before the House, and the right hon. Gentleman has exercised great discretion in regard to it, neither admitting or denying it. But we have further evidence; we have evidence of the eyesight of a Member of this House. It happens that the chambers of the hon. Member for Rushcliffe Division overlook Mr. Soames's office in Lincoln's Inn, and he saw Mr. Soames's office looking like an office of the Royal Irish Constabulary, around which Irish constables lounged and smoked, and the men thus engaged week after week are those we are now asked to vote this money for as preservers of law and order in Ireland. Hanging in Mr. Soames's office was a notice, signed by County Inspector Flockton, requiring men of the constabulary to enter their names in a book kept in the office for the purpose. Inspector Flockton was never examined before the Commission. What was he doing there? Coaching Times witnesses. And for this we are asked to pay this Inspector his salary. Further, the connection has been shown between the constabulary and Pigott. So long as Pigott was of value to the Times and the Government he had a guard of honour of the Royal Irish Constabulary but when he ceased to be of value, the guard dropped their arms and Pigott was allowed to go. Two Irish sergeants of constabulary, Sergeants Fausett and Gallagher—I hope they have had promotion for their services—were placed under the orders of Shannon of the Times, and these formed a bodyguard for Pigott. But this guard allowed Pigott to escape after they had got from him on the Saturday a sworn affidavit to be read in the Court on Monday. Then we had Head Constable Preston, of the Royal Irish Constabulary, interviewing convicts in English prisons, at the instance of Mr. Soames, for the purpose of getting up evidence for the Times and to incriminate Irish representatives. We know that he visited Nally and Mullet in prison and held out to them almost any bribe to induce them to bear evidence against Irish Members. So to this further depth were the Irish Constabulary allowed to sink. They were employed to introduce into England the methods of Irish administration to the shame of both nations. Tracey was thus visited, and he was not afterwards examined; but there is good reason to believe that he was offered bribes to give evidence on behalf of the Times. Why were these members of the constabulary placed at the service of Mr. Soames of the Times? Why are we asked to pay their expenses in London when they should have been discharging their duties in Ireland? The Courts of Justice, the Inns of Court Hotel, were swarming with Irish Constabulary, and I am not exceeding the mark when I say that not more than a third of those brought over to London were examined before the Commission. An industrious gentleman has noted the numbers of constabulary present in Court when the Court on one occasion adjourned because witnesses were not ready, and at that time there were in Court eight members of the force in uniform, 10 in plain clothes, five District Inspectors, and four members of the Dublin Police. We have heard on previous occasions how an Inspector endeavoured to get evidence from a man named Welsh, under threat of prosecution for certain insurance frauds in which the man was supposed to be implicated. They were Liverpool frauds, said the Chief Secretary; but, as a fact, the trial would have had to be held in Ireland, for there the frauds were committed. We have Mr. Houston acting as paymaster to the men of the constabulary for their expenses during the time they were kept in London for weeks and months beyond the time they could have been required to give evidence; and, as a matter of fact, they never gave evidence at all. Why were these men in London, and why are we to pay their salaries as if they had been attending to their duties in Ireland? Why are we asked to pay these men for time in which they were assisting in an infamous conspiracy? I have described these men as the dustmen of the Times, and now let me touch upon them as the merciless, heartless, cruel bailiffs of merciless landlords of Ireland. Nothing, I suppose, in connection with the cruel eviction proceedings in Ireland sent a greater thrill of horror through this country than the action of the police at the Glenbigh evictions when they protected emergency men, while the latter used petroleum for firing the wretched homes of the evicted tenants. At Falcarragh a new form of police administration was entered upon. Special bailiffs, not the Sheriff's men, but servants of the landlord, were employed; and here we first have the now famous battering ram brought on the scene. My right hon. Friend the Lord Mayor of Dublin (Mr. Sexton), a man not in the habit of going back from his word, has said that if we do not find out how the expense of this battering ram is paid, we shall oppose vigorously all efforts to get this Vote. Now, after much questioning, we did obtain from the Solicitor General for Ireland the fact that the ram cost £48 18s. 2½d., and that it was sent to District Inspector Law, of Letterkenny. I suppose hon. Gentlemen opposite will regard the Dublin Daily Express as a trustworthy authority, and in the issue of that journal for March 28 we have a description of the battering ram, to the effect that the ram is 15 feet long, mounted on four wheels, suspended by chains from iron uprights, and that the men working the ram have the protection of an iron shield—in addition to the protection they receive here from the Chief Secretary—picks, crowbars, scaling ladders, and other gear was attached, and the whole paraphernalia was sent on to Inspector Law, at Letterkenny. But we have had the greatest difficulty to find out how these expenses were paid. Who paid for this ram?

Who owns it? I hope now that the Chief Secretary will not exercise any maidenly reserve in this matter. I may refer the Committee to the questions many of us asked about this ram earlier in the Session; but with the exception of the information I have mentioned as extracted from the Solicitor General for Ireland, we have not yet found how this ram has been paid for. On Friday the Chief Secretary informed me that it is an item that does not appear in the Estimates; and yesterday, exercising the better part of that courage with which on the assurance of the Chancellor of the Exchequer we are asked to credit him, the right hon. Gentleman discreetly stayed away and avoided further questioning. Well, this battering ram was received by the police, and the police tested its qualities at Gweedore. I being in the neighbourhood at the time addressed the local Inspector with a courtesy to which he at first responded; but when I asked him for information as to the practice with the ram, our relations immediately became strained, and have so continued since. The ram was brought out for active operation at the Olphert evictions on April 11th this year, to be used against miserable turf hovels that even a kick from the Chief Secretary would demolish. The ram was not actually used then, but it was present. Now, I want to use this battering ram against the police. I know the right hon. Gentleman will say he is accustomed to these strictures, and that after all they are no more than his predecessors, and notably the late Mr. Forster, had to submit to. The late Mr. Forster had a tender heart and a conscience; but the present Chief Secretary has only an uncle and a battering ram. At these Falcarragh evictions the homes were without food—the tenants in the poorest possible condition. I have seen a good deal of misery and destitution and suffering under various aspects, but I confess I have never seen anything so pitiable as the employment of the ram against those wretched hovels and the turning out on the roadside of miserable people with starvation marked on every lineament. On the Good Friday I was present, and saw one of the tenants, a man of 45 years perhaps, waiting for the battering ram to smash his wretched house away. Not a morsel of food had he in the house; his potato crop of three acres had failed. On this cold clay floor his mother was lying in a state of stupor; a little child was playing about; starvation was written on the man's face. The usual policeman had followed us to take note of our proceedings, and to him I turned and invited him to join with us in giving the man assistance. To do him justice he did so. I will not give his name, for a black mark might be set against it. It is against scenes of this kind we protest—scenes which are enacted at the instance of the amateur apostle of Church Congresses. What an example of practical Christianity, on the anniversary of the death of our Redeemer! On this Olphert estate the cost of these evictions was 10 times the amount of the rent due; but the landlord derived some pecuniary advantage from letting the wretched hovels of his evicted tenants as temporary police barracks. These things I can prove, though now I only state them. Removing the trappings from the pretence of maintaining law and order, we find that Irish administration is a gross, wicked, villainous, sordid system of tyranny. Those who ought to be the natural guardians of the people are those who, carrying out the behests of the Chief Secretary, have promoted these scenes.

*MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): I do not propose to trespass on the time of the Committee in reference to those questions of administration hon. Members have raised, upon which Members who have been in Ireland are better able to speak than I am. Approaching the Vote from an economical point of view, there are a few questions I should like to put to the Chief Secretary, and that the Committee may be able to understand the position of Ireland in regard to police, I would refer Members to the particulars given on pages 279 and 319 of the Estimates. On page 279 we find it stated that the number of police employed in Scotland is 4,027, and the number in Ireland which are to be provided for by the Vote is 12,810, the population of Ireland not being more than a million greater. The Committee have already voted for the Scotch police £156,125, the total cost, adding everything together, being, I calculate, about £376,000, whereas the cost of the Irish Police is £1,439,000. The first question I wish to put is with reference to the pay, allowances, and extra pay. The ordinary pay is £871,000, allowances £77,000, and the extra pay is £34,000, besides travelling expenses. I find the pay of these officers higher than they would receive as officers in Her Majesty's Army, and very much in excess of the pay received by officers occupying similar posts either in the counties or boroughs of England, or in the Metropolitan Police Force. Take, for instance, the District Inspectors. You have 36 first-class Inspectors with salaries rising to £350 and £450 per annum, and 90 District Inspectors of the first class with salaries rising from £225 to £250, £275 to £300 a year. But that does not represent the whole of the pay of these gentlemen. If you simply take £200 or £300 a year, it is a very large sum for an Inspector. I find in the Metropolitan Police Force that there are two Inspectors who receive £200 a year; five £195, and 36 £190 a year. The population of Ireland is about the same as that of the Metropolis, and the number of the Irish Police is about 1,500 less than the number of the London Police; and the Irish Inspector is not called upon to perform more responsible duties than an Inspector of the Metropolitan Police. But if the Committee will turn to pages 322 and 323 of the Estimates, they will find six District Inspectors are specially employed on detective duty, each at £120 per annum, and I want to know whether that is in addition to the salary of £300 or £400 a year. Then there are five District Inspectors employed on detective duty at £100 a year, and I wish to know whether that is in addition to these gentlemen's salaries. We next come to an item in these gentlemen's pay for which I can find no parallel in the Metropolitan Police Force accounts. There are servants allowed to officers of the Irish Force—255 servants, each at £45 per annum, for whom we have to pay £11,475. Now, I cannot make out the 255 servants, unless these officers have several servants each. The Inspector General and Deputy Inspector General are, of course, superior officers, and also the County Inspectors. But, assuming that you give one servant to each District Inspector of the first class, that would only give you 140 officers who would be entitled to servants. But you have 255 servants at £45 per annum. You ought to pay to the Irish Inspector, as you have to pay to any other public servant, his full remuneration. This allowance of servants is merely an imitation of what goes on in the Army. Then there is a very large amount for these Inspectors' lodging allowances. I presume the Chief Secretary will be able to tell us that these amounts are checked; that they do not represent the estimates, but that they represent actual payments duly vouched for. Then I come to the stationery allowance. These County and District Inspectors receive stationery allowance to the amount of £2,700 a year. When I had the honour of sitting on the Stationery Committee some years ago, I found that in certain instances the stationery was sent, and the allowances were made. I should like a little explanation of this £2,700. Then I come to "special allowances," which I think must apply to the question to which the hon. Member has been drawing attention—special allowances to policemen serving in Great Britain, £1,358. Why are the Irish Constabulary introduced as serving in Great Britain? We are quite capable of managing our own police; and I never heard of the County, Borough, or Metropolitan Police requiring to be supplemented by the Irish Constabulary. But I take it that this is part of the expenditure of the recent migration of the Irish Police to England, where they have been in London, as we know, for some time. But there being a charge for "lodging and fuel," I should like to ask the Chief Secretary where the item appears on the other side to credit. A large number of the Irish Police have been in London on the service of the Times. These men have been paid. I have no doubt that the Times has been put to a very heavy outlay with respect to police witnesses. According to the Treasury rule, when a servant of the public receives pay from a third person, the amount must be carried to the credit of the account, from which the charge for that service is paid. If the House turn to the Metropolitan Police Accounts, they will find that the sum of £169,000 has been received for various purposes. Then we come to the items "receipts from public companies and private inaggressor, and there would be hundreds of similar cases brought before juries if it were not part of the tactics of the Chief Secretary to extend the protection of the Executive to the police in matters of this kind where savage assaults are committed by the police upon an un-offending people. Every application to obtain the name of the policeman by whom an assault has been committed is refused. If the application is made in this House it is met with equivocation and prevarication, and it is impossible to obtain the name of the constable who, as a general rule, has been drafted from some distant place. That is the reason why we have been able to bring comparatively few cases before the Civil Tribunals to expose the proceedings of the constabulary in the way they deserve. I will tell the House as briefly as possible what occurred on the occasion of the brutal assault by the police on my hon. Friend the Member for North Monaghan (Mr. Patrick O'Brien). The hon. Member for North-East Cork (Mr. William O'Brien) was returning from a journey, and the hon. Member for North Monaghan went to the railway platform with some friends and some ladies to meet him. There were comparatively few persons on the platform, because the fact of the return of the hon. Member for North-East Cork had been purposely concealed in order to preclude the possibility of an attack upon the people. The police on the platform placed the hon. Member for North-East Cork under arrest. Mr. O'Brien asked for the production of the warrant, and while the warrant was being produced some enthusiastic gentleman in the rear of the crowd cried out "Three cheers for William O'Brien." An order was immediately given to the police to "Draw batons," which caused them to commit a furious assault upon the bystanders with truncheons and clubbed rifles, not only upon the people assembled on the platform, but on the passengers. Various persons present, including many clergymen, affirmed that the hon. Member for North Monaghan was beaten with truncheons on the back and head and knocked to the ground, and struck while on the ground by some policemen with their clubbed rifles. He tried to rise, with blood pouring from two or three wounds, but was knocked senseless on the pavement, when some police bore him off in a cab to a doctor. I have evidence, and I can substantiate it on oath, that the attack on my hon. Friend was premeditated, that before the train arrived he was pointed out by two or three constables, as was also the gentlemen who accompanied him, and the moment the train arrived the assault was made. The reason is believed to be that the hon. Member had been successful that day in holding a series of meetings in defiance of an illegal proclamation which had been issued suppressing meetings near Cork. We asked in this House for an explanation of the assault, and we received two—one by the Chief Secretary, and the other by the Solicitor General for Ireland. The latter dismissed the suggestion that there had been an attempted rescue of the hon. Member for North-East Cork as an utterly absurd and baseless fiction of the right hon. Gentleman's creation, or of that of his subordinates in Ireland, while the Chief Secretary, not knowing what had been said, deliberately suggested, with the airy nonchalance which we all admire, but which is hardly consistent with the grave duties he has to discharge, an attempted rescue as the cause of the disturbance. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will give a fair, straightforward, and honourable answer to this question. Will he assist us by giving the name of the head constable who gave the order to draw batons, the result of which was the wanton assault upon my hon. Friend which I have described. The right hon. Gentleman has already said that the Inspector gave no order, but that the head constable said, "Draw batons." I am not very well versed in the regulations of the Constabulary, and I should like to know whether an order to draw batons sufficient to justify a brutal attack of this kind? Let us know who gave the order, and we will test once for all before an impartial tribunal the responsibility of the action of the police on this occasion. The nature of the attack can be proved by the results which followed. 14 or 15 persons were taken to the infirmary more or less injured, and the indiscriminate nature of the assault may be seen from the fact that a number of the passengers who were injured were gentlemen opposed to the Nationalist Party, among them being

son of Sir John Arnott, of Cork, who was returning from a fishing excursion, and the Mayor's sergeant, who went down to the station to meet his wife on her return from a trip into the country. While the hon. Member for North-East Cork was under arrest the train arrived at Charleville, at 12 o'clock at night. A small crowd of persons were on the platform to meet friends returning from Cork, and when it was found that Mr. O'Brien was in the train, some cheers were raised and an attempt was made to shake hands with him. As the train was in motion, a shot was fired by District Inspector Concannon, and two other shots were fired by constables. Had any one been killed by those shots there can be no doubt that it would have been wanton and unprovoked murder on the part of the police. District Inspector Concannon's shot took effect in the thigh of a young man who was sitting on a wall at some distance from the train, and had it proved fatal all the sophistry of the Chief Secretary would be insufficient to clear the police from the dreadful charge of deliberate murder. In reference to this matter the Chief Secretary appears to have discovered for himself, or to have adopted the most extraordinary theory, that shots were fired by the crowd upon the police. In the first place, the police were in an ordinary train returning from Cork, and there were very few people assembled at the Charleville Station, as I can prove to the right hon. Gentleman will afford me the chance of an inquiry. There were none of the local police on the platform, which is hardly consistent with the fact that a criminal so notorious and dreaded as my hon. Friend the Member for North-East Cork was known to be in the train. In the second place, the railway station of which I speak is 40 miles distant from Cork. It was a Sunday, and there was no possibility of communicating with the town of Charleville before 10 o'clock in the morning. The crowd who were awaiting the return of my hon. friends heard that the hon. Member for North-East Cork was in the train; they cheered him, and attempted to shake hands with him, and thereupon the constables, headed by their District Inspector, fired three revolver shots. Such circumstances demand some more satisfactory explanation from the right hon. Gentleman than that he has yet given. Passing from this matter I come to the question of the employment of the Constabulary at evictions in Ireland. I do not believe there can be two opinions in the House that the real cause, or at any rate one of the principal causes, of the enormous and continuous increase in the Constabulary Vote is the manner in which the police are placed at the disposal of every landlord and County Sheriff who requires them. I do not contend that the Constabulary cannot be called upon or cannot be employed by the Executive in the enforcement of law, and the carrying out of evictions; but I maintain it is an absolute misuse of an expensive force of this kind to place them solely at the beck and call of one particular set of creditors in Ireland. It is a matter of some difficulty for the ordinary creditor to get the Sheriff to move at all; but these extraordinary, these unjust debts, take the first place in the estimation of the Executive, because the landlords are their friends, and because in collecting rents they are carrying out the policy which recommends itself to individual members of the Executive. Why, in the name of common sense, should a body of able-bodied constables be placed at the disposal of any body of creditors in a different manner to that in which they are placed at the disposal of ordinary creditors? Some of the evictions in Ireland are carried out, if not under the immediate presence, at any rate under the patronage of the right hon. Gentleman. It is, no doubt, an instructive lesson in law and order to see the Constabulary sitting down near the homes of the wretched people being evicted drinking champagne with the Private Secretary and Colleague of the Chief Secretary. What lesson can the people draw from that? Does it tend to give them any belief in the impartiality of the Irish Government? With regard to the actual presence of police at these evictions, I want to ask the attention of the Committee to one or two instances as showing a close connection between the landlord, the heads of the Irish Executive, and the principal officers of the Irish Constabulary. The Luggacurran evictions were carried out under the immediate patronage of the right hon. Gentleman. There we had the landlords' figures as to acreage, rent, valuation, and arrears, in keep a horse to deprive him of the allowance for a servant. With regard to the stationery allowance, I have no information to give the right hon. Gentleman. I will inquire into the system, and, though I have no reason to believe that it is not economical, I will see that economy is practised. Then, as to the item of special allowances for lodging and fuel for men serving in Great Britain, I am surprised, not at the right hon. Gentleman's remarks on the subject, but at the vociferous cheers of hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway, who apparently think that the item is due to expenditure incurred in bringing over constables to the Special Commission. The right hon. Gentleman asked whether it is not a fact that this item is connected with the presence of a large number of police constables in London. ["No!"] The right hon. Gentleman asked if they were brought here for the Times.

*MR. H. H. FOWLER: I did.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I listened to the right hon. Gentleman, if hon. Members below the Gangway did not. To that I reply that neither directly or indirectly is this item connected with the Times case. For the last 40 years it has been the custom—as far as I know a beneficial custom—to have a certain number of members of the Irish Constabulary in the large towns of England and Wales, but they are not here in connection with anything that could be described as a political crime. Their duty is to detect ordinary crime committed by members of the floating population that spend part of the year in Ireland and part of the year in England. Then the right hon. Gentleman asked whether there has been any payment in favour of the Exchequer on account of the sums paid by the Times to the officers of the constabulary. To that I answer generally that the dealings of the Times with the witnesses has been precisely the same as in any ordinary case. The ordinary practice with regard to the cost of witnesses and the source from which such cost is defrayed, I have no doubt, has been strictly followed. The right hon. Gentleman next drew attention to what he calls "the magnitude" of the medical allowances. The explanation which I have to give is that where doctors are expected, as they are in Ireland, to make long journeys, considerable expense must often be incurred.

Mr. A. J. Balfour

The concentration of the police force in London is no doubt a source of economy. Similar economy could hardly be practised where a Police Force is distributed over so large an area as Ireland. The heading "extra pay" is very misleading, for it does not represent what any ordinary human being would infer from the name. The pay here referred to is simply the allowance which must always be paid to people who are required to leave their ordinary abodes and to sustain themselves elsewhere. It does not represent pay for additional services, but it represents the additional expenditure incurred by members of the police force when they are required to support themselves in some other place than their own homes. The right hon. Gentleman has made merry over the item of £3,000 in connection with elections and disturbances, and asked whether a General Election is expected next year, as this item appears on the Estimates. But as the same amount was required last year, when there was no General Election, it is only reasonable to suppose that an equal sum will be wanted this year. There are many elections in Ireland in addition to Parliamentary elections, and at any rate the right hon. Gentleman will not deny that there are disturbances. As to the Transport Service in Ireland, the right hon. Gentleman must know that large bodies of men cannot be moved without throwing considerable expense upon this estimate. The right hon. Gentleman also criticised the sum spent on postage. He said what an appalling thing—£18,000!

*MR. H. H. FOWLER: £6,800.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Well, £6,800. That item, no doubt, has increased; but the increase is due to the fact that now great use is made of the parcel post. [Laughter.] The last point to which I need refer is the question of pensions. Undoubtedly, the tendency in recent years has been to improve the position of the Constabulary. If the right hon. Gentleman thinks that their pay and allowances, including pensions, are too great, I cannot agree with him. I will, however, point out that I am not responsible for the present scale and rate of pay. If there is any responsibility in the matter attaching to one Government more than another, that responsibility rests with the heads of the Party to which the right hon. Gentleman belongs. Considering the onerous duties devolving on the force, the extremely difficult character of much of the work which they have to perform, and considering also that the very best men that Ireland can provide are enlisted in the service, I do not think that they are overpaid. The excellent personnel of the Constabulary Force is notorious. We have secured the very pick of the Irish population. I will be no party to the kind of economy to which the criticism of the right hon. Gentleman points, and I will do nothing to injure a force of which, as I hold, Irishmen may be justly proud.

*MR. H. H. FOWLER: I wish to have one word of explanation in reference to the allusion which the right hon. Gentleman made to me. I never was responsible at the Treasury for the Irish Estimates. The Irish Estimates which passed through Parliament when I held office were signed and presented by my predecessor. I quite agree with the Chief Secretary that my own Party is quite as much to blame for the extravagant administration of the Irish Constabulary as the Party of the right hon. Gentleman. I do not approach this question from a Party, but from a purely economical point of view. I made a far stronger attack upon my right hon. Friend the Member for Bridgeton when he was Chief Secretary than I have made to-night; and I should wish to divert this part of the subject from a Party aspect.

*MR. W. FOSTER (Ilkeston, Derby): Mr. Courtney, I have said on previous occasions that this expenditure was very useless, very dangerous; and the Chief Secretary has not given us that fair answer which we could have expected. I hope another year we shall have a more satisfactory explanation from him. There is one point to which he alluded which does open our eyes a little, and that is, that the Irish Constabulary get extra pay, and therefore have a great interest in disturbances.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Gentleman is entirely mistaken. I explained, I thought clearly, that there is no such thing as extra pay in the ordinary sense of that word.

*MR. W. FOSTER: It comes out of the pocket of the taxpayers, and we object to our money being spent on travelling expenses and conveniences for a military police. I happen to have, probably, a longer experience of the Irish Police than the right hon. Gentleman. Thirty years ago the Irish Police were the pride of Ireland. The physique of the Irish Constabulary is as good now as then, but 30 years ago they occupied a very different position in the regard of the people to what they do now. At that time the cost of the force was about £700,000, although the population was 6,000,000. Now it is £1,500,000, with a decreasing population. The great mass of the people are in bitter antagonism to this military police force, and I protest, as a taxpayer, against this wanton and wasteful expenditure. There is another way in which you can judge of the changed relations between the people and the police. Thirty years ago the privates in the Police Force were often enabled to marry above their stations in life, and you could not have a better test of the popularity of the force than that. But the other day I had a conversation with a young lady of good social position, and she stated that she was compelled to break her engagement with an Inspector of Police, such was the feeling of the district, and so strong the feelings of her own relations. What I wish to point out is that the condition of things is changed very much for the worse. In August last year I went to Abbeyfeale, in Ireland, in order to go over the estate, where 45 houses were being prepared against evictions. I went to the house of the Parish Priest, and when I came out I saw a little picket of police, and further on another squad beside a car. I drove with the Priest to the estate, and saw, to my astonishment, that the police followed in their car—an army of one sub-inspector, one head constable, one sergeant, and one rank and file. That was a disgraceful misuse of the Force. They kept a certain distance from us, but followed us the whole way to the estate, pulling up within a few yards of us. I looked at the fortified houses, and spoke to one policeman who followed me about, in order that no mistake might be made, and in order that he might ask me any questions. I said something about the evictions, and he said it was a bad day for them. It was raining, as if that had anything to do with the cause of the misery which was being occasioned. He asked me no questions. I had conversation from time to time with the people, and the officer continued to follow my movements. We drove to another estate, and these men followed us. I say such conduct to a Member of Parliament was an insult to him and his constituents. If the officer had inquired from the Resident Magistrate, he would have discovered who I was. When I told the Resident Magistrate—to whom I had done a kindness by attending in my capacity of a doctor to his daughter, who was suffering from a sickness of a fatal kind—how I had been followed, he seemed ashamed of the indignity to which I had been subjected. My experience is not singular. I took refuge in the Priest's house, and when I came out I found I was watched. We drove to the station and found policemen there waiting for us. During the whole of my stay I and my friends were watched by policemen. Practically, we occupied about one-third of the force of Abbeyfeale. This misuse of public money, this barren use of the police, is a disgrace to any Government or any official who defends it. Similar indignities have been offered to other Englishmen travelling in Ireland. In England we do not allow our police to be used for private purposes without a money charge being made for their services; and if the right hon. Gentleman would introduce that system with regard to the Irish Constabulary, the landlords would be a little more tender in the administration of the law and in the execution of their decrees. Then we have, also, the charges of brutality of the Police Force, in such an instance as that of Mr. O'Brien, who was actually injured the other day. And we had frequently before this House, in the shape of repeated questioning, the telegram in which a Constabulary Officer said — "Do not hesitate to shoot."

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Gentleman will excuse me for interrupting. That telegram has been grossly misquoted. The words "if it be necessary" have been left out by those who have quoted it; and I suppose that even the hon. Gentleman opposite will admit that those words are not an unimportant part of the telegram.

Sir W. Foster

*SIR W. FOSTER: I admit that these words, to a certain extent, take the sting out of the telegram.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Hear, hear.

*SIR W. FOSTER: But when a man puts the words, "Do not hesitate to shoot" in front, it shows the spirit by which the man is prompted who writes the telegram. If he had been actuated by a different spirit, he would have said probably, "Only shoot in the last resort." I believe that this expenditure on the Irish Police is bad because it creates disaffection among the Irish people. A more humane system should be introduced, for every week we have instances of the brutality of the police recorded. A brutal police means a brutalised people. The people of Ireland are being reduced to a state of bondage by the presence of a Military Force in their country, which is as if under a military occupation. You arrive at a station, and police are there to receive you and to watch you off. If a few people gather around you in conversation, the police come between you. This military spirit is rampant and dominant throughout the country, and the people resent it. It is a system of bondage for the Irish people, a life of bondage, and of licence for brute force; it is a system which is a disgrace to the British Government, and I hope that an end will soon be put to it.

MR. GILL (Louth, S.): I do not know when the right hon. Gentleman proposes to reply to the graver charges which have been made against his administration of the police; but before he does so, I wish to put a few questions to him, chiefly in connection with the incidents attending the arrest of my hon. Friend the Member for North-East Cork. On a recent occasion my hon. Friend brought this matter before the House, but he had to do so under very unsatisfactory circumstances. He was only allowed to make a personal statement, and moreover, the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary was, by the ruling of the Chair, precluded from making any reply to the statement. I trust, therefore, that this evening he will not treat this as a question which has been disposed of, more especially as he has taken very good care that this evening my hon. Friend the Member for North-East Cork shall be absent from the House. This is the day on which it was necessary that he should be in Ireland in order to take his trial for the alleged offence for which it was thought necessary to arrest him in so summary and violent a fashion some weeks ago, and the day selected for the trial, notwithstanding the protests of my hon. Friend, was also the day selected by the Government for commencing the discussion on the Irish Estimates, and for discussing especially the Vote on which this particular question could be raised. Therefore, I repeat that the right hon. Gentleman has provided for the absence of my hon. Friend, and he has also provided for the absence of the hon. Member for Longford, who he knew would be engaged in the defence of the Member for North-East Cork. I trust the right hon. Gentleman will treat this question as if my hon. Friends were present, and that he will give us a clear explanation of the reasons why the Government adopted the course which they took on that occasion. First, I will ask, why was the hon. Member arrested in the manner in which he was? Why was it necessary to arrest him at all? Why did the Authorities not proceed in the manner in which they have proceeded in a subsequent prosecution—namely, by summons? The day on which the arrest took place was a Sunday, and a day of great excitement and commotion in the City of Cork.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! It does not appear that the question which the hon. Member is discussing is pertinent to this Vote.

MR. GILL: I am desirous of discussing the action of the police on that particular occasion.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The conduct of the police is quite perti-sion for the arrest of my hon. Friend? The first thing which occurred on this occasion was a baton charge by the police at Bandon Railway Station. The explanation for that charge offered by the Solicitor General for Ireland when this question was raised upon a recent occasion in the House, was that a rescue had been attempted by my hon. Friend the Member for North Monaghan; that there was a crowd of persons on the platform which intended to attempt a rescue, and that it was to prevent that that the baton charge took place. Now, that statement I brand as a monstrous fabrication, and whoever put it into the mouth of the right hon. Gentleman or of the Solicitor General for Ireland gave them an utterly unfounded and utterly infamous fabrication. There would have been no such thing as an attempt to rescue; there was no such intention in the mind of anybody present, for nobody had the slightest notion that the hon. Member was about to be arrested. A number of his friends, including some colleagues of the hon. Member for North Monaghan, went to meet Mr. William O'Brien on his return from a meeting in another part of Cork in order to accompany him to another railway station from which he was about to take his departure for London. There were several ladies among those present, and this is the crowd which it is suggested would have attempted a rescue. As a matter of fact, it was only when he stepped out of the carriage and a policeman laid his hand on the hon. Member's shoulder and announced that he was a prisoner, that anybody dreamt that an arrest was going to take place. At that very moment, without a moment's warning, and without the slightest provocation, the police rushed violently, baton in hand and mauls clubbed, on the crowd of inoffensive people on the platform, and they felled to the ground my hon. Friend the Member for North Monaghan, who is still suffering from the effects of the blow. They struck several people in the crowd, and they committed one of the most wanton and barbarous assaults that has ever been recorded in the annals of tyranny all the world through. Now I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman why he chose such an occasion for the arrest of my hon. Friend; and, secondly, what was the cause of this baton charge. How can he explain the fact that this violent criminal, whom it was necessary to arrest amidst scenes of violence, bloodshed, and disturbance has since that moment been walking about at large doing as he pleases. I think the circumstances I have narrated show the utter hollowness of the pretence which was put forward that a rescue was projected. Now I come to another grave matter in connection with this question, and that is the firing by Inspector Concannon and his men on the people assembled at the Charleville Railway Station. The right hon. Gentleman has explained that this crowd also had an intention of rescuing my hon. Friend, and that they were proceeding in a most violent manner to do so; that they were firing shots at the police in their attempted rescue, and that the police were therefore put under the necessity of firing back again in self-defence. Now, Sir, there is one very plain answer to that suggestion. Mr. O'Brien was arrested about 10 o'clock at night. The telegraph office at Charleville had been closed ever since 10 o'clock in the morning, and there was no possibility in the world of the news reaching Charleville before the arrival of the train in which Mr. O'Brien was being conveyed. What really occurred on that platform was this: A little group of band boys had assembled to meet the deputation which had gone from Charleville to attend the Cork meeting, and they intended to escort that deputation on its return home. When the train arrived, this band struck up a tune, which they were allowed to play right through. Then they commenced a second tune, and marched along the platform in the direction of the carriages, from which they expected to see the deputation alight. When they had gone half the way along the platform, they received the first intimation that Mr. O'Brien was in the train under arrest, and they at once gave a cheer for the hon. Member, and rushed to the carriage door asking leave to shake hands with him. Inspector Concannon, who was in charge of the police, thereupon became exceedingly excited. He drew his sword and declared that these men were about to rescue Mr. William O'Brien. An attempt was made to open the door, as the blinds to the carriage windows were all closely drawn, but the police thrust out their rifles and drove the crowd back. Soon one thereupon broke a window with his stock, and Concannon and two policemen drew their revolvers. At the same time, one of the porters employed at the station went to the carriage to collect tickets. He pulled open the door and asked for the tickets of the police, but they shouted out that they had no tickets. He told them that they must get some, and they at once hurled him from the carriage and slammed the door in his face. The crowd thereupon groaned, and the policemen, just as the train was moving off, fired three shots from their revolvers. I want an explanation of that conduct. Will the right hon. Gentleman give the House any means of inquiring into the responsibility for what might have proved a bloody and atrocious murder? I brand the conduct of the police on that occasion as deserving in the utmost degree of the condemnation of the Executive. The statement of my hon. Friend the Member for North-East Cork is before the House. He has described what occurred between himself and the police after the train had left the station. He has told the House how the Inspector admitted that only three shots were fired. He has shown how, upon examination, he found that all three shots were fired by the police, and with such unimpeachable evidence before him, surely the right hon. Gentleman, if he conducted the business of his office as it should be conducted, would agree to make a thorough inquiry into the proceeding, and to hold a public inquiry on oath, and thereby satisfy the public that the truth would be elicited. These are the heads of the very grave matters I charge against the police this evening. I shall reserve my comments on the right hon. Gentleman's reply until we have got his explanation. For the present I shall not deal at any greater length with the administration of the Police Force in Ireland, my desire being to concentrate the attention of the right hon. Gentleman upon these particular matters.

MR. O'HEA (Donegal, W.): I wish to press upon the right hon. Gentleman a few further considerations appertaining to the same occasion. I was witness of most of the events that occurred in Cork in the earlier part of the day, but I was not present at the railway station.

although I have taken the trouble to satisfy myself as to what occurred on that occasion. My hon. Friend the Member for North Monaghan, knowing that Mr. O'Brien was coming from a distant part of the country, left his hotel accompanied by two young ladies, the daughters of the proprietor, to meet his friend. I have since obtained a graphic account of the occurrence at the station. The party left the hotel about half an hour before the train was due to arrive at the station, and at the time of their arrival there, they found very few people present, although a large crowd of police had mustered. They ascertained from one of the porters at what portion of the platform the carriage in which Mr. O'Brien was travelling would be likely to draw up, and while the Member for North Monaghan was talking to a Tipperary gentleman, a policeman, known to these young ladies, recommended them to go down to the lower end of the platform, because he said they would be quite safe there. Why did he give that advice to the young ladies? The manifest answer is—that the policeman knew that something was going to happen, and that probably a baton charge would take place as soon as the train arrived. I do not propose to go into all the details of the bludgeoning which followed. I may merely remark that one of the persons who was so injured as to have to be conveyed to the hospital was one of the sergeants of the Mayor of Cork, who had simply gone down to hear the cheer given for Mr. O'Brien. He was in uniform, and one would have thought that his uniform would have protected him from assault; but, as a fact, he was so seriously injured that a fortnight afterwards he had not recovered from the beating he then received. But I repeat that I will not go into the details of so brutal and disgusting an occurrence. Comment has been made on the extraordinary methods employed for the arrest of Mr. O'Brien—

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order!

MR. O'HEA: Upon the arrest of the hon. Member for North-East Cork, and I respectfully invite the attention of the House to facts which sufficiently indicate the extraordinary circumstances under which my hon. Friend was arrested. It happened that the following evening I was driving on my way home, when I called upon my hon. Friend the Member for East Cork. That gentleman told me that during the whole of the day the front of his office had been patrolled by policemen in uniform, and that the place had also been shadowed by constables in plain clothes, and he gave me certain instructions to carry out in the event of his arrest. While I was in his office a District Inspector, accompanied by the Head Constable and two other constables, entered and arrested him. I suggested to my hon. Friend that he should ask to see the warrant; and when it was shown to him, we found that his name was actually bracketed with that of the hon. Member for North East Cork, and that he was charged in respect of the same offence as had led to the charge against the Member for North-East Cork. Why, I ask, were not both hon. Members arrested on that Sunday? Why did the police distinguish between the two? They knew that my hon. Friend the Member for North-East Cork, was one of the best-beloved of the Irish representatives; that he was sure of an enthusiastic reception wherever he went, and yet the police took the opportunity of a day of great excitement to arrest him. I will give another illustration to show the temper of the police on this occasion. While a man who had spent the day in the country and had not been to any meetings was walking through one of the streets in Cork, he was pushed up against by a constable. He remonstrated with the man, and told him that if he repeated his conduct he would make it the worse for him. He was at once placed under arrest, marched to the Bridewell, and charged with being drunk and disorderly, and the next morning it was proved in Court that he had for three years been a member of a Total Abstinence Association called "The League of the Cross," and consequently was certainly not under the influence of drink. Thus we see what was the temper of the police at the time they arrested one hon. Member in the presence of another hon. Member, for whom they held a warrant for the joint offence, and which they held over till the following day. The Committee will await with some interest and curiosity the answer given to my hon. Friend (Mr. Flynn), and also to the considerations by which I have endeavoured to supplement his remarks.

MR. BLANE (Armagh): I think it is not an unreasonable proposition that the Constabulary Force of a country should have some relation to the number of people in the country. The Irish Constabulary Returns, however, show that whilst the population of Ireland has decreased within the last 50 years, the Constabulary Force has increased both in number and expense. I find from Returns presented to the House, that in 1840 there were in Ireland 8,175,000 people. This year the population is only a little more than 4,000,000. One would expect that the force which in 1840 kept law and order very fairly going would be sufficient for the Chief Secretary now; but it appears the right hon. Gentleman cannot work with the same tools that equally distinguished men were fairly successful with in 1840. I find that in 1840 the pay of the Inspector General of Constabulary was £1,300. Nothing appears to have been paid him for allowances, travelling expenses, and the like. Now, however, the salary of the Inspector General is £1,500, and allowances bring up his total receipts to over £2,000. The County Inspectors of 1840 were thought to be well paid at £298. They received nothing for allowances or travelling expenses. Nowadays the County Inspectors receive £450, plus a large amount for allowances and travelling expenses. The first-class District Inspectors in 1840 were paid £150 and no allowances; now they get £300, together with allowances and travelling expenses. When we find that the travelling expenses alone for last year amounted to £38,361, and that in the present year they are estimated to be £41,861, the item is worthy of some consideration. I find that in 1840 the second-class District Inspectors thought themselves very well paid at £120; but the present second-class District Inspectors are not satisfied with less than £250, besides travelling allowances, extra pay, allowances for barrack accommodation, or, in lieu thereof, lodging money. The lowest class of District Inspectors were paid £100 in 1840, and there was no dearth of candidates for the post, but now similar officers are paid £125. The average wages of the heads of families in Ireland is about 11s. or 11s. 6d. per week, but the Irish constables, who are taken from the very humblest families, received in 1840 £24 a year, but now they get £62 8s. A soldier only receives £18 4s., and out of that he has a large amount to pay for different expenses. Acting sergeants got £27 14s. in 1840, but a generous British public now pays them £72 16s. Sergeants received £32 7s. in 1840, but the pay has been increased to £80 12s. 6d. Head Constables in barracks received £60 a year in 1840, but now they get £104. Surgeons received £300 in 1840, but now they receive £400 and about £100 for allowances and travelling expenses. The members of the Clerks' Department of the Constabulary, Lower Castle Yard, in 1840 thought they were abundantly paid by £1,000. Then there was a population of 8,175,000; but now, with only half the population, the Clerks' Department costs more than four times as much—namely, £4,845. In 1840 the Paymaster of the Constabulary received £200, but now he is paid £557, plus allowances and extra pay, and, if I mistake not, a clerk all to himself or £48 in lieu thereof. The whole extra pay of the Constabulary in 1840 was represented by 0, but now it amounts to £34,804. The travelling allowances in 1840 were also represented by 0, but I can well understand that now, with marching columns at the beck and call of every rack-renter in the country, the travelling expenses should amount to £38,361. Many gross abuses are disclosed in the discussions on the Estimates; but I defy anyone to show anything so corrupt as the expenditure of the money under this Vote. Now, as to the character of the crimes committed in Ireland, I remember that one read out by the Chief Secretary with great unction was that of a man putting out his tongue to a policeman. [An hon. MEMBER: In a threatening manner.] Just so. And then the right hon. Gentleman went on to say that there were a large number of threatening letters. We have over and over again stated that the constabulary wrote threatening letters, sometimes by their own hand and at other times by deputy. £18,800 is set down for postage. I defy any Minister to justify the charge. It is physically impossible for the police in their ordinary work to expend £18,800 in penny stamps. I have seen some of these threatening letters.

I know that when an officer of constabulary in a particular district wants to be promoted and there is not sufficient crime in his district, he gets threatening letters sent. The place is proclaimed, new barracks are erected, and the officer receives promotion. Only the other day I received a letter from County Armagh in which it is clearly shown how the police get up outrages. It was only a few days ago that a Sub-Inspector named Bigley, stationed at Lurgan, thought he ought to be a County Inspector. He is a man that has got on step by step from the position of an ordinary constable to that of a second-class Inspector. In the constituency I represent this man paid for the getting up of a constituency, and when he got it up he hired one of his agents to swear away the liberties of the rest of the men. He secured the conviction of some 13 or 14 men, and he received promotion in the force. The other day this same man sent out a body of constabulary armed with rifles evidently with no other object but that of firing on three men who were fishing in Lough Neagh. The men were James Robinson, John Robinson, and John Cameron. They hold the Revenue licence; they were pursuing their calling of fishermen; but Sub-Inspector Bigley ordered three volleys to be fired at them. Two bullets went through the boat, and one struck a small iron vessel in which a fire is kept and smashed it to atoms. The fishermen swore an information against the police, but only one of the constables, a man named Myers, was arrested. Nothing will come of the case, because all the forces of the Crown are always brought to bear to protect policemen. If the fishermen had returned the fire, which I think they would have been fairly justified in doing, we should have had the Chief Secretary asserting that a gross outrage on the police was committed. The Irish Constabulary are above the law. The law is nothing to them except they can use it. When it does not serve their purpose, when it is inconvenient to them, they sling it on one side. In the district of Donegal, that I know something of, the constabulary have endeavoured by every means in their power to get up outrages, and to provoke the people to breaches of the peace. County Inspectors make Returns as to the necessity of having large forces in particular districts, and when landlords turn out their tenants in thousands they must necessarily have a large constabulary force in the district by way of protection. Captain Hill, the cousin of one of the Conservative Whips, gets more by reason of the police and military being quartered in his district than the whole of his rents are worth. His tenants may adopt the Plan of Campaign; but the officers who are sent to the Gweedore Hotel are better tenants of Captain Hill than his ordinary agricultural tenants. Now, it is utterly impossible for any Minister to defend this Constabulary expenditure, which has risen from £419,442 in 1840 to £1,139,288. And the latter sum does not include the cost of Dublin Metropolitan Police. The Irish Constabulary are not a civil, but a military force, and yet they are kept up in defiance of the Military Act. The other night, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Dublin said he was thankful that we had not a police system the same as in France. But I know that the conduct of the French Police is far different to that of the Irish Police. The Irish Constabulary are a far more formidable force than the French Force, and I fear that a similar state of things to that in Ireland will soon be set up in England. The action of the police in dispersing our meetings is hardly known in London, and I think that, taking all these things together, it would be well for the House to consider at least some of the matters I have put before it, dating from 1840 to the present year, not one of which can be contradicted by anyone in or out of this House. If that consideration is only given them, I think it will be seen that a case has been made out which urgently demands an immediate remedy.

MR. H. COSSHAM (Bristol, E.): The first thing that strikes me in regard to this question is that the home policy of this country, as well as its foreign policy, has the effect of doubling our expenditure. It is said that we must have a large expenditure on the police because it is necessary to maintain a large force, but we should not forget that the police force represents in itself the enormous amount of taxation we have to endure, the cost of the Irish Constabulary and military amounting to 25s. 6d. per head per annum to every man, woman, and child in that country. We might, however, govern Ireland for a much less sum if we governed it on the principle of self-government which we adopt in this country. I think my hon. Friends have made out a very strong case, and I cannot but feel that while the suffering is theirs the degradation is ours. Indeed, I have felt a deep sense of degradation as I have heard the tales of sorrow and wrong that have been put before us, but I venture to hope that my Irish friends will recollect that there are many of us here who are not responsible for the state of things they have depicted—a state of things which we will alter as much as we can at the next General Election, whenever that may happen. This Debate has brought out very clearly the fact that the only two places in which the police come into collision with the people are those places in which the people are directly under the management of the Executive—namely, Ireland and London. In other places where they only deal directly with crime the police are the friends of the people, and it is only where they have to deal with the liberties of the people that this relationship is changed. I was much struck by the remarkable figures put before the Committee by the hon. Gentleman who introduced the discussion, as they showed that in 19 years, although the population of Ireland has very considerably decreased, the cost of the Police Force has increased by £571,572. This shows that where we have a statutory policy founded on justice, we can do with a small Police Force, but that where we have a policy like that which the Chief Secretary is trying in vain to carry out, it proves, as the right hon. Gentleman well knows, an utter failure, as any policy must be which does not tend to cement the people to us in amicable relationship. If the object of the right hon. Gentleman has been to bring the people into collision with the forces of the Crown then he has been successful; but that is not the object he has to promote, and consequently his policy has been a failure. I think the questions asked by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. Fowler) were very remarkable questions, and it may be said that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary never answered

one of them. In fact, the flippant and slipshod way in which the Chief Secretary addressed the Committee showed that he wished to go round the Cape of Good Hope rather than deal with the matter at hand. I have, however, often noticed the facility with which the right hon. Gentleman evades a straightforward question. He was asked under what item we were to look for the charge for the battering ram, and we could get no direct answer. We have heard a good deal about the increased cost of the police; but, at any rate, the right hon. Gentleman cannot say the crime of the country is increasing, because the facts prove that that is not the case. Why, then, should we have to deal with the increased cost of that force at a time when crime is diminishing? For it is not on the Irish ratepayers alone that the cost falls, it is also made to fall on the taxpayers of this country. My constituents have to pay their proportion, and as their Representative I say they pay it unwillingly, and that we have no right to saddle on the hard-worked people of this country the cost of keeping up a force the main object of which seems to be to enforce the payment of impossible rents. This is a policy that cannot long be maintained. Last autumn I had the misfortune to be in Ireland and while there I witnessed some sad scenes. I was present at one case of eviction where the tenant had been bedridden for two years. There were seven policemen round the hut, and 30 or 40 emergency men, there being altogether about 100 policeman in the vicinity, and all this to get rid of a bedridden tenant. At last, after a deal of persuasion on the part of the priest and myself, we were able to get the tenant to pay the rent, which was only £11. I saw, on the same day, the eviction of the unfortunate man James Doo, of whom the right hon. Gentleman has said, the man was not killed by the eviction but by the exposure. He was over 80 years of age, and had lived on the farm for 60 years, and within three hours of his eviction he was a dead man. I do not hesitate to say—much as I loathe the idea of murder in the form in which it sometimes takes place—that in Ireland, where one man is killed by crime, ten men are killed by that policy of brute force, of which the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secre-

ary is the distinguished representative. The Government are aware that this policy of brute force has never yet succeeded, much as it has been tried, and it never will succeed. The policy I believe in is that of removing the grievances of the people, and when we come to display an honest desire to meet the just demands of the Irish people, and to treat them as brethren and neighbours, we shall save the cost of more than two-thirds of the Police Force we now maintain in Ireland. I believe we shall, before very long, be able to put an end to the present state of things. I want to see a real union, not a union in which the policeman walks with his hand on the man he has arrested. I want also to see the time when the Representatives of the Irish people will no longer be subjected to the outrages they now have to encounter. We, on these Benches, are ashamed of such treatment, and want to wipe our hands of the disgrace of it. I protest against it in the name of the English Liberals, and I ask my Irish friends to excuse my intervention in this; but I want them to know that we sympathise with them in the state of things now going on in their country, and are desirous of helping them to remedy it. The policy of the right hon. Gentleman is, in fact, such that the country is only awaiting the opportunity of getting rid both of him and it.

Mr. ARTHUR WILLIAMS (Glamorgan, S.): I desire to draw attention to one of the incidents connected with the discharge of the magisterial duty in Ireland which has come under my own observation—I allude to the trial of the hon. Member for Clare (Mr. Cox), and the hon. Member for Louth (Mr. T. P.

commit such criminal conspiracy. On the 3rd June Drogheda was proclaimed under the Crimes Act, and on the 11th June a meeting was suddenly summoned and held. The two defendants attended and made speeches, which were fully reported in the Freeman's Journal and the Irish Times. The suddenness of the meeting apparently prevented the Magistrates from obtaining the services of a shorthand writer; but at the trial a constable was examined as a witness for the Crown, who swore he had taken a longhand note of the speeches, and he proceeded to read parts of them which appeared to be fully reported, and were evidently copied from the newspapers, as when tested in cross-examination the witness was unable to take down a single sentence that was read to him, and it was evident from both his evidence and demeanour that he was stating what was absolute falsehood. That was the conviction forced upon my mind, and I think I may say that my friends who were with me were equally impressed with the fact that what he stated was absolutely and physically impossible. I have asked the responsible Executive in Ireland to furnish the House with the depositions taken down, and which would have shown how the man gave his evidence, but I was told that it was not usual to do that. Surely, then, it is usual in criminal cases to have an inquiry when suspicion attaches to the evidence. I asked the Chief Secretary if such an inquiry had been held; I ask him again whether the circumstances under which this man gave his evidence have been investigated, and why the presiding Magistrate took a day to come to the conclusion that the evidence was unreliable. I have had some little experience—from observations and otherwise—of almost every kind of court in England and Wales—from the court of ordinary summary jurisdiction of the unpaid Police Magistrate—and I unhesitatingly say that if that evidence had been tendered on a charge of ordinary assault before a Petty Sessions Court in England, the Magistrate would have immediately dismissed the charge. I say unhesitatingly, and under a sense of responsibility, that if the Crown Counsel in any Court of Quarter Sessions or any Assize Court in this kingdom had put evidence of that kind in a criminal charge before the jury, the Judge would have immediately invited him in a significant manner to withdraw from the prosecution. But on this evidence we were sent back to Dublin. The Court adjourned. We came back from Dublin, and absolutely the Counsel for the Crown was, I will not say allowed, but invited to address the Court after Mr. Bodkin had put forward proofs convincing to every one's mind of the absolute injustice of continuing the case. The case dragged on almost to the end of the second day before the Resident Magistrate acquitted the gentlemen charged. Now, I hold it my duty to bring these facts under the notice of the Committee. I think they throw a lurid light on what is going on in Ireland. If it is possible for a police constable to give such evidence and have it rejected, and to continue employed in the force and to be allowed to get up evidence of this sort—the only evidence very often which can be brought forward—then I ask the Committee and the country what is there which can be called a semblance of justice in the administration of law in Ireland?

MR. W. REDMOND (Fermanagh, N.): I shall move a reduction of this Vote for the Royal Irish Constabulary, but I may say at the outset that it is impossible for Irish Members to refrain from thinking what a vain and hopeless task it is to present the grievances under which the people of Ireland suffer before this House and the Government, when we know that the Minister who is responsible for the administration of the law in Ireland, and who controls the Police Force in that country, said only two or three months ago, in a speech publicly delivered in this city, that he and his Government treated with silent contempt the hon. Member for Cork and those who followed him. It is natural that, under these circumstances, I somewhat reluctantly condescend to address a few remarks to the right hon. Gentleman or to his colleague in the Irish Government. Over and over again, on the floor of this House and throughout the length and breadth of this country, our case has been stated against the Royal Irish Constabulary; and although the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary, in the few words which he uttered to-night, treated very lightly the charges which have been made, still I think the speeches which have been made by English as well as by Irish Members show that throughout England the people are now becoming thoroughly acquainted with the true nature and object of this so-called Police Force in Ireland. The Chief Secretary sneeringly pretends to believe that there are no serious charges to be made against this force; but I think that what we have heard goes far to prove to the people of Ireland, who have borne so much suffering for so long a time, that at last the English people recognise that this Constabulary Force is not a mere Police Force, but that it is simply a power used to enable one class of the inhabitants of the country to trample upon the rights and liberties and property of the rest of the people of that country. Now, it is commonly supposed that in the people of Ireland there is an inbred instinct of opposition to policemen, and it is often stated, as a matter of course, that the Irish people naturally object to the police and rebel on every possible occasion against the constituted authorities. But I do not believe hon. Gentlemen will contradict me when I say that there are no people on the face of the earth who would object less to the existence of a proper and necessary Police Force than the Irish people, and it is simply because we have got a so-called Police Force in Ireland that allows crime to exist, and spends its time in interfering with the political life of the country, that we complain in this House and attempt to show the people of England that the Constabulary Force is used in Ireland, not for the purpose of putting down real crime and outrage, but for the purpose of maintaining the ascendancy of the landlord class in Ireland, and of the landlord government which, unfortunately, has the control of the police at the present time. We are not objecting to the Police Force in Ireland as police, but we do object that while there are parts of Ireland wherein moonlighting takes place and crime is allowed to exist, yet the Police Force is simply used for the dispersal of meetings which ought to be free from disturbance, and which certainly have no intention of disturbing the public peace; and while the police are engaged in shadowing Members of Parliament and interfering with public meetings in Ireland, the real perpetrators of crime and outrage are left alone, and are not interfered with at all. Now, in the course of my journeys through England to address public meetings I have often been asked how it is that, year after year, crime recurs in certain districts with extraordinary regularity. I have been asked, for instance, why it is that in given parts of Kerry moonlighting frequently takes place, and in answering I never could use an argument more powerful and more convincing than that at the very time these crimes are going on, the whole Police Force in Ireland is being used to disperse public meetings and to arrest Members of Parliament for so-called crimes, which were brought into existence by the Coercion Act, passed by this House two years ago. I honestly believe it would be impossible to find an Irishman in this House, either a Conservative or a Nationalist, who would for a single moment utter the slightest complaint against the Police Force in Ireland were its efforts directed against the authors of real crime and outrage. But the reason why we do complain here, year after year, when the Votes for the Royal Irish Constabulary come to be discussed is because we know from the experience of our daily life in Ireland that this vast sum of money is expended in supporting a large force of men who are not policemen, but who form a military body engaged not in the work of preserving the peace, but in work which is really responsible for man, but I want to know whether it is a sentiment which is calculated to strengthen the hands of men who want to gain respect in Ireland and to govern the Irish people. I want to know whether it is not rather a sneer and an insult to the millions of Irish people, who hold that the police have misbehaved themselves, and who are told to-night by the Chief Secretary that the police are the pick of the population, and that on them alone depends the maintenance of law and order and of civilisation in our country. Had the right hon. Gentleman said the Police Force in Ireland were the only portion of the population that really and sincerely supports the Conservative Government to which he belongs, then he would have made a perfectly accurate statement, but when he comes here and tells the Irish representatives who have been insulted and imprisoned, tracked, and shadowed, and spied upon by these policemen—when he tells us that these policemen are the pick of the Irish population, and that they are the people of whom Ireland ought to be most proud, then I say he is adding a fresh insult to the long list of insults which he is never tired of flinging into the teeth of the representatives of the Irish people, who are elected as freely and as constitutionally and as justly to represent the Irish people in this House as the right hon. Gentleman and those who sit behind him are elected to represent their particular constituencies. The Chief Secretary, in his reply to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton, who took to task on economical grounds the administration of the constabulary, said that the police of Ireland were undoubtedly well paid, because they had exceptional duties to perform, and he said they were men of such a class that it was necessary to pay them highly for their services. Yes, but he had not the hardihood or fairness to say what were the exceptional duties which the Royal Irish Constabulary are called upon to perform, and which necessitate their being paid at this extraordinarily high rate. He did not tell the House that they had to be ready at all times of the year, and at all seasons, in the middle of summer and in the depth of winter—that they had to be always at the beck and call of a few men, who, for selfish reasons, insist on depopulating whole tracts of country, and driving men, women, and children out of the houses in which they were born. They are highly paid, but the word pay is not a proper description. It ought to be described as bribery, pure and simple, for I do believe that unless the Government paid the enormous prices which they do pay for the maintenance of the constabulary, they would not be able to maintain in Ireland a body to do the degrading and miserable and un-Christian work which the Royal Irish Constabulary do to their fellow-countrymen, day after day, on the occasions of these terrible evictions. I am sure that if the people of Great Britain understood that they are called upon to pay annually a million and a half for the maintenance of an armed force in Ireland which is used chiefly for evicting purposes, they would not so easily agree to the payment. It is impossible for any person who has watched the work of the Royal Irish Constabulary to ignore the fact that they are employed in the interests of the landlord classes, and when the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary refrains from telling the House what are the exceptional circumstances for which they are paid, he does well, because directly the people of England find out that they have to pay for the support of these men with their rifles and bayonets—not to put down crime and outrage, not to keep the country in a state of peace and order, but simply to be at the beck and call of the landlords to hunt unfortunate people from their homes for rents which they cannot pay—they will refuse any longer to sanction the maintenance of the force for that purpose. I think the history of civilisation affords no parallel to the scandal of the maintenance of a force like the Royal Irish Constabulary for the purpose of attacking a political party of the State, and for the purpose of enabling a class which is a small minority of the population to harass and treat with injustice the rest of the people who live on the soil of Ireland. If the Chief Secretary desires to make out a case for the Vote, let him get up and tell the House what crimes have been brought to light by the Royal Irish Constabulary within the last twelve months, and how many murderers have been brought to the scaffold through the instrumentality of that Force. Thousands of pounds are, I see, put down for the Detective Department. What crimes have that Department discovered, and what outrages have they put an end to? Have they put an end to moonlighting? Have they swept crime from those portions of the country where outrage and injustice breed crime amongst the populations? No! You are going to pay a million and a half for the maintenance of a body of men who have been engaged—not in tracking murderers down, but in dragging to prison 26 of the lawfully-elected representatives of the people; for a body of men who have been engaged in dispersing political meetings at the point of the bayonet all over Ireland; for a body of men who have not hesitated, at the word of command, to dye their bayonets red with the blood of their fellow-countrymen, when the only crime committed by these men has been to denounce the miserable system of rule under which they live. When we speak of Mitchelstown, the Tories sneer and say we are never tired of talking of it. Why, if such an event had occurred in England, I venture to say it would have been a watchword for Englishmen for generations, and I predict that upon the very first occasion when an armed force of the Queen on the soil of England shoots down three English citizens for no crime except that of exercising the right of public meeting, you will have a revolution in the country which will render it impossible for such a thing to occur again, either in England or in Ireland. The only thing I regret is that something of that kind does not occur in England, and I do not believe that even the best disposed of the English people towards Ireland really understand what we have to suffer at the hands of this military force which is called a Police Force. Mitchelstown is not an isolated case. Year after year, if you refer back to the records of the Royal Irish Constabulary, you will find they have done the same thing. Sir, in my very brief and short experience of public life in Ireland, can you name half-a-dozen cases in which the Royal Irish Constabulary have, in interfering with political meetings, shed blood in much the same way as they did at Mitchelstown. I remember a case at Ballyragget, in County Kilkenny, where a man was done to death by the police—where, when he was flying

fore them, they were not satisfied with merely pursuing him, but they stabbed him through and through the back with their bayonets. I remember when the police fired into a crowd of children at Belmullet, and wounded several of them. And these are the men for whom the Committee are to-day asked to vote money! These are the men described by the Chief Secretary as the pick of the Irish population, but who really resemble those bravos and free lances who will, for the sake of money, carry war into the land of any unoffending people. I say it is not in the nature or in the hearts of the Irish people to have a dislike, a loathing, and a distrust such as they have for the Royal Irish Constabulary unless there is good reason for it, and if the police of Ireland are unpopular they have earned that unpopularity by the course of conduct which they have pursued. I, for one, would never allow this Vote to pass in the House of Commons without entering my most sincere and emphatic protest against a system whereby a real Police Force is denied to Ireland. I will never consent to Vote a single halfpenny for the continuance in Ireland of this military body merely for the purpose of supporting and sustaining the landlord class. I challenge the Solicitor General for Ireland to get up here and state upon what occasion the police in Ireland were ever brought to task for exceeding their duty, and upon what occasion they were ever brought to justice when they shed the blood of innocent persons. I know of no such occasion. I know of coroners' juries composed of conscientious and God-fearing men who have deliberately set themselves to find out the truth in these cases, and who have brought verdicts of wilful murder against the police. This was done in the case of Mitchelstown, and in that of Ballymagget, as well as in other cases. But what was the result? After such a verdict has been returned, I have seen the police officers, against whom these verdicts were returned, walking up and down the public streets smoking pipes and laughing in scorn and derision at the peasantry, who were so foolish as to imagine that a policeman, whatever his grade, would be made amenable to the law. I complain that not only have we never punished these men, but you have never even gratified that craving for justice among the people by giving them even an inquiry into the conduct of the police on these occasions. You take no pains to show that the police would not be allowed to exceed their duty, and can any Englishman wonder if the people of Ireland believe that the police will be held blameless no matter what they may do, no matter what crimes they perpetrate? Can it be wondered at that the Irish people believe this when they see these outrages committed by the police, and when they see no attempt made by the Government to punish even the most flagrant offenders? Does the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary, with all this knowledge, think he is going to conciliate Ireland and disarm opposition when he gets up, and, instead of offering some hopes that justice may be done, or that an inquiry will be instituted, he deliberately and in a sneaking manner tells us that this force of men, whose hands are dyed with the blood of innocent people, and are hardly free from the blood of one of our own colleagues in this House, comprises the pick of the Irish population? I am quite certain that the result of this Debate will be to show the Irish people more clearly than ever that it is impossible to get any real appreciation of Irish grievances and Irish wrongs from Members of the present Government. It may be said it is a proper thing to give instances of police insult and interference in Ireland. Now, in my seven years' experience as a Member of this House, I have some knowledge of the Force, and I venture to say I have never spent a month in Ireland without repeatedly being the subject of insult from these men. It would be difficult to make Englishmen believe the unwarrantable manner in which Irish policemen intrude themselves into private dwellings, and order the people, without the slightest authority, to disperse. I remember that in conjunction with my hon. Friend the Member for the College Green Division of Dublin, I some time ago attended a meeting in the County of Wexford which was called to protest against the action of the Government in instituting certain proceedings which subsequently they were obliged to forego because they were miserably beaten. While the people were assembled, two policemen came up and ordered the meeting to disperse. They had not the slightest authority to do so, and it was only at the solicitation of my hon. Friend and myself that the people went away quietly and no disturbance occurred. I believe that nine-tenths of the collisions which occur between the police and the people are caused by the unwarrantable interference of the police with the people when they have no legal right to interfere. Now I come to the circumstances connected with the arrest of the hon. Member for North-East Cork, and I want to ask the Solicitor General for Ireland to explain the statement which he made in defending the conduct of the police in firing from the train at the crowd on Charlesville railway platform. He said that the crowd fired at the train, but he gave us no proof of the statement; and I say that there was never a more scandalous trick, or a more disgraceful piece of Parliamentary tactics intended to prejudice our case. I challenge him now to produce his proof, and I want to know will he grant an inquiry into what took place on this occasion. We maintain that the police acted in a most reprehensible manner in firing upon an unarmed crowd of inoffensive people, and I should like to know what can be the objection to the institution of an inquiry. I suppose the Government think that it might damp the ardour of the police if they granted an investigation into circumstances such as these, and that if the force received another telegram, "Do not hesitate to shoot," they might not fire so readily if they had reason to fear that an investigation would follow upon their conduct. I, therefore, fully expect that the right hon. Gentleman will refuse to grant an inquiry. I suppose he will refuse to believe the statement of the case which the Member for North-East Cork has seriously made to this House, and I suppose at the same time, while refusing to believe what the Irish Members say, and to grant the inquiry asked for, he will continue to eulogise the Constabulary Force.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): There are things upon which the Committee ought to have explanations from the Chief Secretary. We have discussed on two occasions, first, the attack upon the Member for North Monaghan, and secondly, what is called the Charleville incident; but on both occasions the discussion took place with little or no official information. The time has now come when information must be in the hands of the Government, and the Committee ought to have it. I am one of those who believe that the police have not always been well handled, and that on several critical occasions they have been badly handled. So strongly do I feel it that if the hon. Member moves for an inquiry I will vote for it. There is another thing which the Government ought to grant. A complaint is made that the Irish police are not numbered. They are numbered in Dublin, Belfast and Cork. I do not see why they should not be numbered in every part of the country. Having said these two things, I will also say that I will be no party to any general attack upon the police, who have done their duty in difficult circumstances and, all things considered, fairly well. An hon. Member has said that the police are present at evictions for private purposes, and that the landlords ought to pay for their services. Why are the police present at evictions? I am old enough to remember that evictions used to be carried out without the presence of the police, or when they were present in very different numbers. But hon. Members below the Gangway have been advising the people for two or three years back to resist evictions, to barricade their houses, and to resist the officers of the law. The sheriff goes to carry out the law, and the Executive is bound by law to protect the sheriff. Hon. Members below the Gangway know well that the Government are bound to protect the sheriff, and therefore to send the police to protect him. Let hon. Members stop their illegal acts and the Government will not send the police.

An hon. MEMBER: Stop the evictions.
*MR. T. W. RUSSELL: Let the tenants pay their rent. The hon. Member for Donegal talks of people who have applied to the Chief Secretary for appointments, as if the hon. Member never held an appointment himself and never applied for it. I wish he had been here to listen to what I have to say.

Several MEMBERS: Do not make the charge behind his back.

Mr. W. Redmond

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I would make it as freely before his face.

An hon. MEMBER: What appointment do you refer to?

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I will now deal with his speech.

MR. GILL: I rise to a point of order. The hon. Gentleman accused my hon. Friend of having held a disgraceful appointment.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I never said anything of the kind.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The interruption is irregular.

MR. W. REDMOND (addressing Mr. Russell): You are a coward.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL (to the Chairman): I wish to ask if that language is in order?

THE CHAIRMAN: Did the hon. Member for North Fermanagh use the term?

MR. W. REDMOND: I used it certainly.

THE CHAIRMAN: Then I call on the hon. Member to withdraw it.

MR. W. REDMOND: On a point of order, I wish to ask if the hon. Member for South Tyrone was in order in making a statement of a most damaging character with regard to an hon. Member who is absent from this House.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The hon. Member for South Tyrone was not guilty of a breach of order. I call on the hon. Member for North Fermanagh to withdraw the words he used.

MR. W. REDMOND: Of course I bow to your ruling in the matter, but if the hon. Member likes to meet me outside I will repeat the words.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member has not made the withdrawal in a proper way.

MR. W. REDMOND: With great deference to you, Sir, I beg your pardon, but I did withdraw the expression. What I said was that I withdrew in deference to your ruling the words to which you objected, but I would be glad to have explanations with the hon. Member on the point outside.

THE CHAIRMAN: That is not a satisfactory explanation, and I call on the hon. Member to withdraw the fresh words he has used.

MR. W. REDMOND: Of course I withdraw anything you wish me to.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL: Well, Sir, I take the hon. Member's speech. He talked of the issue of passes by the police in the county of Donegal. What were the facts with respect to the issue of these passes? After the murder of Inspector Martin the police made no effort to arrest anybody for 48 hours; but when they began the work of arrest they made up their minds that the persons wanted were within a certain area, and round that area they drew a cordon. People whom the police knew to be perfectly innocent then came to them and asked for a "bit of paper," as they called it, authorising them to pass through the cordon. The responsible police officer issued no passes except on the personal request of individuals. Another case which has been brought before the Committee was that of a policeman who was ordered out of Court on the ground that he was intoxicated. It is true that the man was ordered to leave the Court; but the Committee should have been told that two days afterwards he was sent to a lunatic asylum, where he still remains. The unfortunate man was not drunk when he appeared in Court, but was becoming insane. Another instance of police brutality that has been brought before us is that of a constable telling some excited man at Clonmel Station to go to the devil. Then we had the old story served up to us about Widow Coyle's ducks. We have heard of these ducks all through the Session, and now we are told that they are going to rise and condemn us at the General Election. I think the police were badly handled on the occasion of Father M'Fadden's arrest; but I maintain that, with that exception, they have all through this Donegal business acted with great prudence, caution, and moderation. The hon. Member for the Ilkeston Division of Derbyshire (Sir W. Foster) complained that when he visited the County of Limerick he was "shadowed" by five or six policemen. I think that was a regrettable incident, and I am very sorry that it should have taken place; but there is something still more regrettable—namely, that some English Members of Parliament should have gone to disturbed districts in Ireland and assisted the people to defy the law. If English Members, weighted with their Parliamentary responsibility, aid the people to defy the law, they must not complain.

if the police think it necessary to "shadow" them. I regret that it should have been necessary to "shadow" any Member of Parliament; but, in the circumstances, I cannot blame the police. There are people who can go through Ireland from end to end without being "shadowed." I will tell the Committee why.

MR. E. HARRINGTON (Kerry, W.): Because they libel other Irish Members.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The observation of the hon. Member is very disorderly. I must beg him to restrain himself.

MR. E. HARRINGTON: I was merely saying that they are able to do it because they libel other Irish Members.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member is not entitled to make such an observation.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL: The reason is that the police have no cause to shadow them because they go to Ireland with no intention to rouse ill-feeling, and do not advise the people to defy and break the law. I maintain that any English Member of Parliament who keeps within the law can travel from end to end of Ireland and need not fear the smallest interference from any policeman.

*MR. SHAW LEFÈVRE (Bradford, Central): The Debate has turned upon two very distinct questions, one being the purely economical question raised by my right hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. Fowler), and the other the question raised by the hon. Member below the Gangway. With regard to the economical question, my right hon. Friend pointed out that, although in London there are 1,500 more police than in Ireland with about the same population, the actual cost of the police is in Ireland £200,000 more than in London. These figures are, I think, very striking indeed, and deserve the most serious attention of the Committee and the country. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary in his speech resorted again to the old tu quoque argument. I am ready to admit that under the present administrative system in Ireland it would be extremely difficult for any Chief Secretary to make any serious change in the emoluments of the police. As long as the existing system is maintained the good will of the police force will be so necessary to the Government that no Chief Secretary would dare to incur the unpopularity of that body. But this is really only another argument against our whole system of administration in Ireland. Assuming, however, that the emoluments of the police must remain unaltered, is it absolutely necessary that the force should be maintained at its present strength? Ireland is a very poor agricultural country, and the part of the United Kingdom which can best be compared with it is Wales. Now, Wales has a population of 1,350,000 and only 900 policemen. If the same proportion were observed in Ireland her Police Force would number 3,150 instead of 14,500. The Police Force of Ireland relatively to her population is therefore four times as large as that of Wales. Nobody can fail in Ireland to note the superabundance of policemen. At every railway station there are two constables, and for their presence no one had ever been able to give me a satisfactory explanation. Another way in which the police are employed was in dogging the steps of the leaders of the Nationalists in rural districts. This very day I have received a letter from a leading tradesman in Castlereagh who complains that for months past he has been constantly pursued by two constables. I believe that the object of this surveillance is to prevent his attending any meeting of the Leagues, but he says that it is all futile, for he can always evade who are watching him when he goes. Then there is the question of "shadowing" of Members of Parliament and other gentlemen who go to Ireland from this country. In autumn I complained myself to the House of having been shadowed by police wherever I went, and the hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary did not deny it, but justified it by saying that if I went to Ireland again the same object probably the same would be followed. It is an insult to Members of Parliament, discreditable to the Government, and unconstitutional for the police to be employed in this way when they have committed no offence whatever. I admit that the Constabulary is placed in a position of great responsibility, and that they no doubt receive considerable provocation; but, even making every allowance for them, it is impossible not to see that in the last few months there has been a considerable increase of roughness and brutality on their part towards the people. Even the hon. Member for South Tyrone has said that the police have not always of late been very well handled. We have not yet heard from the Government any defence as to the incidents at Cork and Charleville; but the action of the police on those occasions appears to have been extremely rough and brutal, and calculated to provoke a conflict with the people. Again, on the occasion of the removal of Dr. Tanner from Tipperary to Clonmel, the people who cheered Dr. Tanner were immediately attacked by the police, 20 persons being batoned by them and seriously injured. There is practically no redress for injuries of that kind. If an appeal is made to the Magistrates by the sufferers, the story told by the police is taken as gospel, and the evidence of any number of respectable persons on the other side is disbelieved and rejected. The Chief Secretary himself has repeatedly spoken of attempts to disparage the statements of the police as gross calumnies. In the case of Denis Healy, who was charged with being present at a League meeting, the two Resident Magistrates ignored all the evidence for the defence, and sentenced the accused to six months' imprisonment with hard labour—a punishment very harsh and excessive, Government dare not interfere with it or with its emoluments from the fear of weakening its authority. It appears to me that the present position of things as regards the police is indefensible and deserves the most serious consideration of this House; and for my part I cannot conclude without condemning the action of the police and the conduct of the right hon. Gentleman in this House.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down has told the House that he is quite certain that I have to defend a great many things which I should be very reluctant to defend under any other circumstances. But I can assure the right hon. Gentleman that however that may be I have no reluctance, and that I feel no disinclination in defending the character of the Irish Constabulary. As I have said before, I believe the Irish Constabulary have shown themselves throughout circumstances of the most difficult and trying character, a Police Force of which any country might be proud, and which I believe to be superior to the Police Force which exists in any other country in the world. Now, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford has for some reason or other I do not know what, been left to lead the Opposition in their attack upon the Government in the matter of the Irish Constabulary. I have watched with amazement the condition of the House above the Gangway opposite, during a considerable portion of the evening, and I noticed that while two important speeches were being delivered, that the solitary occupant of those benches was an hon. Gentleman whose name I do not know, but who was fast asleep. Not a single Member on the Front Opposition Bench was present. When I reflect that on the Front Opposition Bench usually sit two Gentlemen who have held the office of Irish Secretary, I really cannot conceive why the Leadership of the Opposition was left to the right hon. Gentleman whose only connection with Ireland has been that he refused on a critical occasion to accept the office of Irish Secretary. Now I do not propose to go at length through certain parts of the speeches delivered from below the Gangway opposite. I do not complain of the tone of those speeches; they are, as compared

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Question proposed, "That Clause 1 stand part of the Bill."

MR. MURPHY (Dublin, St. Patrick's): Last night I put down some Amendments to this clause, but I am informed, Sir, that as you have already put the question that the clause stand part of the Bill, it is not open to me to propose them at this stage. Before we proceed further with the Bill I should like to hear the views of the President of the Board of Trade in reference to them.

*SIR MICHAEL HICKS BEACH (Bristol, W.): I have no objection to the provisos which the hon. Member has placed on the Paper; but I think they had better be moved in the form of a new clause. They provide for what the Board of Trade seek to provide; and although I think they may be unnecessary, I can see no objection to accepting them. With regard to the proposed omissions from the first clause, I think they would injure the efficiency of the clause, and I could not agree to them.

MR. MURPHY: I think the President of the Board of Trade has met me very fairly.

Question put, and agreed to.

Clause 2 agreed to.

On Clause 3.

*SIR MICHAEL HICKS BEACH: The hon. Member for Lanarkshire has placed on the Paper an Amendment, substituting 8 hours for 12 hours in this clause; but I think it would be better not to define any particular hours in the clause, but rather to leave the number to be fixed by the Board of Trade from time to time. I think it is obvious that it would be better to have an elastic clause, because what at one time and under certain circumstances might be proper would at another time possibly be injurious to the public safety. The clause, as I propose to amend it, will read—

"Every railway company shall make to the Board of Trade periodical Returns as to the persons in the employment of the company whose duty involves the safety of trains and passengers, and who are employed for more than such number of hours at a time as may be from time to time named by the Board of Trade."

Amendment proposed, Clause 3, page 2, line 6, leave out "12" and insert "such number," and same clause, same page, line 7, after "time," insert "as may be from time to time named by the Board of Trade"—Agreed to.

*MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): Will the Return be made in the same form as the Return obtained by a noble Lord in another place, and will that show the intervals the men are off duty?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS BEACH: The Returns will be in the same form as those moved by Earl de la Warr in another place. I presume that will meet the views of the hon. Member.

Clause 4 agreed to.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 16, after "fare," insert "from the place whence he started," (Mr. Johnston).—Agreed to.

Clause agreed to.

*MR. R. K. CAUSTON (Southwark): I beg to move the new clause which stands in my name. I think it speaks for itself. I do not think there can be any real opposition to the proposal, and I am only surprised such a provision was not adopted many years ago.

New clause—

"From and after the first day of January one thousand eight hundred and ninety one passenger ticket issued by any Railway Company in the United Kingdom shall bear upon its face, printed in legible characters, the fare chargeable for the journey for which the ticket is issued; and any Railway Company issuing any passenger ticket which does not bear upon its face the fare chargeable as aforesaid shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding forty shillings for every ticket so issued, to be recovered on summary conviction, and it shall be the duty of the Board of Trade to enforce such penalty."—(Mr. Causton),

—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed "That the Clause be read a second time."

*MR. MICHAEL HICKS BEACH: I have no objection whatever to the principle of the clause, but I would suggest that, as the railway companies have on hand large numbers of tickets, the date on which the clause should come into operation should be fixed by an order of the Board of Trade. The time fixed by the clause would not be quite fair to the companies, but I will fix as early a day as possible. I may also point out that difficulties might arise in cases where there were different routes from one station to another place. If the hon. Member will accept a clause which I think will meet his views, I will move it.

The clause is—

"From and after a date to be fixed by order of the Board of Trade, and subject to such exceptions, if any, as may be allowed by such order, every passenger ticket issued by any railway company shall bear upon its face, printed or written in legible characters the fare chargeable for the journey for which such ticket is issued, and any railway company issuing any passenger ticket in contravention of the provisions of this section shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding forty shillings for every ticket so issued, to be recovered on summary conviction."

*MR. CAUSTON: I think the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman is a reasonable one and I accept it, and if it is worked out in the spirit I take it that it will be, there will be no necessity for me to introduce my Bill another session.

The Clause proposed by Mr. Causton is by leave withdrawn.

The New Clause proposed by Sir Michael Hicks Beach was read a second time and added to the Bill.

*MR. MURPHY: I beg to move the Second Reading of the new Clause in the Bill.

Question proposed,

"That the following new Clause be read a Second Time:

"Whenever any Railway Company shall be required by the Board of Trade to provide appliances, or execute any works, or incur any expenditure under the provisions of the Act, which would properly be chargeable to the capital account, it shall be lawful for the Company to furnish to the Board of Trade an estimate of the cost of providing such appliances, executing such works, and carrying out such order generally. and thereupon the Board of Trade shall, upon the application of the Company, fix and determine the amount which would properly be capital expenditure, and the Company may, from time to time, issue debentures or debenture stock in priority to or ranking pari passu with any existing debentures or debenture stock of such Company bearing interest at a rate not exceeding five per cent per annum to an amount not exceeding the sum so fixed and determined, and any money raised under the provisions of this Section shall be applied in carrying out such requirements of the Board of Trade and to no other purpose whatsoever, and no other authority save the certificate of the Board of Trade shall be requisite to authorise and validate the issue of such debentures or debenture stock."

Question put, and agreed to, and Clause added to the Bill.

Bill reported as amended: to be considered to-morrow.

LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL (MONEY)
BILL. (No. 356).

Order for Second Reading read, and discharged:—Bill withdrawn, and Leave given to present another Bill instead thereof.

LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL (MONEY)
(No. 2) BILL.

Presented accordingly, and read the first time; to be read a second time upon Thursday, and to be printed. [Bill 367.]

SUPPLY—REPORT.

Resolution [5th August] reported.

CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

CLASS IV.

"That a sum, not exceeding £2,104,389, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1890, for Public Education in England and Wales, including expenses of the Education Office in London."

Resolution read a second time.

Motion made and Question proposed, "That this House doth agree with the Committee in the said Resolution."

MR. S. BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar): I desire to ask for information as to the position of the architects of the Education Department. I trust the right hon. Gentleman will be able to explain the system, or to state that he proposes to put an end to it. I do not intend in any way to reflect on the present architect. I have had personal knowledge of his work in connection with the London School Board for some years; but my view is that no public officer ought to be placed in such a position.

MR. H. GARDNER (Essex, Saffron Walden): I wish to raise a question of some importance to agricultural constituencies. Last night I had an Amendment down to this Vote; but, as I understood it was of some importance that the Vote should be obtained at that sitting, I refrained from proposing it. Now, the question I desire to raise is as to the granting to both political Parties the right to use school-rooms in villages for holding public meetings. This is a question of pressing importance, and it is in the earnest hope that the Vice-President of the Council will give the House some satisfactory assurance on the question that I venture to bring it forward, even at this late hour. During the last four years I have tried to get the verdict of the House on this question; but I have not been successful in the ballot. If I may be permitted to say so, I think it is a matter for regret that the wisdom of this House cannot devise some more reasonable means of determining whether proposed legislation is important or not. We had a conversation on this subject two years ago, and the right hon. Gentleman then said it must take its turn with other topics. I have had a Bill on that subject before Parliament for the last two Sessions, but have not been fortunate enough to get it considered. It is well known that in the agricultural constituencies the use of these schools is not given with equal justice to both sides. I have made inquiries in 30 counties, and in 24 of them the schools have been refused to the Liberal candidates, and have been granted to the Conservatives. All I desire is to get equal advantages for both political Parties, and I therefore trust I shall get a satisfactory answer from the right hon. Gentleman.

Mr. S. Buxton

MR. CONWAY (Leitrim, N.): Last night I assented to this Vote being taken on condition that the President of the Council to-day gave me information on two points. We have conceded in theory freedom of classification, but the Code does not give it in practice, and I hold that teachers ought to have greater freedom in working the classes as they like. I hold that the system of payment by results has totally failed, both in Board and voluntary schools. The children dislike it, and the teachers at their annual conferences denounce it, and the result is that the £8,000,000 now spent on popular education does not produce such beneficial results as it should. I therefore hope that before the right hon. Gentleman again brings in his Code he will make it less rigid. With regard to reforming the system of inspection I should like to point out that the sub-inspectors are drawn from active teachers. It was admitted that they do their work well and that the introduction of them has saved the country £12,000 a year. I think that promotion to the higher ranks of inspectors and chief inspectors ought to be open to them. And I hope the right hon. Gentleman will give this matter very careful consideration. Lately there has been before this House a proposal for pensioning School Board teachers in London, but why should not provincial teachers also be pensioned? I think teachers throughout the country should be brought under the scheme. I ask hon. Gentlemen to consider whether it is not within the power of the Department to arrive at some superannuation scheme that will give satisfaction to the teachers so far as providing for their old age. They are good servants of the State and ought not to be thrown at the end of their career on the world. The State ought to take them by the hand.

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.): I have an appeal to make to the favourable consideration of the right hon. Gentleman, because in the part of the county of Essex which I represent we have an ordinary soil and therefore cannot have as substantial schools as the permanent officials of the Education Department quire. One great place of difficulty is the neighbourhood of the Tilbury Docks, where we have a school. The school has always paid its way, but owing to the fact that within a foot of the surface we came to water, we are unable to put up a substantial structure. I hope the Vice President will be able to see his way to rescind the order to which I have referred, and let us in Essex do the best we can on the sub-soil on which God has placed us.

*Mr. CAUSTON (Southwark): Last night little reference was made to the objections to the new Code made by the teachers. I do not wish to prolong the discussion, but I hope the right hon. Gentleman will, during the Recess, consider seriously the objections the teachers have raised, and will not be discouraged by the hon. Member for the Evesham Division (Sir R. Temple) and others who are trying to alarm him and the House with regard to expense. The hon. Baronet said last night that if the ratepayers choose to elect School Boards who spend their money right and left they alone are answerable. The ratepayers want efficient and good teachers, and generally they will not grudge expenditure upon education which will really bring about increased efficiency.

before they commence their buildings as to how they can best meet the requirements of the Department, and he has been allowed to receive a fee, in all cases limited to five guineas, upon giving his advice. [An hon. MEMBER: "Is he paid by the Department also?"] The Department pay him by salary. I admit this is a system which may be liable to some abuse. It is a system which I have always looked upon with some jealousy. If the opinion once prevails that school managers cannot pass their schemes of building without the payment of a fee to this gentleman it would be very difficult to retain the system. But I am bound to say that in every case brought to my knowledge, I have found the greatest difficulty in proving that there has been any abuse; but I will promise hon. Members I will watch the working of the system most jealously, and that if I find any abuse is occurring under it, I will at once take steps to put the whole matter on a different basis. The hon. Member for Saffron Walden (Mr. H. Gardner) raised the question of the use of school buildings for election meetings. I say at once, I believe it is to the advantage of hon. Members on this side of the House that every possible opportunity should be afforded hon. Members opposite to promulgate their political opinions, and I shall be glad at all times to consider any practical proposal to bring about so desirable a result. But I must remind hon. Gentlemen that there are one or two difficulties to be grappled with. In the first place, a vast number of these school buildings are essentially private property, and to compel the use of these buildings for political purposes is, in a certain sense, an invasion of private right. Again, these buildings are essentially for the purpose of elementary education, and we are all aware that at times of political excitement there are such things as stormy meetings. This fact was appreciated in the Bill introduced the other day, because in the Measure there was the provision that the candidate should be held responsible for any damage done. Then we have also to consider what is to happen to the scholars in the morning after a stormy meeting the night before. As to the candidate being held responsible for damage done, I can quite understand the case of a candidate who is adopted generally by a political party. He would probably be a responsible person, but there is such a person heard of in our political existence as the carpet bagger. Supposing this visionary element is introduced into a political contest. How are the unfortunate managers of the school to recover damages? Again, the school building is only to be adopted as a place of political meeting, provided another suitable place cannot be found. I have had some experience of political contests. I have held meetings in barns, and I have held meetings in a jam factory, where I spoke from a platform erected on the top of a boiler. I believe that political meetings may very well be held without putting such a strain upon our school resources as the hon. Member indicates. But I do not put these objections forward in any captious spirit, and I assure the hon. Gentleman that if he will bring in a Bill next Session dealing with this question it shall be met in a fair and candid spirit. The hon. Member (Mr. Conway) has referred to two or three points connected with the proceedings of yesterday. On all the points he raised he has my sympathy. I assure him that in our proposals we mean the freedom of classification to be a reality. As to inspection, I promise the hon. Gentleman I will institute a reform in the system. I am in complete accord with one of the chief proposals of the Royal Commission on Education. I think our teachers should be admitted to all classes of inspectors, and I also promise the hon. Member I will bring the scheme of teachers' pensions suggested by the Royal Commission to the attention of my colleagues. I wish I could give my hon. Friend the Member for Essex (Major Rasch) a more satisfactory reply than I am in a position to give him. My hon. Friend says that in the neighbourhood of the Tilbury Docks it is difficult to raise a substantial building, but I am informed that in the proximity there is a very substantially built Roman Catholic school, and that there are other brick buildings. I deeply regret I cannot meet the hon. Gentleman's views. The Department will not sanction the use of iron buildings for any great length of time. This building was sanctioned for one year on the understanding that a more substantial building would be substituted.

MR. MARJORIBANKS (Berwickshire): As to the holding of meetings in schools, the right hon. Gentleman directed his objections entirely to the point as if it was not the custom to hold meetings in schools at all.

*SIR W. HART DYKE: I understand the proposal is that the granting of the use of schools may be made compulsory.

MR. MARJORIBANKS: That is the proposal of my hon. Friend, but the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman were not directed to that point at all. His argument was it was dangerous to allow meetings to be held in schools, because there are occasionally stormy meetings, and children might not be able to occupy the school the next morning. What we complain of is that in some parts of England the use of schools is only allowed to one political party. As far as my experience goes the noisy meetings to which the right hon. Gentleman referred are generally the meetings addressed by Gentlemen who sit opposite (Ministerial cheers.) I am very glad indeed hon. Gentlemen corroborate my assertion, because it is a very material one to my argument. If these noisy Conservative meetings may be held in school rooms ~~as at present~~, it is clear that to allow quiet Liberal meetings cannot possibly interfere with the studies of the children the next morning. Certainly if my hon. Friend goes to a Division as a protest against the action of the Government, I shall support him.

*MR. WINTERBOTHAM (Gloucestershire, Cirencester): This matter is so important to the representatives of rural constituencies that I am going, with very great regret at this time of the night, to move a reduction of this vote by £100. The answer of the right hon. Gentleman is quite unsatisfactory to us. We have not got those jam factories at our disposal, which the right hon. Member alluded to, we have not all got barns in our villages belonging to farmers able or willing to lend them, and while I wish to say the great majority of the clergy and the school managers are perfectly fair and reasonable and offer their schools to both sides, there are a few obstinate and narrow-minded clergymen scattered through the constituencies who refuse the use of their school-rooms to Liberal candidates. These schools are supported to a large extent by national funds, and were built largely by public funds, and I maintain it is monstrously unfair that the use of them should only be granted to one side of politics. I beg to move the reduction of the vote by £100.

*MR. SPEAKER: That Motion cannot be put as I have already put the Question, that the House do agree with the Committee in the said Resolution.

*MR. WINTERBOTHAM: Then I must meet the Question with the direct "No."

*MR. J. G. TALBOT (Oxford University): If this matter is to be pressed to a Division, I think something should be said on this side. I congratulate the right hon. Member for Berwickshire on a somewhat limited knowledge of Party politics. He seems to think that Conservative meetings are disturbed by Conservative speakers. Surely, if Conservative meetings are disturbed, they must be disturbed by gentlemen of his own persuasion. The real question is, whether we are going to make a complete change in our educational system. Schools, both Board and voluntary, are provided for elementary education, and now we are asked to set these places apart for political meetings. In the case of a political campaign, we might have meeting after meeting evening after evening. In such a case what would become of the evening classes, which hon. Gentlemen opposite, as well as we on this side said so much in favour of? They would be entirely suspended during the whole of a political campaign. Who would be the losers? Why, the scholars. These things can only be done in this country as so many other things are done, by arrangement, by voluntary effort, and by compromise. I think it would be a case of monstrous tyranny on the part of this House to lay down a hard and fast rule that the use of schools should be granted for political meetings, whenever demanded, no matter how responsible or irresponsible the man demanding them might be.

MR. H. GARDNER: That is not my proposition.

*MR. J. G. TALBOT: That is one of the inconveniences of the situation; we really do not know what the proposition is. I trust, however, that the House, in the interest of fair play to both sides, will never consent to the suggestion which has been made to it.

*MR. CHANNING: The hon. Member for Oxford University seems to know very little about village life, because he does not seem to know that the village school in many of our villages is practically the only place of meeting. I desire to bear my own testimony to the courtesy of clergymen in my own division, who have put their schools at my disposal for political meetings, and who also have granted me the use of Sunday Schools, and in one case a distinctly ecclesiastical building—the old Bede House at Higham Ferrers. But in many other parts of the country the use of the schools is systematically refused. In no case have I heard of the slightest damage to the schools. I was simply astonished when I heard the Vice President dwell upon the absurd difficulties created in his imagination, and then go on to say that he would give candid consideration to any Bill which my hon. Friend might bring forward next Session. If the right hon. Gentleman is sincere in his wish that Liberals should have access to the schools, why does he not bring in a one or two-clause Bill which he could easily pass even at this period of the Session?

SIR J. SWINBURNE (Staffordshire, Lichfield): The hon. Member for the Oxford University asks who would be the losers by the schools being used for political meetings, and suggests that they would be the scholars. I deny that altogether. Let both sides express their views freely, and then we should not hear quite so much of the gross ignorance in Dorset, Hampshire, and other south country counties. We have heard of the schoolrooms being damaged, but we know that now schools are let for lectures, exhibitions, and the like, and that the managers merely ask that the persons using them for such purposes should undertake to make good any damage done and to defray the cost of cleaning and lighting. Suppose a candidate was a carpet bagger, a deposit of £5 before the school was used would settle the matter at once. I do not wish to be disrespectful to the right hon. Gentleman, but I must say his objections appeared to me to be quite childish. If these schools are to be used, then they ought to be open to the use of both parties, and I see no objection to that. I feel astounded that the right hon. Gentleman should say they are private property. Are they not supported by public grants?

MR. P. J. POWER (Waterford, E.): In connection with election proceedings in the North recently, some reverend gentleman asked me not to say anything against the Tory candidate, and to my surprise I found that this was because they hoped for favours from the Conservative Government, and the ground of their hope was the pressure on the Government of the present Home Secretary. I did my best to show them on what a broken reed they were relying, by explaining how the right hon. Gentleman was once a Member of my own Party.

JUDICIAL RENTS (IRELAND) BILL.

Motion made and Question proposed, “That leave be given to bring in a Bill to facilitate the fixing of Judicial Rents in Ireland.”—(The Solicitor General for Ireland.)

MR. J. E. ELLIS: Are we to have no explanation of this?

*THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University): On a former occasion my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary stated the object of the Bill, which I hope in a day or two will be in the hands of hon. Members. Shortly stated, the Bill is to facilitate the fixing of judicial rents, and examination of the lands, dispensing with a hearing in open Court where both parties consent.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): I beg to say I shall feel it my duty to oppose the Bill on all future stages.

MR. DILLWYN (Swansea Town): May I ask under what rule are we now going on. It is past one o'clock, at which hour I always understood business should cease.

*MR. SPEAKER: Under the resolution passed by the House in April last, which provides that contested business being passed, the Orders of the Day shall be gone through in the usual way, and also under the First Standing Order of the House.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL: May I ask cannot what is proposed in this Bill be done without legislation at all?

*MR. MADDEN: A Bill is necessary, and when it comes to be seen I do not think it will excite much opposition.

Question put, and agreed to.

Ordered to be brought in by Mr. Arthur Balfour and Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland.

CLASS III.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £889,371, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will

which no satisfactory answer was given at all. He spoke of the enormous increase in the cost of the Constabulary since 1871, and he compared it with the cost in a number of important English towns. The Chief Secretary took no notice whatever of that argument, and only dealt with the cost of the police in the Metropolis here in London. He said that there were peculiar circumstances relating to the Metropolis; but that there were also peculiar circumstances relating to Ireland. The peculiar circumstances in Ireland are, that you are trying in that country to govern a people against the will of the people, and therefore, it is that you require this armed force. It is upon that ground that the Chief Secretary will not agree to any reduction of its efficiency. Surely there can be no comparison between this great Metropolis and Ireland. Here you have an enormous population congregated in a small area, and the large aggregation of wealth draws towards it persons from all parts of the world, and naturally produces a thieving class almost unknown in Ireland. It is because this class is so large and is drawn together in so small a space that you have in London to maintain so large a force and to incur such an enormous expenditure. All these circumstances are absent in Ireland; in fact the direct contrary is the case. We have an agricultural population scattered over the face of the land—no great aggregation of wealth—no appreciable number of thieves or dangerous classes to be kept down, as dangerous classes are understood in London. Therefore the comparison is simply absurd. And now let me ask why did the arrest of my hon.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I believe that the hon. Member for Donegal held the appointment under the Benchers, and that the Benchers derived the money with which they paid him from the public funds.

MR. MAC NEILL: I do not think after that explanation that I need say anything.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I wish to say that in the heat of debate I used an expression towards the right hon. Gentleman opposite which was perfectly in order, but was of a kind which, I think, ought not to be used in Parliamentary debate. I desire to express my regret at having used it.

MR. T. HARRINGTON (Dublin, Harbour): Before I proceed to deal with the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, I may be allowed to say, in reference to the unpleasant incident that has taken place, that the feeling displayed by hon. Friends near me found vent in expressions of indignation at the attempt to calumniate them by unfair insinuations. We have looked on the hon. Member for South Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell) as the chief calumniator, and I think the manner in which he has referred to my hon. Friend the Member for South Donegal is only a specimen of that oratory which he is in the habit of presenting to the people of England who know nothing of the case, of ourselves, or of him. But now I should like to refer to the speech we have had from the Chief Secretary for Ireland. It is a speech, of course, of which his party are proud; but all I can say is that if his party have any hopes of the Government of Ireland, any hope of tranquillizing the Irish people, and of making them accustomed to English rule, this is not the character of speech to bring about this result. If there is anything, in addition to the conduct of the Irish police, calculated to irritate Irish feelings, and to excite their natural hostility against the Government and the Government system it is such a sniggering, drivelling speech as we have listened to to-night in defence of the Government. It really was no defence; nothing more offensive to the feeling of the people, nothing more calumnious of their motives was ever offered to an intelligent assembly. In the face of the events that are passing in Ireland, in the face of the complaints that are made night after night by representatives of the Irish people as to the conduct of the police throughout Ireland, the right hon. Gentleman has either the hardihood or the folly to say that there never was a time in the history of Ireland when the feelings between the people and the police were better than they are now. If we credit the right hon. Gentleman with sincerity when he made that statement, it simply proves that he is incapable of judging the situation in Ireland, and unfit for the position he holds. Never has there been a time in the memory of any man living, when the relations between police and people have been so strained as they are at present; never has there been a time when any Government in Ireland has set itself so deliberately to work to produce these strained relations. That is not the state of things the right hon. Gentleman wishes to bring about he will say. But the policy which has hitherto been pursued by the Irish Government appears to us to be animated by the deliberate desire and intention to create bad blood between the constabulary and the people. You do not trust the people of Ireland. The Chief Secretary regards not only the Irish people but the representatives of the Irish people as liars. He treats every statement made by Irish representatives as a calumny, and such being the case must be hypocritical to pretend that there can be happy relations between officials and the people of whom he forms so low an estimate. The hon. Member for South Belfast will bear out when I say that, not only in the present Government unfortunate but for years back the policy has been to bring about a hostile feeling between the police and the people and the officials who encourage that feeling are the most trusted. What in times past the Member for St.

Belfast wished to hold a meeting of his Orange brethren to celebrate the glorious memory of which he is so proud, police were whipped up from the South of Ireland, all Catholics, because it was supposed that they would be animated by feelings of hostility towards the crowd they were intended to keep in order. The hon. Member will not deny that it has been the subject of complaint in the House.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): I have only to say that the statement of the hon. Member is perfectly without foundation. I have never attributed to the Government any desire to bring about a conflict between the police and the people.

Mr. HARRINGTON: I must confess I am very much surprised at the innocent statement of the hon. Gentleman who, I believe, was the one who originated the phrase "Morley's Murderers." Does the hon. Member mean to say he has never referred to the police as "Liveried Assassins" and "Morley's Murderers?" Everybody knows it was so. I regret it as much as anybody else. At the beginning of his observations the Chief Secretary declared it to be a monstrous allegation that the Irish Police would have anything to do with mitted any fault against the Irish Police? Irish Representatives are always liars, no matter how specific their allegations are. Their allegation is made light of, and denied by the Chief Secretary in the very same terms; and he takes every opportunity, by eulogiums, to encourage the police in similar conduct in the future. Let me take one instance of what I mean. Take the case of the man Hanlan, who was stabbed by the police at Youghal. He was stabbed by one of 82 policemen as he was running away. Obviously there was no necessity for violence, for no resistance was offered. At the inquest I represented the next-of-kin of this unfortunate man. What, on this occasion, was the conduct of the County Inspector? He refused to allow any of his men to make any statement in relation to the occurrence. How, I ask, is it possible for any people to have confidence in an Administration which allows such conduct as this? The same story was repeated at Mitchelstown, where three men were shot by the police in the public square. The right hon. Gentleman has no information of the injury inflicted by the police on my hon. Friend the Member for North Monaghan. Yet he has a system of police espionage that ought to furnish him with any information he desires. Do we not know that the extraordinary item for postage in these Estimates includes the cost of telegrams to notify the movements of Irish Members? Why, I never have to attend a trial in any part of Ireland but I receive information from official sources of cypher telegrams being sent and received by the police announcing that Harrington passed at such a time on his way to such a trial. The right hon. Gentleman boasts of the vastly improved condition of affairs in Ireland, and this at a time when Irish Members of Parliament can scarcely dare to hold a meeting of their constituents without running the risk of being batoned by the police and subsequently lodged in goal. As a matter of fact, the right hon. Gentleman is only at the beginning of the struggle.

It being midnight, the Chairman left the Chair to make his Report to the House.

Committee report Progress; to sit again to-morrow.

BILL. (No. 360).

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Question proposed, "That Clause 1 stand part of the Bill."

MR. MURPHY (Dublin, St. Patrick's): Last night I put down some Amendments to this clause, but I am informed, Sir, that as you have already put the question that the clause stand part of the Bill, it is not open to me to propose them at this stage. Before we proceed further with the Bill I should like to hear the views of the President of the Board of Trade in reference to them.

*SIR MICHAEL HICKS BEACH (Bristol, W.): I have no objection to the provisos which the hon. Member has placed on the Paper; but I think they had better be moved in the form of a new clause. They provide for what the Board of Trade seek to provide; and although I think they may be unnecessary, I can see no objection to accepting them. With regard to the proposed omissions from the first clause, I think they would injure the efficiency of the clause, and I could not agree to them.

MR. MURPHY: I think the President of the Board of Trade has met me very fairly.

Question put, and agreed to.

Clause 2 agreed to.

On Clause 8.

*SIR MICHAEL HICKS BEACH: The hon. Member for Lanarkshire has placed on the Paper an Amendment, substituting 8 hours for 12 hours in this clause; but I think it would be better not to define any particular hours in the clause, but rather to leave the number to be fixed by the Board of Trade from time to time. I think it is obvious that it would be better to have an elastic clause, because what at one time and under certain circumstances might be proper would at another time possibly be injurious to the public safety. The clause, as I propose to amend it, will read—

"Every railway company shall make to the Board of Trade periodical Returns as to the persons in the employment of the company whose duty involves the safety of trains and passengers, and who are employed for more than such number of hours at a time as may be from time to time named by the Board of Trade."

Amendment proposed, Clause 3, page 2, line 6, leave out "12" and insert "such number," and same clause, same page, line 7, after "time," insert "as may be from time to time named by the Board of Trade"—Agreed to.

*MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): Will the Return be made in the same form as the Return obtained by a noble Lord in another place, and will that show the intervals the men are off duty?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS BEACH: The Returns will be in the same form as those moved by Earl de la Warr in another place. I presume that will meet the views of the hon. Member.

Clause 4 agreed to.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 16, after "fare," insert "from the place whence he started," (Mr. Johnston).—Agreed to:

Clause agreed to.

*MR. R. K. CAUSTON (Southwark): I beg to move the new clause which stands in my name. I think it speaks for itself. I do not think there can be any real opposition to the proposal, and I am only surprised such a provision was not adopted many years ago.

New clause—

"From and after the first day of January one thousand eight hundred and ninety every passenger ticket issued by any Railway Company in the United Kingdom shall bear upon its face, printed in legible characters, the fare chargeable for the journey for which such ticket is issued; and any Railway Company issuing any passenger ticket which does not bear upon its face the fare chargeable as aforesaid shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding forty shillings for every ticket so issued, to be recovered on summary conviction, and it shall be the duty of the Board of Trade to enforce such penalty."—(Mr. Causton),

—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed: "That the Clause be read a second time."

*MR. MICHAEL HICKS BEACH: I have no objection whatever to the principle of the clause, but I would suggest that, as the railway companies have on hand large numbers of tickets, the date on which the clause should come into operation should be fixed by an order of the Board of Trade. The time fixed by the clause would not be quite fair to the companies, but I will fix as early a day as possible. I may also point out that difficulties might arise in cases where there were different routes from one station to another place. If the hon. Member will accept a clause which I think will meet his views, I will move it.

The clause is—

"From and after a date to be fixed by order of the Board of Trade, and subject to such exceptions, if any, as may be allowed by such order, every passenger ticket issued by any railway company shall bear upon its face, printed or written in legible characters the fare chargeable for the journey for which such ticket is issued, and any railway company issuing any passenger ticket in contravention of the provisions of this section shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding forty shillings for every ticket so issued, to be recovered on summary conviction."

*MR. CAUSTON: I think the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman is a reasonable one and I accept it, and if it is worked out in the spirit I take it that it will be, there will be no necessity for me to introduce my Bill another session.

The Clause proposed by Mr. Causton was by leave withdrawn.

The New Clause proposed by Sir Michael Hicks Beach was read a second time and added to the Bill.

*MR. MURPHY: I beg to move the Second Reading of the new Clause in its name.

Question proposed,

"That the following new Clause be read a Second Time:

"Whenever any Railway Company shall be ordered by the Board of Trade to provide appliances, or execute any works, or for any expenditure under the provisions of this Act, which would properly be chargeable to capital account, it shall be lawful for the Company to furnish to the Board of Trade an estimate of the cost of providing such appliances, executing such works, and carrying out such order generally. and thereupon the Board of Trade shall, upon the application of the Company, fix and determine the amount which would properly be capital expenditure, and the Company may, from time to time, issue debentures or debenture stock in priority to or ranking pari passu with any existing debentures or debenture stock of such Company bearing interest at a rate not exceeding five per cent per annum to an amount not exceeding the sum so fixed and determined, and any money raised under the provisions of this Section shall be applied in carrying out such requirements of the Board of Trade and to no other purpose whatsoever, and no other authority save the certificate of the Board of Trade shall be requisite to authorise and validate the issue of such debentures or debenture stock."

Question put, and agreed to, and Clause added to the Bill.

Bill reported as amended: to be considered to-morrow.

LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL (MONEY) BILL. (No. 356).

Order for Second Reading read, and discharged:—Bill withdrawn, and Leave given to present another Bill instead thereof.

LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL (MONEY) (No. 2) BILL.

Presented accordingly, and read the first time; to be read a second time upon Thursday, and to be printed. [Bill 367.]

SUPPLY—REPORT.

Resolution [5th August] reported.

CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

CLASS IV.

"That a sum, not exceeding £2,104,339, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1890, for Public Education in England and Wales, including expenses of the Education Office in London."

Resolution read a second time.

Motion made and Question proposed, "That this House doth agree with the Committee in the said Resolution."

MR. S. BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar): I desire to ask for information as to the position of the architects of the Education Department. I trust the right hon. Gentleman will be able to explain the system, or to state that he proposes to put an end to it. I do not intend in any way to reflect on the present architect. I have had personal knowledge of his work in connection with the London School Board for some years; but my view is that no public officer ought to be placed in such a position.

MR. H. GARDNER (Essex, Saffron Walden): I wish to raise a question of some importance to agricultural constituencies. Last night I had an Amendment down to this Vote; but, as I understood it was of some importance that the Vote should be obtained at that sitting, I refrained from proposing it. Now, the question I desire to raise is as to the granting to both political Parties the right to use school-rooms in villages for holding public meetings. This is a question of pressing importance, and it is in the earnest hope that the Vice-President of the Council will give the House some satisfactory assurance on the question that I venture to bring it forward, even at this late hour. During the last four years I have tried to get the verdict of the House on this question; but I have not been successful in the ballot. If I may be permitted to say so, I think it is a matter for regret that the wisdom of this House cannot devise some more reasonable means of determining whether proposed legislation is important or not. We had a conversation on this subject two years ago, and the right hon. Gentleman then said it must take its turn with other topics. I have had a Bill on that subject before Parliament for the last two Sessions, but have not been fortunate enough to get it considered. It is well known that in the agricultural constituencies the use of these schools is not given with equal justice to both sides. I have made inquiries in 80 counties, and in 24 of them the schools have been refused to the Liberal candidates, and have been granted to the Conservatives. All I desire is to get equal advantages for both political Parties, and I therefore trust I shall get a satisfactory answer from the right hon. Gentleman.

Mr. S. Buxton

MR. CONWAY (Leitrim, N.): Last night I assented to this Vote being taken on condition that the President of the Council to-day gave me information on two points. We have conceded in theory freedom of classification, but the Code does not give it in practice, and I hold that teachers ought to have greater freedom in working the classes as they like. I hold that the system of payment by results has totally failed, both in Board and voluntary schools. The children dislike it, and the teachers at their annual conferences denounce it, and the result is that the £8,000,000 now spent on popular education does not produce such beneficial results as it should. I therefore hope that before the right hon. Gentleman again brings in his Code he will make it less rigid. With regard to reforming the system of inspection I should like to point out that the sub-inspectors are drawn from active teachers. It was admitted that they do their work well and that the introduction of them has saved the country £12,000 a year. I think that promotion to the higher ranks of inspectors and chief inspectors ought to be open to them. And I hope the right hon. Gentleman will give this matter very careful consideration. Lately there has been before this House a proposal for pensioning School Board teachers in London, but why should not provincial teachers also be pensioned? I think teachers throughout the country should be brought under the scheme. I ask hon. Gentlemen to consider whether it is not within the power of the Department to arrive at some superannuation scheme that will give satisfaction to the teachers so far as providing for their old age. They are good servants of the State and ought not to be thrown at the end of their career on the world. The State ought to take them by the hand.

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.): I have an appeal to make to the favourable consideration of the right hon. Gentleman, because in the part of the county of Essex which I represent we have all ordinary soil and therefore cannot compare as substantial schools as the permanent officials of the Education Department

quire. One great place of difficulty is the neighbourhood of the Tilbury Docks, where we have a school. The school has always paid its way, but owing to the fact that within a foot of the surface we came to water, we are unable to put up a substantial structure. I hope the Vice President will be able to see his way to rescind the order to which I have referred, and let us in Essex do the best we can on the sub-soil on which God has placed us.

*Mr. CAUSTON (Southwark): Last night little reference was made to the objections to the new Code made by the teachers. I do not wish to prolong the discussion, but I hope the right hon. Gentleman will, during the Recess, consider seriously the objections the teachers have raised, and will not be discouraged by the hon. Member for the Evesham Division (Sir R. Temple) and others who are trying to alarm him and the House with regard to expense. The hon. Baronet said last night that if the ratepayers choose to elect School Boards who spend their money right and left they alone are answerable. The ratepayers want efficient and good teachers, and generally they will not grudge expenditure upon education which will really bring about increased efficiency.

*THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent,

before they commence their buildings as to how they can best meet the requirements of the Department, and he has been allowed to receive a fee, in all cases limited to five guineas, upon giving his advice. [An hon. Member: "Is he paid by the Department also?"] The Department pay him by salary. I admit this is a system which may be liable to some abuse. It is a system which I have always looked upon with some jealousy. If the opinion once prevails that school managers cannot pass their schemes of building without the payment of a fee to this gentleman it would be very difficult to retain the system. But I am bound to say that in every case brought to my knowledge, I have found the greatest difficulty in proving that there has been any abuse; but I will promise hon. Members I will watch the working of the system most jealously, and that if I find any abuse is occurring under it, I will at once take steps to put the whole matter on a different basis. The hon. Member for Saffron Walden (Mr. H. Gardner) raised the question of the use of school buildings for election meetings. I say at once, I believe it is to the advantage of hon. Members on this side of the House that every possible opportunity should be afforded hon. Members opposite to promulgate their political opinions, and I shall be glad at all times to consider any practical proposal to bring about so desirable a result. But I must remind hon. Gentlemen that there are one or two difficulties to be grappled with. In the first place, a vast number of these school buildings are essentially private property, and to compel the use of these buildings for political purposes is, in a certain sense, an invasion of private right. Again, these buildings are essentially for the purpose of elementary education, and we are all aware that at times of political excitement there are such things as stormy meetings. This fact was appreciated in the Bill introduced the other day, because in the Measure there was the provision that the candidate should be held responsible for any damage done. Then we have also to consider what is to happen to the scholars in the morning after a stormy meeting the night before. As to the candidate being held responsible for damage done, I can quite understand the case of a candidate who is adopted generally by a political party. He would probably be a responsible person, but there is such a person heard of in our political existence as the carpet bagger. Supposing this visionary element is introduced into a political contest. How are the unfortunate managers of the school to recover damages? Again, the school building is only to be adopted as a place of political meeting, provided another suitable place cannot be found. I have had some experience of political contests. I have held meetings in barns, and I have held meetings in a jam factory, where I spoke from a platform erected on the top of a boiler. I believe that political meetings may very well be held without putting such a strain upon our school resources as the hon. Member indicates. But I do not put these objections forward in any captious spirit, and I assure the hon. Gentleman that if he will bring in a Bill next Session dealing with this question it shall be met in a fair and candid spirit. The hon. Member (Mr. Conway) has referred to two or three points connected with the proceedings of yesterday. On all the points he raised he has my sympathy. I assure him that in our proposals we mean the freedom of classification to be a reality. As to inspection, I promise the hon. Gentleman I will institute a reform in the system. I am in complete accord with one of the chief proposals of the Royal Commission on Education. I think our teachers should be admitted to all classes of inspectors, and I also promise the hon. Member I will bring the scheme of teachers' pensions suggested by the Royal Commission to the attention of my colleagues. I wish I could give my hon. Friend the Member for Essex (Major Rasch) a more satisfactory reply than I am in a position to give him. My hon. Friend says that in the neighbourhood of the Tilbury Docks it is difficult to raise a substantial building, but I am informed that in the proximity there is a very substantially built Roman Catholic school, and that there are other brick buildings. I deeply regret I cannot meet the hon. Gentleman's views. The Department will not sanction the use of iron buildings for any great length of time. This building was sanctioned for one year on the understanding that a more substantial building would be substituted.

MR. MARJORIBANKS (Berwickshire): As to the holding of meetings in schools, the right hon. Gentleman directed his objections entirely to the point as if it was not the custom to hold meetings in schools at all.

*SIR W. HART DYKE: I understand the proposal is that the granting of the use of schools may be made compulsory.

MR. MARJORIBANKS: That is the proposal of my hon. Friend, but the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman were not directed to that point at all. His argument was it was dangerous to allow meetings to be held in schools, because there are occasionally stormy meetings, and children might not be able to occupy the school the next morning. What we complain of is that in some parts of England the use of schools is only allowed to one political party. As far as my experience goes the noisy meetings to which the right hon. Gentleman referred are generally the meetings addressed by Gentlemen who sit opposite (Ministerial cheers.) I am very glad indeed hon. Gentlemen corroborate my assertion, because it is a very material one to my argument. If these noisy Conservative meetings may be held in school rooms ~~as at present~~, it is clear that to allow quiet Liberal meetings cannot possibly interfere with the studies of the children the next morning. Certainly if my hon. Friend goes to a Division as a protest against the action of the Government, I shall support him.

*MR. WINTERBOTHAM (Gloucestershire, Cirencester): This matter is so important to the representatives of rural constituencies that I am going, with very great regret at this time of the night, to move a reduction of this vote by £100. The answer of the right hon. Gentleman is quite unsatisfactory to us. We have not got those jam factories at our disposal, which the right hon. Member alluded to, we have not all got barns in our villages belonging to farmers able or willing to lend them, and while I wish to say the great majority of the clergy and the school managers are perfectly fair and reasonable and offer their schools to both sides, there are a few obstinate and narrow-minded clergymen scattered through the constituencies who refuse the use of their school-rooms to Liberal candidates. These schools are supported to a large extent by national funds, and were built largely by public funds, and I maintain it is monstrosly unfair that the use of them should only be granted to one side of politics. I beg to move the reduction of the vote by £100.

*MR. SPEAKER: That Motion cannot be put as I have already put the Question, that the House do agree with the Committee in the said Resolution.

*MR. WINTERBOTHAM: Then I must meet the Question with the direct "No."

*MR. J. G. TALBOT (Oxford University): If this matter is to be pressed to a Division, I think something should be said on this side. I congratulate the right hon. Member for Berwickshire on a somewhat limited knowledge of Party politics. He seems to think that Conservative meetings are disturbed by Conservative speakers. Surely, if Conservative meetings are disturbed, they must be disturbed by gentlemen of his own persuasion. The real question is, whether we are going to make a complete change in our educational system. Schools, both Board and voluntary, are provided for elementary education, and now we are asked to set these places apart for political meetings. In the case of a political campaign, we might have meeting after meeting evening after evening. In such a case what would become of the evening classes, which hon. Gentlemen opposite, as well as we on this side said so much in favour of? They would be entirely suspended during the whole of a political campaign. Who would be the losers? Why, the scholars. These things can only be done in this country as so many other things are done, by arrangement, by voluntary effort, and by compromise. I think it would be a piece of monstrous tyranny on the part of this House to lay down a hard and fast rule that the use of schools should be granted for political meetings, whenever demanded, no matter how responsible or irresponsible the man demanding them might be.

MR. H. GARDNER: That is not my proposition.

*MR. J. G. TALBOT: That is one of the inconveniences of the situation; we really do not know what the proposition is. I trust, however, that the House, in the interest of fair play to both sides, will never consent to the suggestion which has been made to it.

*MR. CHANNING: The hon. Member for Oxford University seems to know very little about village life, because he does not seem to know that the village school in many of our villages is practically the only place of meeting. I desire to bear my own testimony to the courtesy of clergymen in my own division, who have put their schools at my disposal for political meetings, and who also have granted me the use of Sunday Schools, and in one case a distinctly ecclesiastical building—the old Bede House at Higham Ferrers. But in many other parts of the country the use of the schools is systematically refused. In no case have I heard of the slightest damage to the schools. I was simply astonished when I heard the Vice President dwell upon the absurd difficulties created in his imagination, and then go on to say that he would give candid consideration to any Bill which my hon. Friend might bring forward next Session. If the right hon. Gentleman is sincere in his wish that Liberals should have access to the schools, why does he not bring in a one or two-clause Bill which he could easily pass even at this period of the Session?

SIR J. SWINBURNE (Staffordshire, Lichfield): The hon. Member for the Oxford University asks who would be the losers by the schools being used for political meetings, and suggests that they would be the scholars. I deny that altogether. Let both sides express their views freely, and then we should not hear quite so much of the gross ignorance in Dorset, Hampshire, and other south country counties. We have heard of the schoolrooms being damaged, but we know that now schools are let for lectures, exhibitions, and the like, and that the managers merely ask that the persons using them for such purposes should undertake to make good any damage done and to defray the cost of cleaning and lighting. Suppose a candidate was a carpet bagger, a deposit of £5 before the school was used would settle the matter at once. I do not wish to be disrespectful to the right hon. Gentleman, but I must say his objections appeared to me to be quite childish. If these schools are to be used, then they ought to be open to the use of both parties, and I see no objection to that. I feel astounded that the right hon. Gentleman should say they are private property. Are they not supported by public grants?

MR. P. J. POWER (Waterford, E.): In connection with election proceedings in the North recently, some reverend gentleman asked me not to say anything against the Tory candidate, and to my surprise I found that this was because they hoped for favours from the Conservative Government, and the ground of their hope was the pressure on the Government of the present Home Secretary. I did my best to show them on what a broken reed they were relying, by explaining how the right hon. Gentleman was once a Member of my own Party.

MR. J. E. ELLIS: Are we to have no explanation of this?

*THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University): On a former occasion my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary stated the object of the Bill, which I hope in a day or two will be in the hands of hon. Members. Shortly stated, the Bill is to facilitate the fixing of judicial rents, and examination of the lands, dispensing with a hearing in open Court where both parties consent.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): I beg to say I shall feel it my duty to oppose the Bill on all future stages.

CLASS III.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

which no satisfactory answer was given at all. He spoke of the enormous increase in the cost of the Constabulary since 1871, and he compared it with the cost in a number of important English towns. The Chief Secretary took no notice whatever of that argument, and only dealt with the cost of the police in the Metropolis here in London. He said that there were peculiar circumstances relating to the Metropolis; but that there were also peculiar circumstances relating to Ireland. The peculiar circumstances in Ireland are, that you are trying in that country to govern a people against the will of the people, and therefore, it is that you require this armed force. It is upon that ground that the Chief Secretary will not agree to any reduction of its efficiency. Surely there can be no comparison between this great Metropolis and Ireland. Here you have an enormous population congregated in a small area, and the large aggregation of wealth draws towards it persons from all parts of the world, and naturally produces a thieving class almost unknown in Ireland. It is because this class is so large and is drawn together in so small a space that you have in London to maintain so large a force and to incur such an enormous expenditure. All these circumstances are absent in Ireland; in fact the direct contrary is the case. We have an agricultural population scattered over the face of the land—no great aggregation of wealth—no appreciable number of thieves or dangerous classes to be kept down, as dangerous classes are understood in London. Therefore the comparison is simply absurd. And now let me ask why did the arrest of my hon.

Friend the Member for North-East Cork (Mr. W. O'Brien) take place at a railway station on an occasion when it was calculated naturally to produce a feeling of irritation? The Chief Secretary says that he regrets the batoning of the hon. Member for North Monaghan (Mr. P. O'Brien). I hope that regret is sincere on the part of the right hon. Gentleman, but I have failed to observe in his remarks in this House, or in his conduct in Ireland that regard for human suffering and that tenderness for the lives and feelings of his fellow creatures, which would induce me to attach much importance to his expressions of regret. I attach less importance to them on account of what he said immediately afterwards. He complained that my hon. Friend the Member for North Monaghan had not attended a trial in which he was interested, although he had indulged in a walk in Dr. Tanner's garden for two hours, and had been out of doors on several days. It appears that the right hon. Gentleman has been able to follow most minutely all the actions of my hon. Friend. Yet he told us a moment before that he had no official knowledge of the batoning of my hon. Friend, or of the severity of that batoning, although he was able immediately afterwards to give full particulars of the proceedings of my hon. Friend for days. My belief is that the right hon. Gentleman has official information of everything he cares to know, and that upon those things which he does not care to know he prefers to be left in ignorance. He implied that my hon. Friend might have been present at the trial to which he referred because he had been out of doors walking in a garden and in various other places previously, but I am sure that the right hon. Gentleman knows very little of human suffering and illness if he thinks that that is a serious argument, which will impose upon this Committee. I myself have suffered from what is known as nerve exhaustion, and I can well imagine the condition of my hon. Friend after having been subjected to the frightful cruelties that were inflicted upon him by the police. Does not the right hon. Gentleman know that a man may be able to walk in a garden or about a town and yet be unable to endure the worry and annoyance of an examination in a public court? As a matter of fact the right hon. Gentleman has not yet been subjected to batoning, although he deserves it quite as much as a good many of my hon. Friends who have experienced it. I am quite sure that if he had been, it would be a long time before he would come down to this House and make such an able speech as that which he made last night. In regard to the occurrence at Charleville, the right hon. Gentleman said he thought it was to be regretted that the District Inspector himself discharged his revolver, and that it would have been much better if he had simply given an order to his men to do so. Is he prepared to follow that up by any reprimand to the officer, so as to convince him that he did something of which the Government disapproved? On the contrary, I am afraid we shall soon hear that District Inspector Concanon has been promoted on account of the extraordinary zeal and pluck he displayed in firing off his revolver upon an unarmed crowd. The same remark applies to what the right hon. Gentleman said in reference to Sergeant Mahony. Sergeant Mahony gave passes in Donegal, and all the right hon. Gentleman said was that the passes so given did not inconvenience any law-abiding person. The real question is, was the thing legal or not? Had Sergeant Mahony a right to give these passes? It is not a question of the amount of inconvenience they occasioned, but whether this man had any right to issue passes at all? If not, he should have been reprimanded or degraded, instead of which he has been honoured and promoted. And now in regard to the police. For audacity of assertion I think I never knew anyone to come up to the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary, because he asserts that at no time were the relations of the people of Ireland and the police as good as at this moment. I readily admit that in certain parts of the country there is a fairly good feeling between the police and the people. In my county for instance — Queen's County — the police and the people live together very comfortably. But why is this? It is because, as a rule, the landlords are forbearing, and with the single exception of Luggacurran, no case of bad ship has taken place. There has been no wholesale eviction of the people, and no instances under the Crimes Act in which men have been dragged in considerable numbers before coercion courts where the administration of the law has been accompanied more or less by violence and disturbance. But will any hon. Member say that that describes the state of things all over Ireland? The Chief Secretary may say so, because he does not go about Ireland, but receives all his information second-hand. But I should like to know whether the relations between the people and the police in Donegal are particularly friendly just now. Are the people of Mitchelstown very fond of the police who shot them down in a wanton, cruel, and relentless fashion? Do the people of Cork feel kindly towards the police who batoned not only those who are in sympathy with us, but even those, as my hon. Friend the Member for North Cork has pointed out, who entertain similar political views to those of the Chief Secretary himself? If a plebiscite could be taken in the City of Cork on this subject, I am sure it would be found that never was there a time when the relations between the police and the people were more strained than they are at this moment. The right hon. Gentleman spoke in a highly laudatory manner of the Royal Irish Constabulary as a body of whom persons of every shade of political feeling ought to be proud. I do not think that it is very easy for men who have been batoned without cause to feel proud of the police, and I do not think that this pride in the police is at be proud of the Irish Constabulary when Ireland is governed in accordance with the will of the people; when the members of that body are mild and gentle in the exercise of their duty; and when they are so because they know that it is not from the Chief Secretary here but from a ruler who governs in harmony with the will of the people that they receive their orders. Then, and not till then, will the Nationalist Members of this House feel proud of the men whom the Chief Secretary at present pampers, praises, but never censures or punishes, no matter what crimes against our common humanity they may perpetrate.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): The Chief Secretary for Ireland last night, while discussing this Vote from a position of great advantage, towards the close of the Debate—during the course of which the Government had been represented, for the most part, by himself and two or three of his familiars, while the Party in power were represented by some dozen hon. Members artistically disporting themselves on the Benches opposite, dividing their time between conversation and sleep—took occasion to criticise the state of the Benches on this side of the House. Surely it did not lie in his mouth to make a complaint. Complaint, if any, should have come from us, and not from him. The right hon. Gentleman brings forward this Vote at a time when the public business and the proceedings of the House are practically worn out, when hon. Members are exhausted, and when many have left their places for the Session—at a time when it is impossible to secure even a fugitive Debate upon an Imperial question, or to obtain a true expression of the sense of the House of Commons upon any subject that may be brought before it. Our Constitutional rights are struck down by brute force in Ireland, and we are prevented, by a contrivance on the part of the Government, from obtaining a real opportunity of expressing our views. This is the third year in which we have been obliged to discuss the Irish Estimates in a formal, but by no means an effective, Debate. We have tolerated this kind of proceeding much too long, and so far as I am concerned, I warn the Government I am resolved that after this year we will tolerate it no longer. It must not be forgotten that last year we were kept until Christmas Eve discussing the Irish Estimates, and that the First Lord of the Treasury then gave an emphatic pledge that this Session there should be a steady and regular course of Supply—that Supply should be taken every week, and that Members should be able to avail themselves of the Constitutional principle that redress of grievances should precede Supply. That pledge has been broken. This year, as in the two preceding years, the Irish Members have been kept here for six months, hanging about the precincts of the House waiting for the Irish Estimates to be brought forward. For six months no question of Irish interest has been brought on, and now, in the second week of August, in a skeleton House, important Estimates are brought forward, and the Chief Secretary has the effrontery to make the condition of the House a cause of complaint. All I can say is that there are powers in the possession of any considerable Party in the House of which they cannot be deprived, to compel the Government to revert to the steady and Constitutional practice of devoting careful consideration to the Estimates. I can promise the right hon. Gentleman that never again will he be allowed to defeat our Constitutional rights by postponing Supply until the discussion becomes a real sham. We shall compel him, in future, to afford us, from time to time, from the beginning of the Session until the end of it, a full opportunity of discussing our grievances on the presentation of the Votes in Supply. What is the claim of the Chief Secretary in regard to the Government of Ireland? He claims that by active exertion, and by pursuing a policy of conciliation, he has pacified the country. He claims that the National League has become a thing of the past, wherever he has been pleased to lay his hands upon it; that while public meetings were numerous a few years ago, they are few at present; above all he claims that the need for police protection has ceased, and that boycotted persons, counted by thousands a couple of years ago, are now as rare in Ireland as a Whiteboy. If the country be pacified, there ought to be no need for the maintenance of a Constabulary Force as high as in excited times, and no need for that movement from one part of the country to another of large bodies of men which has occasioned so considerable an augmentation of the present vote. This is the vote on which the right hon. Gentleman should be prepared to prove the pacification of Ireland, but it proves directly the contrary. What is the actual fact? The amount of the Vote goes on increasing from year to year. At the beginning of the present generation the cost of maintaining the Constabulary of Ireland was one-half what it is now. At that time the population of Ireland was double what it is now. Therefore, proportionately to the population, the cost of the Irish Police is four times as much now as it was in the year of stress and strain occasioned by the great famine. What is the moral? What a significant and conclusive commentary upon 40 years of coercion! Moreover, up to the present time coercion was intermittent and spasmodic; but now we have reached the Millennium of the Tory Party. We have come to permanent coercion. We have had two years' experience of that system, and why is it that after two years of coercion, and after Ireland has been so completely pacified as the right hon. Gentleman pretends, the cost of the police is at least four times as much as it was a generation ago, and five times as much as that of the police of Wales and Scotland. The right hon. Gentleman made a comparison between the cost of the police in Ireland and in London, but the comparison in point of cost is in favour of the Irish Constabulary, whereas those who are actively engaged in their position of the City of London force the police of Ireland cost from £1 more than the London force apply and the first paid told that the Exchequer is meaning that in addition force sufficient ordinary crime the counties of Ireland, not on those who can afford to pay, but upon the poor occupiers of land, these bodies of extra police, the maintenance of which makes the burden of life more heavy upon the struggling occupier, who, even if this burden were taken away, would find it hard enough to live. Then what becomes of the pacification of Ireland? Last year the cost of the extra police was £63,400; this year it is £63,600. If matters are now so pacific, the calendars of Assize so blank, if disorder has almost disappeared, and boycotting has practically ceased, what is the reason that these squadrons of extra police are employed? I have received from various public Boards in the different counties of Ireland resolutions of the most bitter complaint against this system of extra police. In one resolution from County Clare, it is stated that, having regard to the destitution which is certain to prevail in the winter and spring in consequence of the want of employment, the failure of the potato crop, the general depression, and the excessive amount of local taxation, it has become imperative necessary to request the Lord Lieutenant to use his influence with Her Majesty's Government in order to secure that the cost of the extra police shall be borne by the Imperial Exchequer. I have received from various public bodies recently urgent letters praying me to bring the grievance of this impost before the House of Commons. I ask, therefore, if there be any reality in the statement of the right hon. Gentleman that the country is pacified and order restored, and his policy successful, whether he can offer any tolerable argument in justification of the continued employment of this extra police. If Ireland is in an ordinary condition, why should she be governed by an extraordinary one? I intend to conclude my remarks by moving that the amount of the Vote reduced by the sum of £63,000, which represents the cost of the extra police, because I maintain that upon showing of the Chief Secretary himself there is not a shadow of ground for continued employment. I am glad to find that in regard to this Vote I am deprived of the testimony of my friends the Members for North Cork (Mr. W. O'Brien) and North Kerry (Mr. T. Healy). [An hon. Member: Mr. Healy is here.] I am glad to see that my hon. and learned Friend, in spite of the difficulties which have been thrown in his way, has been able to find his way back to the House. I know that my hon. and learned Friend has been in the habit of overcoming the apparently insurmountable difficulties which have been placed in his path by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary. But my hon. Friend the Member for North-East Cork is absent. The right hon. Gentleman said he would take great pains to secure the attendance of my hon. Friend. What pains has he taken? My hon. Friend was entitled to expect that he would be free to attend to his duties in this House; but a day or two before the day fixed for taking the Irish Votes my hon. Friend was called upon to appear before a Court in Ireland upon another charge. My hon. Friend was called upon to appear on Thursday in Ireland. This Vote was fixed on Tuesday, and yet the Chief Secretary says he might have taken part in this Debate, and still have attended at Thursday's trial. Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that Clonakilty is a full day's journey from Dublin? Did he imagine it was not necessary for my hon. Friend to engage a solicitor and counsel? Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman thinks that a superfluous operation. He knows the functions of his Resident Magistrates, and the orders they have received from him. He knows the uselessness of any Irish Member preparing a defence, and I suppose he assumed that my hon. Friend would take the same view as himself, and would appear before the tribunal without any preparation, because no amount of preparation could affect the decision to be arrived at. But let me tell him that though the mind of the tribunal could not be affected the mind of the country can, and will be informed of the true nature of the proceedings. Instead of taking pains to secure my hon. Friend's presence the right hon. Gentleman has taken every pains to secure his absence, and the effect has been that the Committee has been deprived of the presence of a Member whose presence would have been an advantage, not only because of his political information, but also because of his personal knowledge of facts properly raised under the Constabulary Vote. That, however, is only in accord with the record of the right hon. Gentleman, whose practice is to get an opponent out of the way, and then to attack his veracity, question the truth of his evidence, and to make scandalous imputations against him. Now what ought to be the function of the Police Force in Ireland? Its function should be the preservation of order, the protection of property, and the detection of crime. But as a fact it promotes disorder. I notice that the charges for election expenses are just as high as ever. What is the meaning of that? There have been no Parliamentary Elections. The right hon. Gentleman says that there are other elections not Parliamentary, but surely in those cases it is not necessary to detail bodies of police for duty. Again, all the elections in Ireland except in one little corner are a walk over for the Nationalist candidate, and there is no necessity to send a policeman where they dare not send a candidate. According to the right hon. Gentleman disturbances only occur in Ireland at places where the people are all of one mind. I could understand conflict of mind leading up to conflict of force, but I cannot understand the contention of the right hon. Gentleman that people fall out, and beat each other for no better reason than that they agree. As a fact disturbances do not occur unless they are provoked by the police. I have seen a policeman taking notes in the midst of a gathering of 20,000 men in a time of great popular excitement and no one has even offered him an uncivil word. There is an item of £3,000 in this Vote for expected disturbances up to next April. Since Ireland is quiet and peaceful the inference is that the item occurs only because the Government intended to promote disturbances as they did at Mitchelstown. I challenge the right hon. Gentleman to show me any case in which disorder has arisen in Ireland except where the police, acting on instructions from their superiors, had interfered with the exercise of the right of public meeting. The fact is the main function of the police force in Ireland is to carry out evictions for rent as in the case of the Ponsonby estate—rent which with this particular case the agents themselves had to admit to be unjust. The police are employed to carry out evictions for the non-payment of exorbitant rents, and they fulfil their duty of protecting property by allowing a fraud on the Imperial Exchequer by the inclusion in the purchase money of certain estates iniquitous arrears. As to the detection of crime by the police, why, Ireland is the most crimeless country in the world, not by reason of the diligence of the police, but because of the natural bent of the people. Whenever crime is committed the police can never find it out. It is not to their profit to do it. They are not encouraged to do it. I never heard of a policeman being singled out for favour or promotion for the detection of ordinary crime. No; they are taught by their superiors in Dublin Castle that the way to promotion and favour is not by serving the public, not by the detection of crime, but to harass public meetings, to insult Members of Parliament, and to inflict physical violence upon them, and to ferret out and trump up false charges against the representatives of the people. That is the function to which the police force in Ireland is degraded. Instead of being simply a police force it is a military force, employed and pampered for the advantage, first, of a social class, and then of a political Party. I have said that their energies are devoted to evictions. Now, what have we heard about the battering ram? I said a little time ago that we should refuse to proceed with this Vote unless we have some information given us on the subject, and I must insist that the Debate be energetically continued until further information about it is vouchsafed to us. I declare the ram to be the type and pioneer of a new policy in regard to rule was something too strong for the conscience of the British Electorate, and so they resolved not to pay the bill. Now, the right hon. Gentleman clearly stated that the charge for this machine would appear on the Estimates. It does not so appear; and I wish now to ask who is to pay the bill? If this machine is to be used for the protection of the police the Government ought to pay for it. I venture to think the landlords are not in a condition to pay for it, nor can that mouldy concern the Derelict Farms Trust, nor, I think, can the Land Corporation. Knowing as I do that the First Lord of the Treasury, in a weak moment, subscribed £500 to that concern, he may if he is in a cheerful mood, now whistle for his money. I am disposed to press the inquiry, did the Land Corporation of Ireland pay for the machine? We will not assent to the payment for it being made out of a private purse any more than we allow the police bayonets and batons to be paid for out of a private purse. I know the Chief Secretary for Ireland has two or three capacities. Am I to conclude, because in his public capacity the right hon. Gentleman glorifies the battering ram, that in his private capacity he has paid for it? According to the right hon. Gentleman it is not only a jewel to the Government and a shield to the police, but a palladium to the people. If this importation from the siege of Jerusalem is so valuable all round, in common gratitude the representatives of the people are entitled to know to what anonymous donor they are indebted. Irishmen are not wont to be ungrateful, and we cannot suffer ourselves, even by the reserve and singular reticence of the right hon. Gentleman, to be prevented expressing our gratitude to the man who has placed us in possession of this palladium of the Constitution, more valuable than trial by jury, than secret voting, than household suffrage; more valuable than any boon conferred on us by enlightened legislation, and by the still more enlightened administration of the right hon. Gentleman. We must learn a little more about this ram. Is it to be employed in breaking down the homes of the people in such cases as that of the poor man who had come back to his native place in Donegal, had taken a farm and given that farm all its value, had built a house and made a home, and was to be evicted because he would not pay the landlord the value of the land which he had himself created? That man said he would sooner die than be turned out of his home as a beggar. I will tell the right hon. Gentleman that the danger of this system begins when a man is driven to the point that he does not care whether he lives or dies. I will ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he will apply the system to the homes in England? Why did he not apply it to the homes of the crofters? He allowed them an abatement of arrears. If he had not done so there would have been bloodshed at the evictions, and that would have had a serious effect upon the people of England. Men who feel that they have been robbed of the fruits of their lives' labour may be made desperate. Moreover, what will be the effect of the use of this battering ram upon the landlords? Some landlords are humane, some have regard for public opinion, some may be deterred from resorting to eviction by the circumstance that evictions are painful. But if the right hon. Gentleman assures us that evictions may be made smooth and rapid, he will be responsible for a course of proceeding which may have a most dangerous effect upon the peace of Ireland: he will multiply evictions and stimulate the resort to this mode of driving people from their homes. To return, however, to the police. Policemen are promoted not only for carrying out evictions, but for getting up evidence. Two of my hon. Friends were recently taken away from their duty in this House to answer a charge in Ireland, where they were bandied about to and fro. When the charge came to be heard the constable swore that he had made a longhand note of the speeches at the meeting, and that he had not had an opportunity of consulting the Dublin papers before preparing his report. It was proved that he had seen the Dublin papers, and that he had made up his Report from extracts out of them. There was elaborate perjury on the part of the policeman. The right hon. Gentleman cannot deny that there was perjury; but he says that the reports appeared in the newspapers, and he invites my hon. Friend—who has stood his trial and been acquitted—to stand up in the House of Commons and admit his guilt. "True," said the right hon.

Gentleman, "the evidence of the constable was not to be believed, but the Magistrates did not convict." The right hon. Gentleman has so high an opinion of his own judicial utensils that he claims credit in the House of Commons because two Magistrates in Ireland did not convict a Member of this House upon evidence which they declared from the Bench they did not believe. The right hon. Gentleman is so surprised at it that he takes credit for the novelty. What about the policeman? Is he to get off? We shall probably hear of him next as a Head Constable, and in the course of a few years as a most diligent and efficient officer. If the Magistrates in Ireland are to condemn a policeman because, from over-zeal in the prosecution of Irish Members of Parliament, he has committed a little laudable perjury, what will become of that essential thing—the solidarity of the Public Service in Ireland? Upon the question of evidence I must refer to the case of the Times. A more extraordinary declaration than that of the Chief Secretary on the subject has never been heard in the House of Commons. The Chief Secretary has been asked by the right hon. Member for Wolverhampton whether any relief has been given to the Exchequer in regard to pay for the police for their services to the Times. For the last 12 months the service of the Queen has been superseded by the service of the Times. It has been all apathy and indifference in the one case, and all energy and zeal in the other. Of course the explanation is, as I have reason to believe, that Mr. Soames has paid Irish officials of every rank, from the Divisional Commissioner down to the constable, on a scale of allowances amounting to treble their ordinary pay. The Chief Secretary has said that the ordinary course has been strictly followed with the Times' witnesses, but I enjoyed the advantage the other day of cross-examining Mr. Soames in the witness box. The learned Judge had laid down that not more than the ordinary scale should have been given by the Times. I asked Mr. Soames whether more than £60,000 had not been paid. He could not say. I then asked whether £20,000 was the sum paid, and Mr. Soames declined to say. Scores of thousands of pounds have been paid to Irish officials of all classes to ferret out and furbish up charges against those who ought to be their masters—namely, the Representatives of the Irish people. The Irish police have, meanwhile, obstructed in every possible way the evidence for the defence. They have sought out witnesses, gingered-up informers, threatened reluctant witnesses with prosecution, escorted them from place to place in London, mounted guard upon them until, as in the case of Pigott, the moment arrived when the two intelligent constables, discerning the mind of the Executive, allowed him to escape. Never since Constitutional Government began have a body of men, whose position ought to entitle them to respect, been by such base instruments exposed to malignant and petty prosecution as the Irish Representatives have. The police have not only suborned evidence, but they have nursed it, dangled it and taken care of it, penetrating even the prisons of Ireland. They have even approached men under sentence of penal servitude for life, and promised them liberty and fortune if they would give evidence, true or false, in support of their cause—evidence which might result in the ruin of the political opponents of their unscrupulous employers. This was the structure set up by the present Government, and it is falling in ruins about their heads. I do not presume to comment at present on the evidence of the police. We must wait for the Report of the Commissioners. But there never has been anything in the history of Parliament more carefully examined than will be the evidence of these policemen. The House will have very little time for any other business next Session. Hundreds of the force have been in London for months together in order that their statements might be finished to the artistic point. This course has only supplied proof how well the public of Ireland could get on without the police. If it is true, as the Chief Secretary says, that Ireland has never been so peaceful, I would suggest that the reason is that so many agents of provocation from "Don't-hesitate-to-shoot Plunkett," down to Sergeant Johnson, Mr. Soames's cashier, who was kept in the service of the Times. I think that, considering these officials receive treble pay from the Times, it is too much to expect that they should be paid by the country at the same time

I lay it down as a principle that, if these men were receiving treble pay in London, it is not necessary that they should also receive compensation from the country. £20,000 is a reasonable estimate of the sum that they have received from the Times; and I submit to the intelligence of the House and of the British taxpayer that I make a reasonable Motion when I move that this Vote should be reduced, not only by £63,000 for extra police, for which the right hon. Gentleman has shown there is no further occasion in Ireland, but also by the £20,000—[As hon. MEMBER: £40,000—no, £20,000; I will be moderate in my estimate—but also to reduce it by £20,000, which I take to be the amount of money included in the Vote for the pay of the police of various ranks during the time they received treble pay from Mr. Scames. The right hon. Gentleman let fall—no, I will not say that, as it implies inadvertence; but he ejected a statement last night that there never was a period within the past 10 years in which the people and the police were on better terms than now. There is nothing more grotesque than that in the Arabian Nights. The right hon. Gentleman said—

"In the course of a few months, the relations between the people and the police will be as cordial as the relations between any police and people on the face of the globe."

I can assure the right hon. Gentleman that if the present policy of the Government is continued, the relations between the people and police in Ireland will be not land. They are taught that if they confine themselves to their duty they will be neglected, they will be degraded, and that the only way to secure favour is to attack the people and to assail their Representatives. I quote as an instance the case of Sergeant Dillon, who was in command of a party of police at Falcarragh, and who, knowing there was no occasion for his men, went back to his barracks. Was he promoted? That man was reduced; he was disgraced. No; I never knew an Irish policeman to be promoted for saving life; but I know of Irish policemen saving life and getting the medals of the Humane Society, and still left sub-constables all their lives. I have found Irish police to be promoted for taking life away. Take the case of Dr. Tanner. Was the treatment of Dr. Tanner such as tends to promote good relations between the people and the police? Three times he has been compelled to enter a prison van, and the right hon. Gentleman has defended that shameful course by a statement which is absolutely untrue. The right hon. Gentleman said that Dr. Tanner had been obliged to enter a prison van because, on a previous occasion, he refused to enter an open break. What is the fact? On a certain occasion Dr. Tanner was, with others, being escorted in custody by police. The prisoners were asked to enter an open break. All of them, except Dr. Tanner, refused; he did enter it. The Inspector of police whom Dr. Tanner is alleged to have assaulted has been allowed, on three subsequent occasions, to gratify his spite by forcing Dr. Tanner into the prison van, on the last occasion with such unnecessary violence that my hon. Friend became insensible. Is that a course likely to promote a good feeling? When will we hear the last of the suggestion that the crowd which went to the station to welcome Mr. W. O'Brien might have stayed to rescue him? Mr. W. O'Brien—

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order!

MR. SEXTON: I merely referred to the hon. Gentleman by name to save time, and because it is more convenient. The hon. Member for North-East Cork does not wish to escape from the Government, but the Irish Government wish to escape from the hon. Member; it is they who are on the run, not he.

Does anyone doubt that the Government would be glad to place the whole of the secret service money for one year in the purse of any agent who would rescue them from the hon. Member, provided that the rescue were made so effectual that there was no chance of the hon. Gentleman ever again falling into their hands? If the hon. Member were only willing to navigate the globe, or to discover the North Pole, I have no doubt the Government would be happy to place at his service one of the troopships they refused to the Lords and Commons the other day. The whole procedure of the police at Cork discloses a set design to provoke a breach of the public peace. Having ample notice of the meeting at Cork, they did not suppress it till the Saturday. They could easily have arrested the hon. Member earlier than they did; but they waited till his return, when a crowd had assembled to welcome the hon. Gentleman. Who was the Inspector in charge of the police on the occasion? Was he a man of discretion and experience? No; as in the case of the arrest of Father M'Fadden, the arrest of the hon. Member for North-East Cork was confided to a man of slight experience in his post and of amazing indiscretion. Mr. Concannon has only recently been made Inspector. A couple of years ago he was a constable engaged in political detective service—the kind of service which secures promotion in Ireland; and I have a letter from a gentleman of position, in which he informs me that Inspector Concannon is well-known to be a man of a singularly infirm temper and a most ungovernable disposition; that less than a couple of years ago in Roscommon, being in the same lodging at the Assizes with a police reporter and a Protestant Unionist named Atchison, a shopkeeper in the town, and others, he not only annoyed the company in the most extraordinary way, but he absolutely made a furious attempt on the police reporter, and when Atchison interfered, he remarked, "Wait till I get my long sword; I'll cut your head off." Before the arrival of the train at Cork, the Inspector went up to the Member of Parliament and drew this long sword, and that was a signal for the police to baton the crowd who wished to see Mr. W. O'Brien. There is not the shadow of a pretence for saying that the crowd exhibited any disposition to resort to violence. It is also absurd to say that the police did not know the hon. Member for Monaghan (Mr. R. O'Brien); they know him well; the crowd had made way for him; and it was because they knew him, and because of the services he has rendered to his country that he was made a victim. The Chief Secretary has chosen to ridicule the suffering of my hon. Friend. It is in accordance with his policy; he will break an opponent's head and then crack jokes at him. There is nothing whatever inconsistent in Mr. P. O'Brien being able to go out for an airing, and yet too unwell to attend a Magisterial examination. The Chief Secretary should not judge others by himself, knowing that if he has the slightest cold nothing will induce him to get out of bed. The animus of the police is shown by the fact that they did not put Mr. W. O'Brien into a vehicle, but they compelled him to walk through the streets in the midst of an excited crowd. They took him by train to Limerick Junction, well knowing that bodies of people would be returning by that train. It was natural that at Mallow, the hon. Gentleman's birthplace, the people should wish to see him. In the pressure a window of the carriage was broken. At Buttevant Mr. Concannon was in such good temper that he allowed the door to be opened, and permitted a townsman to make a speech to the hon. Member for North-East Cork. By the time the train reached Charleville the blinds were down again. It was midnight, but there were people on the platform. The people of Charleville, however, could not know Mr. O'Brien was in the train, because the office had been closed in the morning. The did involve the telegraph clerk had remained in the telegraph office all night, waiting to tap discover news, which of the arrest of Mr. O'Brien. There was a platform to welcome the townsmen. The ban of the arrival of my hon. Friend they played two air-proached the carriage seated. There were police in the train, as the train were the police who had my hon. Friend in charge. The head porter and his assistant proceeded to check the tickets of the passengers, and beginning at either end worked towards the centre. The head porter coming to the carriage in which the police were, and asking for tickets, was referred to the Inspector, and together the porters came to the carriage where the prisoner was. The head porter asked for tickets, the sub-Inspector made an insulting reply, giving neither tickets or explanation. Has nobody any duty under the law but a policeman? Has a railway porter no duty to his employers? Was it not his duty to ask for tickets, and to demand an explanation if none were forthcoming? Would he not have been liable to a penalty had he neglected his duty? The Inspector refused any explanation, took the head porter by the throat, and flung him out on to the platform. All this can be proved by 20 credible witnesses. And then the Inspector fired his revolver in the man's face. This was the beginning of the firing. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary was, I thought, very faint in his assertion that there was firing from the crowd, and I think, on reflection, he will hardly maintain that assertion. Is it to be supposed that a peaceful crowd, coming with a band to meet their townsmen, having no idea that there was an eminent political prisoner in the train, would come armed with loaded revolvers? So little was the fact of my hon. Friend being in the train known in Charleville that even the two policemen, the almost invariable legio movement, took up a position on the other side of my hon. Friend, from whence firing would have been equally fatal, but if any firing had come from the crowd, my hon. Friend would have been the first to feel the effect of it. The other sergeant fired, and so three revolvers were discharged from the carriage; and meanwhile the train began to move. The right hon. Gentleman professes that the police were afraid of something, but of what were they afraid? They had passed Mallow, they had passed Cork and Bandon Stations, and there was no one in the crowd foolish enough to wish to attempt to rescue my hon. Friend, who would not permit himself to be rescued from a Government who were far more afraid of him than he of the Government. It is an absurd pretence; the shots were fired not from any fear of rescue or attack, and certainly one of the shots was fired after the train was in motion. And then began the organisation of the defence. The right hon. Gentleman says Inspector Concannon was hurt. We heard nothing of that at the time. He said nothing about it; it was an after-thought. There was a dent upon his helmet, but the valuable frame of the Inspector was then uninjured. When the train had moved out of the station the police began to organise the defence of their conduct, and the Inspector remarked that the crowd had fired. My hon. Friend denied this, but the Inspector asserted that of the three shots only two were fired by the police. "No," said my hon. Friend, "three shots were fired from this carriage; examine the question now." He compelled an examination, and it turned out that the police fired all the shots as I have said, and their smoking revolvers testified to the fact. At Limerick Junction a search was made to find the bullet supposed to be fired at the carriage. It was not found, nor will it be found; they were all police bullets that were fired. Is it not sad to think that after all this reckless, breathless haste of arrest, of hurrying to catch the night mail, of charging and batoning one crowd, firing on another crowd, after all this, my hon. Friend is left at Limerick Junction in charge of a Police Inspector who happens to be a man of sense. He passed from the charge of Inspector Concannon to the charge of Inspector Carter. We speak of the police as we find them; we praise or condemn them as their conduct deserves, the one or the other. Inspector Carter was waiting to receive his prisoner. Did he get up any scene of excitement and violence? He took Mr. O'Brien on his gig—this man whom the people of Ireland were supposed to be bent on rescuing—and drove him without escort to Tipperary, took his prisoner to his own quarters, and then sent for the Stipendiary Magistrate to take bails. It is a very curious commentary on the state of society in Ireland that the Inspector, having sent for the Magistrate, completed the process by sending for the bails, and these two gentlemen were the parish priest and the Chairman of the Town Commissioners. The Magistrate asked the hon. Member for North-East Cork politely how he was; my hon. Friend said he was very well; the local gentlemen provided bail, and the end of all this breathless hurry and excitement in the conveyance of a political prisoner from one end of the county to the other was that my hon. Friend was asked to appear for the preliminary hearing at the end of a fortnight, and for the hearing of the case at the end of seven weeks. And this was the man whose rescue was feared at the hands of an excited people, and to prevent which the police were prepared to take human life. He was given a period of seven weeks to consider whether he would escape or not. Now, I think I am entitled to say that from the beginning to the end of the business there was a manifest design to provoke the people and disturb the public peace. Could anything have been simpler than if the Government wished to vindicate the law to have left out Inspector Concannon, with his long sword and his eccentric behaviour, and to have entrusted the arrest to a man of sense like Inspector Carter, avoiding all this disgraceful behaviour and attack on public life on the part of the police? I say that the pretence that good feeling, under such circumstances can be maintained between the people and the police is audacious in the extreme. Look at your treatment of the priests. If there is one thing more than another upon which the Irish people are sensitive it is the treatment of their clergy. How have you conducted the arrests of priests? By breaking into their houses, by arresting them in the midst of their congregation. Father Keller's house was broken into in the grey of the morning. Father Clark was arrested at two in the morning at the house of a friend. If I were to read to the Committee a letter from Mrs. Damin at whose house Father Clark was staying, if I quoted the indignant terms in which this lady protests against the alarm and excitement created by the needless entrance of the police in the middle of the night, when the arrest could have been made in the middle of the day, then the Committee would understand how little reality there is in the pretence of good feeling between the people and the police. In like manner Father Farelly's house was broken into at five in the morning. For five weeks did the police hold the warrants for the arrest of Father Clark and Father Farelly. They did not wait to avoid arrest, they said they were ready to be arrested. They walked about the streets of the town, they passed the police every day, and the police saluted them. But after five weeks' waiting the police arrested Father Clark at two in the morning at the house of a lady where he was staying, and they arrested Father Farelly by breaking into his house at five in the morning. I ask what is the object of such procedure? What other object can there be except to provoke such a state of feeling among the people of Arklow as will render the maintenance of good relations between the people and the police impossible? For many a day the arrest of Father M'Fadden will not be forgotten in Ireland. Twice he was arrested. On the first occasion, in the midst of his colleagues as he was leaving a Diocesan Conference, in which, with his brother priests, he had taken part. On the second occasion he was arrested under circumstances which have been brought to the attention of the House, and when the officer making the arrest lost his life. The police on that occasion waited until noon on Sunday, and then when they were in force sufficient to conduct one of your small African wars, as Father M'Fadden, after the celebration of religious service, issued from the church in soutane and biretta, the usual garb of office, and was surrounded by his congregation, they waited until the moment when the sentiments of respect and veneration the people had for their pastor had reached the highest pitch of exaltation, and then the officer seized the priest by the collar—this priest who was only too anxious to go with him, and who hastened to shorten the scene—and waving his sword, the police officer gave the excited people the impression that he was striking their priest and the unhappy consequence was the officer lost his life. The blood of that officer is upon the head of the Government. They selected a man who was as unfit as any man in Ireland for the discharge of a difficult duty. He lost his life, and the responsibility of that rests upon the Government, while the suffering is with the people. The hon. Member for South Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell) attempted to make light of these things yesterday, but I think the hon. Gentleman might have allowed himself an interval of repose after his return from the hearing of a libel action in which he came off second best, in which he was forced to admit that he had made a false charge, and he postponed the admission of the falsehood until it was wrung from him on oath. I trust that this result will have some effect in future upon the value of the communications from the hon. Gentleman the Member for South Tyrone. The hon. Gentleman fell into the error of relying upon that kind of evidence that the Chief Secretary is in the habit of giving us at that Table. The information is given us from anonymous sources, but of course it comes from the police. The hon. Gentleman, misled by example, mistook the evidence of Mr. Commissioner Cameron for truth, and found he had uttered a libel. Failing in his libel outside the House he has but the other people were assumed to be guilty, and were liable to be stopped and, if they had no pass, to be taken away from their work to the police barracks. To this treatment the police subjected two poor men as they were gathering seaweed on the seashore. They had no thought of police passes; their thoughts were of their wives and children, whom they supported by their precarious toil. They were hauled off to the police barrack, and when allowed to return to their work, they found the sea had washed away the result of their labour. Domiciliary visits were made at night. Such a visit was paid to the room of women lying in the pains of pregnancy. Before and after the birth the police tramped across the room and on the bed, turned over the bedclothes of the children, and held a gun to the head of a girl of 13 to frighten her into answering questions. This, I say, is worse than Siberian espionage. This torture is inflicted upon the people because of the loss of the life of an official by a course of proceeding for which the Government are responsible. These revelations show that the Police Force in Ireland has been degraded, deliberately degraded, I believe against the will of its members, from a position for performing its true functions—the preservation of order, the protection of property, and the detection of crime—to a position in which it is the servant of a social class, the agent of extortion, and the instrument of suppressing political rights and attacking the Representatives of the people. The pretence that there is good feeling between the people and the police is as unfounded and grotesque as any that ever proceeded from the lips of any Minister. No doubt, at the moment, the police, who are agents for carrying out the will and designs of the Chief Secretary, have things their own way and receive favour and promotion; but I warn all concerned that this Government is but a perishable commodity, and that even in the Constabulary Force where, now, men like Concannon flourish in their achievements, the turn of the honest man, of the faithful public servant who does his duty and no more, will come. I beg to move the reduction of the Vote by the amount I have mentioned, made up of the two items £63,600 and £20,000.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £805,771, be granted for the said Service."—(Mr. Sexton.)

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): With a full sense of my responsibility as representing the people who were so brutally ill-used, I say that the police had no more justification for their attack at the Cork Station than they would have were they to charge into this Chamber at this moment. I was at the station myself five minutes before the train arrived, and had not the slightest expectation of the arrest of the hon. Member for North-East Cork. It is altogether false to say there was anything like a large crowd assembled. There was a considerable force of police drawn up in two files on the platform at the place where the train was expected to stop, and I state in the most positive manner that at the moment the train arrived, the number of people did not exceed four times the number of police present. There were about double the number of people who on ordinary occasions are in the station on the arrival of a train, and the reason was that there was not the slightest knowledge among the bulk of the people that my hon. Friend was in the train at all. Had it been known, undoubtedly there would have been a large crowd at the station. I do not wish unnecessarily to make charges against the police; but the facts that came under my notice, almost irresistibly drive me to the conclusion that so far from desiring to avoid a collision with the people, they deliberately made arrangements to provoke such a collision. If they had wished to arrest my hon. Friend without the knowledge of the people, if they had wished to prevent any demonstration, if they had wished to exclude from the station all but the people who had business there, nothing would have been easier than for them to have done so. But, instead of that, they attracted attention by drawing up their police force at the station, and when the train arrived Sub-inspector Concannon went forward and arrested my hon. Friend as he alighted from his carriage, and I say, in the most positive manner, that until that moment there was scarcely an individual on the platform had the least idea that my hon.

Friend was there. Naturally, the people surged forward, and they raised a cheer, but that was the utmost of their offence. There were no stones thrown, no blows struck; there were not even offensive cries raised against the police; the people merely surged forward with the natural desire to welcome my hon. Friend and congratulate him on his return after triumphing over the authorities in their attempt to prevent him from addressing his countrymen. Without warning, the police turned upon the people with the butt-ends of their rifles, and I confess I was appalled. I have read from time to time accounts of police savagery; but I confess I never thought that a body of men, drawn as they are from the Irish people, could, without provocation, have treated the people as did the police on that occasion at the Cork and Bandon Station. But I confess that after what I saw on that occasion I shall never have any difficulty in the future in believing stories of police savagery. I heard no order given to charge, and I had a perfect opportunity of seeing what went on. The suggestion that there was any attempt at rescue, or any idea of rescue, in the minds of the people is absolutely grotesque. The people were not in sufficient force to effect a rescue from even four policemen, let alone to rescue a prisoner from 20 or 25 armed men. I shall never forget the spectacle of decent and unoffending citizens struck down without even an order to the effect having been given, as far as I could hear, and lying groaning and wounded on the platform of the station. I now wish to say a word as to the attack on my hon. Friend the Member for North Monaghan (Mr. P. O'Brien). The right hon. Gentleman says the police did not know my hon. Friend.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: If my recollection serves me rightly, what I said was I had no official information as to how the assaults occurred, and I think it possible that the police did not know him by sight.

MR. M. HEALY: I think the right hon. Gentleman must have forgotten the answer he gave to this House on the subject. Does he forget that he told the House that Mr. Concannon went up and addressed my hon. Friend, knowing who he was before the arrival of the train in the presence of his men? The right hon. Gentleman ought, at any rate, to try and make his narrative of what occurred consistent. My hon. Friend the Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton) has said there is the strongest reason for saying, not merely that the police knew my hon. Friend, but that they assaulted him because they knew. What is the fact, sir? My hon. Friend was assaulted on that occasion no less than three different times, and if that does not imply a deliberate intention, I do not know what does. He took a statement from my hon. Friend soon after he had recovered, and his statement was that he was first assaulted at the platform while he was in the act of speaking to my hon. Friend the Member for North-East Cork (Mr. W. O'Brien), by getting a violent blow in the back, which was exceedingly painful, but did not produce any wound. The Member for North-East Cork was seized and marched out of the station, and the Member for North Monaghan went after him to obtain an opportunity of conferring with him when he should be taken to the police station. My hon. Friend had hardly got out of the station when he was assaulted a second time, receiving a violent blow on the back of the head, which produced a severe wound and resulted in great effusion of blood. While my hon. Friend was staggering under the effects of that blow and trying to get out of the crowd, he was assaulted a third time by a third policeman. He was the only member of the crowd assaulted three times, and that being so, I say there is strong ground for the supposition that the police assaulted him because they did know him. I con-only me but some of the most eminent doctors in Cork. I saw him also several times during his illness, and, although after a time he was able to go about, I can assure the right hon. Gentleman that he was very far from having recovered from the very serious injuries he received at the hands of the police. The suggestion that my hon. Friend was malingering is most disgraceful, and brings discredit on the right hon. Gentleman who makes it, and I think the right hon. Gentleman himself will see that it is neither an honourable nor a manly thing to say. I have only one more word to say on the subject of this Police Vote. With regard to the brutality of which the Irish police have been guilty during the past two or three years, I believe a great deal of it arises from the fact that they are encouraged by the Executive to indulge in strong drink. Two or three years ago it would have involved serious disgrace on an Irish policeman to be found drunk when on duty, but now they are on all occasions encouraged to drink, and, unfortunately, no encouragement is necessary. It is inevitable they should, under existing circumstances, drink to some extent, but so far from that tendency being suppressed it has, for obvious reasons, been encouraged. I believe that if the men at the Cork Bandon Station had not been under the influence of drink they would never have indulged in the disgraceful proceedings which then took place. They have almost entirely stopped attempting to enforce the licensing laws in Ireland. I have been always an advocate for temperance legislation, and have always supported proposals for the closing of public houses on Sunday and Saturday night; but I confess that my belief in legislation of that kind has been seriously shocked by the total neglect of the Irish police in the past few years to enforce the existing laws on the subject. The allegation which the right hon. Gentleman has made, that there are at present good relations between the Irish people and the police, is outrageously and grotesquely false, and the policy of the right hon. Gentleman has been, and is, to make those relations more and more strained. I will take the earliest opportunity of saying in Ireland that if proceedings such as those which took place at the Cork and Bandon Station are to continue, I will advise my constituents and Irish people to avoid collisions with the police if possible, and to avoid putting themselves into positions in which the police can make assaults of this kind upon them; but if they are compelled to go into situations in which there is danger of their being attacked by the police to go armed with such weapons as will enable them properly to retort for the attacks made upon them.

*Mr. O'KEEFFE (Limerick): I rise not alone as the Representative of one of the principal cities in Ireland, but also as having held the office of its Mayor or Chief Magistrate for the past three years. It will be readily understood that my official duties have brought me almost daily in contact with police administration. I do not wish to indulge in generalities; but I must repeat what has been said to the effect that the police force in Ireland is not, in the ordinary acceptance of the word, a police force at all. It is an army of 13,000 men, maintained, not for the protection of the persons and the property of the people, but for the sole purpose of upholding the policy of exasperation and coercion so unblushingly and persistently advocated by the right hon. Gentleman. During the short time that has elapsed since my election to this House I have observed the great difference between the police system existing in this country and that in Ireland. Here the police are under municipal control. They are the servants of the public. In Ireland they are the masters, and I regret to say that the word "policeman" in Ireland is synonymous with everything that is odious. Let me give the Committee a few facts regarding police statistics. In the City of Limerick, which has 39,000 inhabitants, we have 95 police. I find that the City of Lincoln, which has a population of 38,000, has only 40 police; that Yarmouth, with 48,000 inhabitants, has only 52 police; Northampton, with a population of 52,000, has 60 police; and Lichfield, with a population of 8,000, has only eight police. In villages in Ireland, with a population of not more than 2000, I have often seen 11 or 12 policemen. The criminal statistics laid on the Table of the House a few days ago show an extraordinary state of things as to crime in Ireland. One would think that crime must exist to a large extent in a country when the Government came to Parliament and demanded a large sum for its prevention. Yet what were the facts? Take the City of Limerick, about which the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland has given some interesting criminal statistics. The net number of indictable offences during 12 months were only seven, and of these not one was of a particularly serious nature. When analysed the proportion of serious crime appears to be 1·8 to 10,000 of the population. Although we have four Quarter Sessions for the trial of indictable offences and two Assizes, there has been hardly any work for them to do. As regards the cases dealt with summarily by the Magistrates—of which I have most experience—I can say that there has not been one of any consequence, and even such cases as drunkenness and assaults, which are the ordinary cases that arise in a large city like Limerick, show a decrease of 544. And I would remind the House that Limerick can be taken as a typical city, for not only is it the capital of its own county, but, from its situation, it is a centre for all the surrounding counties—for Clare, Kerry and Tipperary—so that on market days and holidays the population of the city will number probably 80,000. Having shown the immunity of this town from crime, I would ask how the Government pay tribute to the crimelessness of the place? Why in this city, where we are tired of giving our Judges white kid gloves, we are under the most stringent clauses of the Coercion Act; there is no right of public meeting there; the Resident Magistrates on any moment set aside the law if they wish to try a man; and we have an excess of policemen in our midst. I find in a letter I received from him only to-day, that the Government make a decision that Limerick is a dangerous city—which already has borne its own local burden being the cost of the extra police they have sent to the city for law and order." Every man knows the injustice of that tax, necessary for me to say that I will never pay a single penny of it. And now I would refer to the case which took place in Limerick a day and a half since, and I am

it because of the statement of the Chief Secretary as to the peaceful condition existing between the police and the people in Ireland. A year ago last November, on the occasion of the unveiling of a monument in Limerick to the memory of the Manchester Martyrs, a meeting was proclaimed by the Government. The meeting was proclaimed at the last moment, and soldiers were sent there—even Artillery—to prevent it. On the night the meeting was to have been held, a sort of disturbance broke out; there was a kind of riot, windows were broken, and other property was damaged. Those people who had suffered loss in this way made the usual presentment for compensation, and the Corporation, who were the Local Authority, had to decide whether or not the claims were well founded. Witnesses were examined, and the cases were gone into thoroughly. The damage amounted to about £1,000, and this the Corporation would have had no objection to pay, had it not been shown that the property wrecked in Limerick was not unwrecked, by what you would call rioters, but by the police themselves. Most respectable inhabitants proved that they had seen the police throwing their batons at the windows, some of which were worth as much as £50 a piece. The Corporation refused the presentment. The case came before Judge Holmes at the March Assizes, who considered himself constrained to pass the presentment, no matter who the rioters had been. He held, however, that the police had been the rioters on Sessions, and he was fined, with an alternative. The conviction was reviewed in the Queen's Bench, and I remember that Judge O'Brien laid it down that a constable had no right to enter a private meeting, and that those who prevented his entering by force were in the right. I call attention to this to show that even under the existing system in Ireland we are advised that the police in carrying on their illegal action can be legally and properly repelled by force. The right hon. Gentleman the Lord Mayor of Dublin has referred to a case in which perjury was established against a constable at Drogheda, and I may state that I was myself present during the trial of Mr. Sheahy, a Member of this House, who though he offered good bail for his appearance next day was met by a policeman named O'Malley, who, at the instigation of the Magistrate, whose name I cannot at this moment recall, swore that he had reason to believe that Mr. Sheahy, if allowed to go on bail, would not attend the meeting of the Court on the following day. This was perjury of the most appalling and open kind perpetrated under what was supposed to be the protection of the law. In conclusion, I would say, with regard to this Constabulary Vote that a more unpopular vote never is and never was presented to the House of Commons. Whatever may have been said by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary, I can see no trace of anything like reconciliation between the police and the Irish people. I do not so much blame the Constabulary for this, although there can be no doubt that individual members of the force have acted in certain cases with great brutality; but, on the other hand, I do accuse the Government of having been the cause of this alienation of feeling. If the Government continue to proceed as they have done they will never gain the respect or confidence of the Irish people. They may double the Constabulary Vote, or make it five millions if they like, and they may increase the strength of the Police Force to 50,000 men, but they will never gain the respect of the law-abiding people. I say that the whole Constabulary system of Ireland is rotten to the core, and as long as I occupy a seat in this House I will never cease to raise my voice against it.

Moreover, I say that the action taken by the Irish Members on this question will be applauded by the Irish people from one end of the country to the other. We have nothing to gain by coming here; but at the same time we should be guilty of almost criminal conduct if we did not attend in our places and tell the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary that he is not a fitting interpreter of the feelings of the Irish people, and that as far as we are concerned our votes and our voices will never cease to be against his policy.

MR. E. HARRINGTON (Kerry, W.): This is practically the first occasion during this Session on which I have had the opportunity of inflicting any observations upon the House. I find that I have now to address my remarks to a single occupant of the Treasury Bench (the Solicitor General for Ireland). I think the speech which has been delivered by the right hon. Gentleman the Lord Mayor of Dublin (Mr. Sexton) was so full, frank, able, and concise a statement of our case against the Government that we might fairly have been willing by that statement to stand or fall; and I challenge any hon. or right hon. Gentleman on the opposite side of the House to adduce any reasonable arguments in reply to it. But, following the example of the hon. and learned Gentleman who spoke last, I, also, will venture to localise my share in this Debate by bringing it within the four corners of the county which has the distinguished honour of being a kingdom in itself, and talking of the pranks played by the Royal Irish Constabulary in the Kingdom of Derry. During the last days of 1888 I had to accept the hospitality of the right hon. Gentleman who is at the head of the Irish Executive, and from that moment until I was released in February, by the gracious privilege of an inequality of the law, one day before my time, I had no knowledge of what was going on in the world outside. Since that time, however, I have learned a good deal of what has taken place with regard to the police, and I believe that if hon. Gentlemen on the opposite side of the House, will, after what is expected to be the early closing of Parliament, go to the County of Derry and there study the doings of the Government, many an honest vote will be diverted from the present Administration by the disgusting scenes they will be sure to witness. Why has the Chief Secretary never had the courage to visit the most disturbed county in Ireland, in which, I allege, 20,000 people have been evicted in the last 10 years? He has been represented there by the representative of that "old and particular friend" of the First Lord of the Treasury, Mr. Scames, who went there, employed Police Pensioners, and scattered gold all over the place in order to get false accusations made against me. These accusations have failed, but that is the only way in which the Government have been represented in the County of Kerry. My first experience on going back to that county after a period of enforced absence was an extraordinary one. Of course, I had a legal right to go to my own residence in my own constituency. The first thing I saw when I alighted on the railway platform was that a man who approached the train in order to shake hands with me, was struck under the ear by a policeman for that awful crime. The crime which I police deliberately laid a trap there in order that they might assault peaceable people. They drew up at the entrance to the street in which my house is situated a cordon of police, and in front of the window at which I was standing they planted a police note-taker with a few policemen around him, as if to intimate to the people they intended to take down any words I uttered and to prosecute me for them. It was obnoxious enough to suggest I was to be so quickly again prosecuted under such circumstances, but still, I did not mind that. What, however, did the police do? As soon as they had, by means of this trap, gathered a few hundred people together, they, without any note of warning or order, as I solemnly assert, ~~eluded~~ their guns and began to smash people on the head with them. I saw old women knocked down and kicked by policemen when they were on the ground, and these fine brave fellows, this noble force of men, of which the Chief Secretary for Ireland is so proud, acted in this brutal fashion. Mind you, I think there is no force in the world which would not be brutalised under similar circumstances, for the greatest liar of the force, the concocter of stories and the manufacturer of reports is certain of promotion and of being defended in this House by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary. We are accused by hon. Gentlemen ~~opposite~~ sometimes that we are always harping on the same theme, but I venture to say that in no other country in the world can such a picture as this be heads of the people. Then we have a system of shadowing people in the County of Kerry, and I believe that if the representatives of the taxpayers of this country could see the system under which this Police Force is administered, they would call for the abolition of the force. We see men in silk hats knocking about in all directions; policemen in uniform are plentiful, but policemen in all sorts of fancy costumes are still more numerous. They may be seen flying about on bicycles, and you may depend upon it they are not engaged in the detection of ordinary crime. We are told that 8,000 threatening letters are alleged to have been written in the County of Kerry. Now, these letters must be in the hands of the Government, and the only persons who have been brought to justice for writing them, so far, have been two women and a simpleton. This is all that the police have been able to detect in 10 years. Now, I have an offer to make. Let the Government give us possession of these letters for a fortnight, and I venture to say that we will bring many persons to justice. It was well said by the Lord Mayor of Dublin that no policeman in Ireland has ever been promoted for saving life. They are only promoted when they injure the life and limbs of political opponents of the Government. For those acts they are both promoted and rewarded. On the occasion when my newspaper plant was seized, fifty policemen were placed in charge of my house and took possession of all my books and papers and private letters. About thirty of them lived with me for nearly a fortnight in an undecided state of mind as to whether they should arrest me. It was just like the occupation of Egypt. They could not make up their minds whether they were going to leave or to stay. Now, each one of those thirty men have since been rewarded or promoted for the simple service of occupying my house. Policemen who perjure themselves also gain promotion, and notably there is the case of police constable Clark, who is now apparently in the highest confidence of the Government. Now, I wish to relate an incident which happened before my temporary absence from the County Kerry. While the Times case was being placed before the Special Commission, a land agent from Killarney gave certain startling evidence, and some young men in the town of Killarney thought they would assist in the investigation of that evidence. They therefore went out to make inquiries of their friends and neighbours as to the facts which the witness had deposed to, but from the moment they started, they were followed and shadowed by policemen who obstructed them and obtruded themselves between the young men and the persons they were visiting. They went with them into private houses, and at last one of the young men ordered a policeman out of a house. He refused to go and the young man pushed him out and took the person's statement in the policeman's absence. As the young man was not the owner of that house, he was convicted of assault, and he was imprisoned for a week for that act. I assert that the deliberate purpose of the police on that occasion was to obstruct the obtaining of evidence for the Special Commission then sitting in London. They would prevent any evidence being obtained by our side, but they would be willing to get evidence for the side of the allies—the Times and the Government. This is a matter which the Government will have to deal with early next Session, and I can promise them they will have lively times. I believe they will be made ashamed of their allies, and of the use made by the Times of the Royal Irish Constabulary. I appeal to hon. Members not to set down our statements as wholesale imagination. Let them rather go to Ireland and see the course of events for themselves. Let them go as ordinary tourists and visitors, and not announce to the nearest Resident Magistrate that they are Tory Members come to watch the administration of the law. I pledge my word that if they do this, there will soon be a great revolution of feeling on the part of the Tory Party against the administration of the Police Force. I now wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman what reason he can give for the police, without warning on occasion after occasion, when any sort of gathering takes place in the County of Kerry, batoning the people of that place. And here I should like to interpose a few words as to another matter. I have here a telegram which gives us some proof at any rate that the acts of the Government underlings will not always be upheld by the Superior Courts of Justice. I have here a telegram which states that the conviction of Dr. Tanner for assault has been set aside. The second case against Dr. Tanner is still at hearing, but, adds the telegram, "It is all plain sailing now." Yes, Sir, it has been plain sailing with the right hon. Gentleman for a long time. He has taken care that nothing shall obstruct his navigation. It was plain sailing when he removed from his path the Member for North-East Cork. It was plain sailing for him when, after looking me up in gaol on one of the foulest and most extraordinary pretences ever known, he came down here and belied me in this House. But it will not be plain sailing for him any longer, and I do believe that even in that Party, of which for the moment he is the figure head, there will be an awakening conscience, and that they will realise that the policy which they are pursuing is not a policy of union, but that it is a policy of the baton in Ireland and of falsehood in Parliament. I now return to the conduct of the police at Kerry. By what right, I ask, did they assault the people of my constituency? Why was no warning given me that the people must disperse? I asked the Resident Magistrate there if there was any law to justify his proceedings, and, curling his moustache, he replied, "I do not know, I am sure." I have kept the people of that town from spilling blood, for I gave them my pledge that I would raise the question in this House. I hope now I shall get a satisfactory reply. I will leave that subject. I have now to say that policemen are needlessly and posely taken from one part of Ireland to another; that they are plied with batons and that then they are set on to baton the people, while the stables who are acquainted with the locality are kept indoors; and what the right hon. Gentleman calls nurturing cordial relations between the police and the people. In some remote district in Ireland the people stand in fear of the police. But is it to be wondered at, when they are of every Constitution? The Government are to-day doing their mighty army of 26,000 men before the German Emperor, the master of millions, and to do that they are obliged to withdraw the Guards from London and put Lancers to do duty in their places. Why do not the Government make a proper use of the Royal Irish Constabulary? They could be easily drafted into the Army, which is their proper sphere, and then there would be no necessity to brutalise them as you are now doing. I have in my pocket two boycotting letters written by Mr. Cecil Roche, the nominal master of Colonel Turner, which were handed to the secretary of Tralee races by a sergeant of police, and this is the use you are making of the Irish Police Force. This act of this man in trying to instil hatred into the police force will carry its own revulsion of feeling against it, and I believe that decent men who have differed from us in past times in Ireland will see, after all, that it is the selfish policy of those who are administering the law that is estranging the people at the present time from the laws of the country. I will not inflict myself at any further length on the Committee. I was doubtful whether I should speak on this Vote at all. I assert that for 10 or 11 years I have never spoken at a meeting without securing protection for the police present; I have never consented to offering them violence or insult, and I am pained to speak of any section of my countrymen as I have done. But the temptation to them is great. If they do not treat us brutally they will not be promoted. It is by displaying their hatred of us and their animosity to any national feeling and to every instinct of humanity that they may expect promotion from those who have the feelings of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland.

*Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: It was my duty last night to address more than one long speech to the Committee, and I propose, therefore, to restrict the remarks I have to make to-day to the very narrowest limits, and to couch them in as uncontroversial a tone as the nature of the subject will admit of. I notice that something I said last night towards the close of my observations with regard to the increased good feeling between the police and the people has caused a good deal of irritation in the minds of hon. Gentlemen opposite. I believe that what I stated is the fact, and I abate no jot nor tittle of the assertion which I then made last evening. I should have thought that in every quarter of the House such an increase of good feeling would be desired; yet the statements made by hon. Gentlemen opposite with regard to the intemperate habits of the police and their reckless cruelty and brutality are not only absolutely unfounded, but certainly do not conduce to that harmony of feeling between the police and the people which hon. Gentlemen in their cooler moments must desire. Such speeches as that of the right hon. Gentleman the Lord Mayor of Dublin (Mr. Sexton), by the very violence of the language in which they are couched, must partly destroy the effect which they would be otherwise calculated to produce. The right hon. Gentleman has not only made the wildest accusations against myself personally, but he has emphasised the accusations against the police. The right hon. Gentleman directly charges the Government with the intention of doing all in their power to promote collisions between the police and the people, and with using, to obtain that object, all the powers of organisation at their own command. Further, he charges us with attempting to inflame the violence of the police by encouraging them in habits of intemperance. The right hon. Gentleman must feel that such accusations, however useful they may be on Irish platforms, are not suited to the atmosphere of the House of Commons. The right hon. Gentleman may attribute to me what motives he pleases, and he may draw a fancy picture of the Chief Secretary as a monster of political iniquity; but even if we granted the truth of this caricature, if we put the morality of the Government at the lowest level, what could the Government, as politicians, gain by promoting conflicts between the police and the public? The right hon. Gentleman must see that, as far as we have political interests to serve, and as far as our conduct is inspired, not by a sense of public duty to the people of Ireland, but by our estimate of the mere political exigencies of the situation, we have everything to gain by promoting harmony between the police and the people, and everything to lose by the contrary course. To say that the Government are—I will not say so wicked—but so idiotic as to carry out the policy attributed to them is surely to shock the common sense of the Committee and of the English people. The Amendment deals with two points apparently new—the alleged excess in the number of extra police over what is required by the condition of Ireland, and the alleged impropriety of making payments out of the public funds to the police at the time when they were witnesses in the Times' case. Now, I stated last evening without special inquiry that I had no doubt that the same rule was followed with regard to the police over in London on subpoena, which is habitually followed whenever a member of the Public Service is called before any Court of Law. Having made inquiry, I find that this was the case. The rule is—that if a man be called away from home on duty, the ordinary pay will not be interfered with. If he receives, as is usual, from those who subpoena him, money to support him in his absence from home, no money is paid to him from the public funds for that purpose. This rule, which is founded on common sense, has been strictly adhered to in the case of police called before the Special Commission. They receive no extra remuneration from a public source for the additional cost of their support from home, because that cost was borne, no doubt, by the Times. The right hon. Gentleman desires that not only should these witnesses receive no extra remuneration, but that their ordinary pay should be cut off.

Mr. SEXTON: My point is, that they received pay from the Crown in a period during which they discharged no duty to the Crown, but were receiving very considerable payment.

*Mr. BALFOUR: The first point I have dealt with. I have pointed out that it is a necessary and, I think, a natural and proper rule of the service that the pay should not be stopped because a man is called away from his ordinary duties to exercise his functions as a citizen. As to the amount of remuneration given by the Times, I have no information to give the House, because I have no information myself. It was a matter that was arranged by the Times just as it is arranged by any party to a suit.

Mr. MACNEILL (Donegal, S.): Will the right hon. Gentleman allow me to interrupt him for a moment? The right hon. Gentleman has frequently stated that in this matter there is no difference between the case of the men called before the Special Commission and the case of witnesses called before an ordinary Court. But other witnesses were given three days' notice by Mr. Soames when they were served. The constabulary were given no notice at all, and some of them were not subpoenaed at all. One man was kept over 100 days in London without subpoena. How is it that the constabulary witnesses were dancing attendance on Mr. Soames and the Times without any subpoena, whilst other witnesses were treated so differently?

*Mr. BALFOUR: I am surprised at the interruption of . . . amounting as it do and not unarguable subject wholly out of Amendment. The attacked the constabulary in London without a Amendment is about which they received ordinary rule was case of these men from the habitual

Public Service would be to set an unfortunate precedent. The right hon. Gentleman also desires to cut down the Vote by the amount for extra police in certain counties in Ireland on the ground that because Ireland is said to be no longer in a disturbed condition it no longer requires the extra police force. According to the right hon. Gentleman, either the contention of the Government about the state of Ireland is untrue or else the country should not be asked to pay the extra amount. I do not withdraw anything I have said with regard to the improved state of Ireland. That improvement makes itself manifest in almost every part of the country, and is established by every test that can be applied to it. The right hon. Gentleman has fallen into two errors. The first is, his statement that because crime has diminished, there ought to be no extra police force; and the second is, that there has been no diminution in the extra police force.

Mr. SEXTON: I referred not only to crime, but to the proclamation of meetings, and also to the boast of the right hon. Gentleman that the number of boycotted persons had been considerably reduced.

Mr. BALFOUR: I did not know that was the point to which the right hon. Gentleman attached weight, but it really makes no substantial difference in the argument I was addressing to the Committee. The point is to the argument brought forward by the right hon. Gentleman. His argument was that we did not require all the policemen now employed, since we said that Ireland was so much quieter than it had been. In answer to that, it is perfectly relevant to point out that at a time when agrarian crime was less, boycotting was not invented, and there was not a large political party actively engaged in promoting disturbance; but it is not relevant to point out that the cost of the force was greater. A larger number of police was required than actually exists at the present time. If hon. Gentlemen will compare the statistics of what was required when Ireland was much more disturbed in 1882, they will see that the amount of the extra police force used in the counties has been diminished by very nearly one-half, and I believe that a still further reduction will be made as the country improves. With regard to other points raised by hon. Members, I cannot go into them without again going over the ground which I traversed last night, and I have confined myself to the arguments which are strictly relevant to the Amendment. I think I have shown the House that there is no reason for refusing this Vote either on account of the action of the Times or on account of the alleged excessive police force in Ireland, and I hope, therefore, they will not assent to the Amendment.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): The best proof the right hon. Gentleman could give the Committee that there was no vindictive action on the part of the police and no animus on the part of the Government in stimulating them to excesses would be that every excess committed by the police in Ireland made against the Government, and that it was to their interest to promote harmony. No attempt has been made to show this. Why do you do all these hundred petty, mean, and contemptible acts, which show a spirit of vindictiveness on the part of the powers that be? What advantage is it to take away four ounces of bread from my hon. Friend the Member for West Kerry (Mr. E. Harrington) when you took away his hard labour? Did that remove from the minds of the Irish people the idea that you are a mean and contemptible and malignant Government? You cut off men's whiskers and moustaches, you strip your prisoners, and stick them in police vans and foul places. With what face under these circumstances can the right hon. Gentleman get up and say, "We never can incite policemen to act illegally, because it makes against us rather than for us." I regret having to speak about the conduct of the Irish Constabulary during the last four years; but I must bear out what has been said about the police being encouraged to drink stimulating liquors and deprived of food for the purpose of making them savage. I always supported temperance legislation in this House. I shall never do it again as long as the Irish Police are controlled as at present. What are the facts? It used to be a crime for them to be drunk on duty; but now their officers pass it over, and huge barrels of porter are freely distributed amongst them, and in a state, half-hungry and half-drunk, I have seen them with the devil in their eyes attack the unfortunate people and level them with the ground. There is a still more remarkable fact. These men have for years been regarded as a religious body of men. They were respected by the people and on friendly terms with the Priests. Now they are being distinctly encouraged to detach themselves from their religious observances. Every policeman entering the Force has to take an oath that he does not belong to any secret society, except the Freemasons. It is notorious that the Freemasons' Society is condemned by the Catholic Church, as every other secret society is. I am not going to attack it, as it is known in England in the form of a benevolent institution; but I say that in Ireland Freemasonry and Orangeism are the same thing, and if you take up a list of Freemasons you will find that, as a rule, the heads of the Freemasons and the heads of the Orange Society are one and the same. There is no promotion to be had in the force except through the Freemason ring, and these men know it. They are encouraged on this account to join a body which is condemned by their religious superiors, and they do join it. And how are the men officered? The nomination system, which is partly resorted to, is a most pernicious system, and it is one which you have abolished in your own country. Every petty agent and landlord gets a nomination for a son, and the whole of the officers at the present moment belong to that class, except a few Englishmen, who are the most respectable members of the force. Sub-Inspector Tyatt, an Englishman, undoubtedly brought Dr. Cross to justice for poisoning his wife, and—I do not know whether it was because a Petition was sent to the Lord Lieutenant, to let Dr. Cross off because he had been boycotted—the Sub-Inspector was removed, at his own expense, to a more distant station. I say that the spirit that animates the officers goes into the men, and their only chance of promotion is to read the speeches of the right hon. Gentleman, and to act upon his precepts. Why do they do it? Because they believe, rightly or wrongly, that it pleases the right hon. Gentleman to have Members of Parliament with out heads, and as they do not have heads, they wish to please him by pursuing mass the men, and judicious the Irish take, or be manlike the Chief that it is of exacer from the right hon. are carry Government, and they act accordingly. Now just by way of illustration, not of any act of brutality on the part of the police, but of the absurdity of the system, I will tell the Committee what occurred when I went to visit the Member for North-East Cork in goal in March or April last. I arrived in Tralee with the solicitor for the defence armed with an order of admission from the Attorney General, but from the moment we arrived at our hotel we were watched by a galaxy of these heroes. Step by step, from the hotel to the gaol we were watched, and step by step we were watched back again. I afterwards wrote to Sir Andrew Reid on the subject—I believe he has been made a "Sir," and I think none the better of him for it—I explained the object of our visit to Tralee. I said we had the leave of the Government, and I inquired why we were dogged in this way. The next day after the trial, and after the usual performance of my expulsion from Court by Mr. Cecil Roche, waiting for the train I took a walk in company with the solicitor and my friend, Mr. Condon, now in gaol. I do not think if we had intended to hold a meeting we should have taken the course we did. We took a walk through the country. We doubled back again, but still we were followed by two policemen, to whom at last I spoke, and I asked why they paid us such attention, but they declined to give me an answer, or to give their names. I wrote to the Inspector under the impression that the men had inadvertently exceeded their duty, but no; I was told they were quite right in acting as they did, and refusing their names. From Sir Andrew Reid I could get no explanation why I was followed. Now this is most absurd. I do not mind being followed, except that I do not care to be thought such a fool that two policemen can find out anything that I desire to conceal. In that sense I do submit to Her Majesty's Government that unless these things are done for purposes of irritation and insult I cannot conceive what object they can have in the wide world. I see these men at the railway station; they have some arrangement with the booking clerk, and from the moment I take my ticket to my return, arrangements are made to keep a watch on me all along the line, as if I were the Lord Lieutenant, and I find a guard of honour at every railway station. Some members of our party are Railway Directors, and I invite them to ascertain by what right these men are admitted to the railway stations. I invite the railway shareholders, the vast majority of whom sympathize with us, to inquire by what right these policemen enter upon private premises and baton the people there. I trust this irritating system of espionage will be abolished. You find these fellows sticking their pickelhaubes and noses into every railway carriage to find out where you are going, as if we are living under a Russian system of administration. What can be the object except irritation? In Mr. Forster's day, my hon. Friend the Member for the College Green moved for a Return of the number of people arrested at railway stations in 10 years, and the Return was given in 1881, and we found that in that period there had been no arrests, except that on one occasion, at Ennis, some gentlemen of the Clare Militia were arrested for being drunk and disorderly. I should like to have a continuation of that Return. I do not know whether there has been any continuation of the pranks of the Clare Militia; but I think it would be shown that this practice of watching railway stations has no sort of object but exasperation. We have got used to it, but English and Scotch visitors to our country are struck by the appearance of these louts carrying guns, swords, batons, revolvers, and a spike on their helmets—visitors are struck by this exhibition, and in it may afford a useful object-lesson for their enlightenment. We have been told that under the present system of administration there has been an improvement in the state of Ireland, and as proof we are told that the number of boycotted persons has decreased. We have not been told that the number of evicted farms has decreased, that was left as information for Colonel Turner to give the Judges of Assize, a piece of impertinence that deserves censure. The system of boycotting Returns sprang up under the present Chief Secretary. We always have a Chief Secretary who is one of the finest statesmen of his time. All the other Departments of State would be glad to have his services, but England out of her bounty confers him upon the Irish race. The right hon. Gentleman divorcing himself from Scotland, from the Home Office, Foreign Office, the Colonies, India, the Army, the Navy, is good enough to give the benefit of his intellect to Ireland, and during his tenure of office he has developed this system of Returns of boycotted persons. He says when the Coercion Act was introduced there were 4,000 boycotted persons, and now two years of the Act have reduced that number by half or a third. Now, I assume every person of common sense in any district knows who is boycotted there and who is not. A boycotted person must be well known. But these Returns furnished by the Constabulary give us no information whatever by which we can test their accuracy. In my opinion, the Returns are as illusory as other information furnished through the same channel. The right hon. Gentleman has devised a system—probably the most effective that could be devised—for singling out a boycotted person and preventing anybody from buying from or selling to him. There has come into being in Ireland recently a body called a Land Corporation, and also, I believe, a Derelict Trust, which certainly does not belie its name, for it is certainly derelict if not trustworthy. These two bodies endeavour to effect sales of cattle for landlords and the sale of the produce of boycotted persons. What have the Government done in Ireland, headed by a man of the undoubted intellect of the Chief Secretary? With regard to boycotted persons, I am surprised that a man of intellect like the Chief Secretary cannot see the absurdity of the system of police protection. When a boycotted person attends a fair he is accompanied by four or five constables in uniform, with rifles, in order to watch the bargains. Let me suggest, in addition, that when boycotted pigs are brought into a fair the right hon. Gentleman should give the owner the Union Jack to wave over them, and we should see how brisk the sales would be under the combined influence of bayonets and the flag. This system has sprung up under the right hon. Gentleman, who boasts that he has diminished boycotting in Ireland. At some fairs probably 50 constables are present to look after the boycotted land-grabbers and the landlords. Does this promote good feeling and encourage the sale of boycotted produce? If I wanted a pig at a fair I would steer clear of the bayonets, and I would suggest to the great intellect which now sheds its beam over Ireland that the best way to give a land-grabber a chance at a fair is to let him go there unnoticed and unknown. I make this humble suggestion in the interests of the landlords. Of course, the right hon. Gentleman says these men must be protected from danger, but if in an unfortunate state of affairs they need protection let them stay at home, for certainly they will make no sales at the fair under the circumstances I have mentioned. There is an instance in the case of Lord Courtown. Lord Courtown is, I believe, the head of the "Property Defence Association"—it is not much of a head, it is true, that he can give, but such as it is he gives it to that body. Lord Courtown had a lot of pigs the other day at Gorey Fair, and this great Government, which might employ its bayonets on the Nile, or in any other region where valour will meet its reward, gave the assistance of the police bayonets to Lord Courtown to sell his "bonnives." The hon. Member for Olonmel is now undergoing four months' imprisonment. I had the distinction of defending him before two Resident Magistrates, of whose legal knowledge the Lord Lieutenant is satisfied, and the only evidence against him was that he stood by while a sale was being attempted, and that he winked at the cattle dealer, and asked him for a match. Well, I am not likely to require a match, but if ever I go to a cattle fair I shall be careful to avoid the consequences. I have given the increase in constabulary, the interest duty to the police. Thefts, burglars and maniacs inquests they that, notwithstanding opinion, they tance to the or serving process clined to study after crime. They turn their attention to capturing Members of Parliament. In the rural districts anywhere in Ireland, you can go about with a million of money in your pocket, robbery is unknown, the people never think of it, but in the larger towns there is crime of course, and it is a serious thing to shopkeepers and others that these "swells" give the go-by to regular police duties. The fact is the police have got the idea into their heads that they are a political force, and they are entirely too high and mighty to be troubled with the ordinary duties of thief-catching. The Government have inoculated them with the idea, but the Government might have saved the police from the degradation of working the battering ram. The Government have recently issued a circular of a very peculiar kind. This circular, which has seen the light of day as all Government circulars do—anybody can keep a secret but Her Majesty's subjects—directs constables to find out visitors and give them all the information they can about evictions, and to take care that no exaggerated stories are told. The constables are to become a sort of Cook's Guides, and personally to conduct visitors. But why is the Member for Fulham admitted within the cordon of police while the Member for North Monaghan is excluded? In like manner, the Member for South Tyrone was passed on from station to station, and a nice mess he made of it. Divisional Inspector Cameron told the Member for South Tyrone a story about a man being refused relief because he was a Protestant: but that has been ance to the views in reference to a right of way. He was then sent to Youghal, where he ordered a most illegal and improper charge against the people. You then sent him to Wexford, where, as I say, his conduct was most brutal and arbitrary. And what after that? Why, you sent him to Belfast as Town Inspector, to succeed another who batoned the Member for the Harbour Division of Dublin; and then, being a fit man for the position, you sent him to Donegal to superintend the Falcarragh evictions. His career throughout has been one of coercion, and because of that, and a breach of a rule—which on the part of an ordinary constable involves dismissal, and is applied without mercy—he received promotion after promotion. This shows the spirit in which these men carry on their duty. They believe they are carrying out the desire of the Government when they beat and ill-use the people, and, as I have shown, their brutality ensures their promotion. We have dual proof of this, for in the case of constables who act with consideration and humanity towards the people we find that they are degraded. There is the case of the sergeant who was reduced to the ranks in Donegal because of his mild action; then there is the still more notorious case of District Inspector Markham. I know nothing about this officer except the facts bearing on the Falcarragh case of Father M'Fadden. Father M'Fadden had spent six months in gaol, and a small, unimportant meeting was held when he came home, to which he addressed a short speech, a speech of a character which no sensible Executive would have taken any notice of. He simply said that the present Government would not be long in office, that the evicted tenants had plenty of friends, and that he believed they would be supported after eviction. For that speech a warrant was issued against him—that was the speech which led to the murder of District Inspector Martin, and which possibly may lead to the execution of a number of unhappy people now in prison. Let the Committee take note of the petty and trivial circumstances out of which this case arose. Father M'Fadden, as I say, addressed a little village meeting; there was no police shorthand writer present; it was pitch dark, and a policeman who wrote long-hand was in the crowd. He took two or three scattered notes of the speech which Father M'Fadden made from the steps of his house, and these notes have been given in evidence in some of the cases. Every one who reads them will see how frivolous it was to initiate a prosecution for such words, especially in the case of a man like Father M'Fadden, who had just returned from six months' imprisonment, [and the whole of whose acts in Donegal had been in favour of law and order. Had he not put down smuggling and illicit distillation in the district? Whenever a private still or shebeen was established there Father M'Fadden went straight to the barracks and gave information, and the police put an end to the potheen making. Almost every one of his parishioners are teetotallers, and shebeening is hardly known, notwithstanding that, ordinarily, in these mountain districts the practice largely prevails, and is connived at by the heads of the police and the Magistrates, who always have in their houses a good glass of potheen for the visitor. Well, this man who has done so much for his people, who has begged for them throughout the world, has a warrant issued against him for making this trumpery speech. He remains in his house for an entire week. Although the police are almost surrounding the residence, he is not arrested. No attempt whatever is made to arrest him. He might have been found—in the words of Scripture—almost daily in the temple preaching and teaching. Ultimately the police came with clubs and guns to arrest him on Sunday, immediately after Mass, and it was then that the murder of Inspector Martin occurred. In the ordinary course a man would have been arrested without display, taken before the Magistrates, and admitted to bail. But the authorities waited until a time when there had been some excitement in the village, District Inspector Markham—who has been reduced for cowardice, than which a more serious charge could not be made against a police constable—was ordered up with 40 men to arrest Father M'Fadden. But, seeing the excitement of the people, the Inspector thought it well to wait for a calmer moment, and marched his men back without effecting the arrest. For this conduct, because he did not act on Captain Plunket's splendid maxim, "Don't hesitate to shoot," and because he did not make lanes through the people with baton and bayonet and buckshot, he was severely reprovved and found guilty of cowardice. I do not think that Inspector Markham need pay much regard to such an absurd charge, for he has been found guilty of being a humane person, nothing else. Humanity may be punished by degradation by the existing Government, but the time will come when it will be rewarded, and when men like Mr. Markham will be honoured instead of blamed. These men who are now victimised by the present Administration for their humanity, will be promoted by the Administration which will follow. The fact that police constables who have a leaning to the side of the people are reduced and degraded, whereas those constables who baton and insult the people are promoted shows that the Government want turmoil in Ireland. The policy of the right hon. Gentleman opposite has been to create disturbance in order to lead the English people to believe that the Irish people are unfit for self-government. The right hon. Gentleman asks would it not be to our interest to have quietude prevail in Ireland. Well, that may be or may not be, but undoubtedly acts have been done by the Executive with the object of enabling them to say to the English electors, "Can we trust people who act like that with the administration of their own affairs? Will they not oppress the loyal inhabitants and Protestants?" That I believe to be at the bottom of the policy of the Chief Secretary. The allegations made by the Home Rule Members are admittedly very serious. Why then, when we ask that inquiry may be instituted into the cases out of which those allegations arise, do we always meet with refusal? Vainly have we asked for an investigation into the conduct of the police at Mitchelstown, at Lisdoonvarna on the occasion when Head Constable Whelehan met his death, at Drumlish, at Charleville, and at other places. I denounce the state of the law under which, if an Orangeman shoots a policeman in Belfast, no cost accrues to the ratepayers.

Mr. T. M. Healy

while if a policeman is hurt in the South of Ireland, a levy is immediately made to compensate him for the damage he has suffered. Head Constable Gardner and Constable Hughes were shot by an Orangeman named Walker at Belfast, but not a penny in compensation was given to their relatives, whereas the constable who was hurt at Mitchelstown — where three of the people were killed—received a thousand pounds compensation. For denouncing this anomaly, I have been attacked by Her Majesty's Government and Members of the Party opposite. But I shall continue to denounce it. I say it shows how the law is administered. County Inspector Stevens got six or eight guineas for the damage done to his coat, which could not have been worth that sum; and another man got £500 because he said he felt a dizziness in his head. As to the hon. Member for North Monaghan (Mr. P. O'Brien), who is an object for pity rather than of jest—as the Chief Secretary would have thought if he could have seen him carrying the plasters and bandages on his head—no answer has been given to the statements made as to the attack upon him. Will the Government grant an inquiry; and if they will not, what must be the inference? Inquiries have been demanded into the affair at Mitchelstown, but they have been refused. Well, is not the great argument for Protestantism that the truth can never suffer by inquiry? They tell us Catholics, "Oh, you object to controversy and to having your Faith inquired into, because it will not stand the test of investigation." That is our reply to you now. Even your Liberal Unionist supporters have recommended an inquiry into the Mitchelstown affair, and yet it has not been granted. The Chief Secretary says the Government gain nothing by this system of government. If that is his bona fide opinion, I would ask him in a friendly way—because my anxiety is to see matters conducted secundum artem—why does he not give a different cue to his subordinates? Why does he always support the police before he even knows the facts of the case—why does he not convey the impression that he is anxious for fair play? I have never known him express regret for an act of violence or harshness on the part of the police. He has never said or done anything to pour oil on the troubled waters. His whole policy is one of exasperation; and his statements as to the cordial relations between the police and the people are base coins passed off upon his friends, who profess to accept them, although they know them to be spurious. In Ireland at the present time the police, thanks to the policy of the right hon. Gentleman, are regarded with a feeling of dislike which positively amounts to passion and loathing. On our side, instead of being anxious to keep up ill-feeling or turbulence or anything of that kind, our whole and sole anxiety is to calm down the people and prevent passion reaching undue limits. I strongly support the suggestion of my hon. Friend for the reduction of the Vote. I do not propose to touch upon a number of questions which have been raised, as time does not permit of it. I do not propose, at present, for instance, to deal with the Royal Irish Constabulary and the Times' case, but next year I hope to have the opportunity of doing so. Discussion was cut short at the close of last Session in the winter, because it was said the House would re-assemble so soon; but that plea cannot be expected to prevail now with respect to matters outside of the Times' case; and as to that, fulness of discussion will be insisted upon next year. We have been told that the witnesses have got nothing except the ordinary pay, but an accidental light has been thrown on the matter by an incident at Limerick. Three months ago a policeman went to a large house in the furnishing trade and proposed to buy £100 worth of furniture, stating that Mr. Soames had promised him that sum; but since the recent cross-examination on the payment of witnesses, the man has asked the furnishing house to take back the furniture because Mr. Soames has refused to pay him the £100. That refusal, however, does not touch the promise that has been made. These matters must wait; but as to the ordinary Estimates the Irish Members intend to insist upon the full discussion which was promised last year.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 132; Noes 170.—(Div. List, No. 284.)

“Original Question again proposed.

It being after half-past Five of the clock, and Objection being taken to Further Proceeding, the Chairman rose to interrupt the Business:—

Whereupon Mr. William Henry SMITH rose in his place, and claimed to move, “That the Question be now put.”

MR. SEXTON: On a point of order, Mr. Courtney, I wish to ask you whether, after the hour for Opposed Business has arrived, the right hon. Gentleman can move the Closure?

THE CHAIRMAN: The question has been repeatedly decided that the time when Opposed Business shall cease is half-past 5 on Wednesdays, unless a Division is then in progress, and the time for the cessation of Opposed Business in that case is the close of the Division.

Question proposed, “That the Question be now put.”

MR. SEXTON: Mr. Courtney, I wish to ask you whether you will be good enough, for the information and satisfaction of the House, to cite any precedent for a case in which after the hour fixed by the Standing Order [cries of “Oh!” from the Ministerial Benches and Parnellite cries of “Order!”—we will not divide at all if you do not take care—I wish to ask you, Sir, to state a precedent where, after the time for Opposed Business has elapsed, a Motion to apply the Closure was accepted.

THE CHAIRMAN: I am not aware of any specific case, nor is it necessary that I should be. I am informed that there are such cases. The principle of the decision is clear. There have frequently been cases in which Divisions have been in progress at the close of the sitting at 12 or half-past 5, and after the Division was over that moment was treated as the moment of the interruption of business.

MR. SEXTON: Was not one of those cases—[Ministerial cries of “Order!” and loud Parnellite cries of “Order!”]

MR. SEXTON: Why do not you be quiet [cries of “Order!”] I have to warn you—

THE CHAIRMAN: The right hon. Gentleman must address the Chairman.

MR. SEXTON: I again appeal to you, Mr. Courtney, to cite, for the information of the Committee, any case in which the Closure was moved otherwise than before the hour for the close of Opposed Business arrived.

THE CHAIRMAN: As I said, I was not aware of, and could not cite, a precedent, though I was told there were such precedents. I find now that on a Wednesday morning sitting, on the 14th November, 1888, in Committee of Supply on the Vote for the Metropolitan Police, a Division on the reduction of the item was in progress at half-past 5. After the declaration of the numbers the Chairman put the Original Question, and an hon. Member offering to speak, the Chairman proceeded to interrupt the business, when Mr. W. H. Smith moved the Closure, which was put and carried, and the Original Question was then put.

Question accordingly put.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I respectfully submit to you that the Question cannot be put.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order!

The Committee divided:—Ayes 163; Noes 123.—(Div. List, No. 268.)

Whereupon the Chairman left the Chair to make his Report to the House.

Resolution to be reported To-morrow;
Committee to sit again To-morrow.

And, it being after Six of the clock, Mr. Speaker adjourned the House without Question put.

House adjourned at ten minutes after Six o'clock.

Clause 1. Amendment made; Clause agreed to.

Clause 2 agreed to.

Clause 3.

*EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I beg on Clause 3 to move an Amendment, of which I have given notice. It speaks for itself, and is not likely to excite opposition. The Clause is founded upon the recommendation of your Lordships' Committee last year. The Committee seems to have gone very much on the evidence of Dr. Bridges, the local inspector, who gave very strong evidence that it is greatly in the interest of asylums and of the poor people treated there, that medical instruction should be allowed as proposed. The President of the Royal College of Physicians has informed me that he has been in communication with Mr. Ritchie on the subject, and that he entirely agrees with this proviso. I have also made a verbal alteration with regard to the asylums managers.

Amendment moved, to insert the following clause:—

"The managers of the Metropolitan Asylums Board may, if they think fit, allow the asylums provided by them for fever, small-pox, and diphtheria, to be used for purposes of medical instruction, subject to any rules and regulations which the Local Government Board may, from time to time, make with regard to such use of the said asylums."—(The Earl Granville.)

LORD BALFOUR: I entirely accept this Amendment after the representations which have been made to the Local Government Board in its favour, not the least being the consideration that fever cases are now so promptly removed to the proper hospitals, and there would be a possibility of there not being sufficient instruction afforded for medical purposes.

Clause agreed to.

The Report of Amendments to be received on Tuesday next; the Bill to be printed as amended (No. 218).

PAYMASTER GENERAL BILL. (No. 208.)

PREVENTION OF CRUELTY TO AND PROTECTION OF CHILDREN BILL, formerly
CRUELTY TO CHILDREN PREVENTION

Amendments reported according to order.

THE EARL OF MILLTOWN: I should like to call your Lordships' attention to the change which has been made in the title of this Bill at the last moment. Originally its title was "The Prevention of Cruelty to Children Bill." Afterwards Lord Kimberley proposed it should be altered to "The Protection of Children Bill." The Standing Committee were of opinion that the alteration proposed was a proper one, but, at the last moment, it has been again altered. I now propose that the shorter title should be adopted, as this lengthening of the title seems absurd. Under this title it might be supposed to be a Bill for the prevention of cruelty to children and the prevention of protection to them, which I think is hardly the meaning of the noble Earl.

LORD HERSCHELL: No doubt an alteration was made in the title in Standing Committee in order to meet the objection that there were subjects covered by this Bill which do not come within the title of "Prevention of Cruelty," but deal rather with the protection of children. Objections were made to such matters being included in a Bill bearing that title. Representations were made which induced my hon. friend, Lord Aberdeen, to propose an Amendment to that title, to which I readily assented. It was represented that there were advantages in letting it be known that a Bill had been passed for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, which might not follow if the Bill were entitled merely for the Protection of Children. There seems to me no objection to the whole of the title being giving to the Bill. I have only to add that notice of the Amendment was given on the Paper, and that it was not made in any way that would create surprise.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY): Is the House to understand that this is called the "short title" of the Bill?

LORD HERSCHELL: Yes. There are degrees of shortness.

THE EARL OF MILLTOWN: I beg to propose an Amendment to Clause 3. By sub-sections (b) and (c) it is provided that any person who

"(b) causes or procures any child, being a boy under the age of fourteen years, or being a girl under the age of sixteen years, to be in any street, or in any premises licensed for the sale of any intoxicating liquor, other than premises licensed according to law for public entertainments, for the purpose of singing, playing, or performing for profit, or offering anything for sale, between ten p.m. and five a.m. from the first day of April to the thirtieth day of September inclusive, or between eight p.m. and five a.m. from the first day of October to the thirty-first day of March inclusive; or

(c) causes or procures any child under the age of ten years to be at any time in any street, or in any premises licensed for the sale of any intoxicating liquor, or in premises licensed according to law for public entertainments, for the purpose of singing, playing or performing for profit, or offering any thing for sale, shall on conviction thereof by a Court of summary jurisdiction in manner provided by the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to a fine not exceeding twenty-five pounds alternatively, or in default of payment of the said fine, or in addition thereto, to imprisonment, with or without hard labour, for any term not exceeding three months."

I should like to call the attention of the House to the fact that the evening newspapers are sold in the streets within those prohibited hours. It really does seem a monstrous hardship in these very hard times to prevent, by the operation of such a Clause as this, poor people deriving the little, but, to them, most valuable addition to their means which is earned by the boys who sell newspapers in the streets. I cannot see why there should be any difference made between winter and summer with regard to the out-door sale of newspapers by boys. The gas-lamps are alight in the streets just the same at all seasons, and it is immaterial to these poor boys, whether it happens to be winter or summer, if they can earn a little in that way. It is hardly to be supposed that they will consult the almanack to see whether they may carry on their trade within the particular hours when papers or anything else may be sold by them in the streets, and really this seems to be a most extraordinary tyrannical piece of legislation. I would ask your Lordships whether boys should not be allowed to sell newspapers in the streets after ten o'clock in the evening? To fix the prohibited time at ten p.m. in the summer and eight p.m. in the winter seems to me to be not only cruel, but ridiculous. It is true that power is given to local authorities to vary those hours, but it seems to me that this is a matter which it would be very much better not to leave to local authorities. They might possibly choose not to vary those hours, and it would be much better for Parliament to fix the hours within which it is to become unlawful for poor boys to carry on their lawful occupations. I move, therefore, to omit the words after "eight p.m."

Moved, to omit all words after "eight p.m." in line 14, down to the word "or" in line 17.—(The Earl of Milltown.)

LORD HERSCHELL: The provision to which the noble Earl refers does not relate to newspaper boys only. He has given a particular case, in which he says it would be unreasonable to restrict the hours and prohibition to the extent laid down in the Bill. It must be remembered that this Clause would give, even in the winter, fifteen hours during which children may be employed, and I think that will be considered by your Lordships a sufficiently long period for the employment of any child, only nine hours' rest remaining. I think, my Lords, to say that children shall not be employed for more than fifteen hours out of twenty-four, is not any extraordinary interference with either liberty or rights, and that it is saying no more than will, I am sure, be thought desirable. To meet particular cases such as that referred to, the proviso giving power to the local authorities to vary the hours, has been inserted; but I do not know that it would be advisable to enable them to extend the hours in the case of a particular employment. It seems to me that meets the whole objection.

THE EARL OF MILLTOWN: I mentioned the case of the newspaper boys, as that is the most glaring; but as your Lordships are aware, boys earn their living in the streets in other ways. For instance, there are the boys who sell matches. As I have said, the amounts which they earn are not great, but still to these poor boys themselves they are of considerable importance. The noble Earl speaks of there being fifteen hours' work, as though it were continuous for that period, but surely he would not say that remark applies to boys who sell evening papers. The point is that this clause prevents their being employed within the prohibited time, and therefore I ask your Lordships to accept the amendment for the omission of those words.

On question "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill," their Lordships divided:—Contents, 13; Not Contents, 23.

LORD HERSCHELL: Clause 3, subsection (c), about which there has been so much discussion, as it at present stands, prohibits the employment of children under 10 in premises licensed for public entertainments. That will not cover travelling circuses and like places of entertainment throughout the country where children may be employed for acrobatic purposes, and in ways in which their employment would be even more undesirable than in licensed theatres. It seems to me if it be considered inexpedient to permit such employment in theatres it would be unfair to the theatres to permit it in circuses and travelling shows. I would therefore suggest that after the words "licensed according to law for public entertainments," there should be inserted "or any circus or place to which the public shall be admitted by payment," so that those places may be put on the same footing in this respect as theatres, which are required to be licensed.

Moved to insert in clause 3, line 21, "or any circus or place to which the public shall be admitted by payment."
—(Lord Herschell.)

Agreed to.

LORD HERSCHELL: With reference to the next amendments I will state the course which I propose, with your Lordships' permission, to take. I will either move them now or leave them to the Third Reading. I have been unable to give notice of them, because it was not until yesterday that I obtained a copy of the Bill as it had passed through Committee, and of course it was impossible for me to propose amendments until I received it. If there is no objection to my moving them now, I will state that the first amendment which I have to propose is in line 38, to insert the words "stipendiary magistrates or."

Amendment agreed to.

*LORD WATSON: I wish to move that the words "Sheriff or Sheriff-substitute" should be deleted, and the words "School Board" inserted, in deference to a very generally expressed desire in Scotland. The employment of young children is by no means such a burning question in the North as it is in England. For the last 11 years, that is to say, since the passing of the Education (Scotland) Act of 1878, the power of permitting children under age to be employed on special occasions has been entrusted to School Boards. I have not heard any complaints of the manner in which they have performed that duty, and in Glasgow, where that Clause has been in operation, very wise and carefully-framed regulations have been issued by the School Board as to the conditions under which children shall be permitted to assist in dramatic performances. I think it would be a great pity to take that power from a tribunal which has given entire satisfaction for so many years, and to vest it in the Sheriffs and Sheriff-substitutes. I doubt whether it is at all consistent with the duties which those gentlemen perform that they should be compelled to enquire into the circumstances under which children should be thus employed. Even if they were enabled to make inquiries, I doubt whether they could perform that duty more efficiently than the School Board.

LORD HERSCHELL: I have no objection whatever to the Amendment. Indeed, I should like the same thing to be done in England, but I fear there would be no chance of its being adopted here. I have certainly no objection to it as regards Scotland.

Amendment agreed to.

LORD HERSCHELL: I will now move my next Amendment. I desire to say, before doing so, in order to avoid misapprehension, that I do not like the proviso, though I am seeking to amend it any more than when it was first proposed. My objections to it remain, but I do not attempt to compass the impossible, and, therefore, I do not propose, against your Lordships' opinion, to omit it. As the Amendment is drawn, it enables the Court to order that a child not exceeding seven may be permitted to take part in such entertainments. It strikes me that, instead of so enacting, the better form would be to enable the Court to grant a license; that the Court might be empowered to grant a license during such hours, and subject to such restrictions and conditions as it might think fit. I have been led to that opinion having observed what has been done by the Glasgow School Board. That Body grants exemptions to the children, authorising them to take part in these entertainments, stating for what time they shall be employed, and making regulations for the purpose of ensuring that they shall be properly taken care of. It seems to me that, whatever tribunal has the power of granting exemptions, should also have the power of imposing reasonable restrictions and conditions. If permitted at all, it should only be permitted under those circumstances. I will not press the Amendment now if it be thought better I should leave it to the Third Reading. The Amendment is to leave out the words "in order that," and to insert "grant a license for such time during such hours of the day, and subject to such restrictions and conditions as it may think fit, for a child to take part."

LORD MILLTOWN: I think it is very inconvenient that Amendments should be discussed otherwise than in order as they appear in the Paper.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Viscount CROSS): We had much discussion upon this proviso in Committee that I think it would be very inconvenient now to discuss Amendments except as they occur in the Paper.

LORD HERSCHELL: I will not press the Amendment. I have an Amendment at the end of this section. I made a promise that I would provide that the part of sub-section (c) which relates to children performing in premises licensed for public entertainments, should not come into operation until the 1st November next. I will put down for the Third Reading an Amendment to that Amendments reported (according to order).

THE MARQUESS OF LOTHIAN: With reference to Clause 82, upon which there was some discussion, I have to say that I have no proposal to offer. I do not know whether the House will accept the Clause as it stands.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: I regret that Her Majesty's Government have not thought it desirable to modify the form of this Clause. The words are very large and very arbitrary. It would appear that, in many of the Scotch counties, it would make the Valuator the servant of the Treasury and not of the county. That, I think, would be a serious inconvenience. Though I have every confidence in the Treasury as at present represented, I think, in such a matter as this, we must look to the future, especially in a Bill to give Local Government and local powers. It seems to me inconsistent with the principle of this Bill that you should make one of the principal officers of the Council the servant of the Treasury.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: When this matter was brought forward the other night, the noble duke stated that in the House of Commons the Clause had slipped in without much consideration. The matter is one concerning Scotland and concerning the Treasury, and on both those grounds I feel that I am not very competent to deal with it. These Clauses were dealt with and adjusted after full consideration by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Lord Advocate, and the permanent officials concerned. So that, at all events, this Clause has been adjusted with full knowledge of all the circumstances; and it seems to me if there is anything too rigid or severe in the Clause, the County Councils can protect themselves by not employing officers of this kind.

*THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: My Lords, before we leave this Bill, I would mention one matter which the noble Marquess proposed to take into consideration the other night, but with regard to which he has said nothing, and nothing has been done. I moved an Amendment on behalf of Lord Aberdeen with reference to the stereotyped rate on the owners. I put to the noble Marquess several points; he admitted there was some force in them, and he undertook to consider this matter before the Report.

THE MARQUESS OF LOTHIAN: It is quite true I did undertake to consider this question again before the report, but I said at the same time that I could not undertake to consider it favourably. I am afraid I cannot go back from what I said then, and I consider it undesirable to accept the amendment. This measure is based by the Government upon an intelligible principle: that is to say, that works which had been paid for out of annual rates are not to be left out of consideration in fixing the basis of the rate on the average of the last ten years. The noble Lord will himself see that it would be very difficult otherwise for the Sheriffs to see on what basis they are to proceed in dealing with capital account for the purpose of fixing the stereotyped rate. Of course the capital account may include very large and very small works, and it would be very difficult for the Sheriff to decide what ought to be placed in the annual rate for the county, and what in his judgment ought to be spread over a term of years and paid for with borrowed money. I think the Sheriffs would be in a difficult position, be almost impossible for them to find the basis they should use for the stereotyped amount. If the Government in this Bill only works paid for with borrowed money shall be exempted from the stereotyped rate, the measure is based upon a broad and intelligible principle, and I think that any other would create difficulty in the amount being fixed by the Sheriff.

*THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: The argument now used by the noble Marquess is precisely the same as he used the other night, and which, after a great deal of discussion, he was obliged to admit was not a very strong one. I am afraid the course he has adopted will oblige me to take the equally objectionable course of repeating one or two of the observations I made the other night. I beg leave to say in answer to the noble Marquess when he says that the good in this measure lays down a broad and intelligible principle, that it does neither the one nor the other. No such principle in rating was ever heard of before, and if it could have been conceived possible that any such principle would have been adopted, no county would ever have thought of paying for public works by rate instead of by the ordinary course of borrowing. This proposal of the noble Marquess, if he insists upon it, will undoubtedly, as Lord Aberdeen considered in bringing forward his amendment, inflict considerable hardship in more than one county in Scotland. As I understand, the noble Marquess challenges me to explain the possibility of the Sheriff being able to calculate how much of a certain sum which has been expended as capital ought to be apportioned to each year. Is not this a very simple way? Suppose the question is with regard to some county building which has involved an outlay of £4,000 or £5,000 paid by rate levied instead of by borrowing in the ordinary way. The noble Marquess knows just as well as I do the ordinary terms of borrowing for such purposes; it might be fixed at 20 years or 30 years, or at an amendment; but still when one hears of reconsideration one hopes for something in that direction. To admit on one night that one's argument is barren and to say that the matter will be reconsidered, and then to simply repeat that argument to the House on another night, is not a course which is very gratifying to those proposing an amendment.

THE MARQUESS OF LOTHIAN: I must deny altogether that I said my argument was either a bad or a weak one. When I said I would consider the matter again, it was only after pressure had been put upon me. In deference to the wish expressed by noble Lords on either side of the House I said I would do so, but I expressly said that I could not promise to consider it favourably. The noble Lord has not grappled with one of the main difficulties. He has taken a particular instance of county buildings, and he said, as I understood, that the expenditure upon that one place might be easily dealt with by the Sheriffs spreading it over the ten years. I admit there would not be much difficulty if one had only to deal with one class of expenditure; but, as I stated just now, there are many other kinds of expenditure which would come under this head. No doubt many counties would like to put a large amount of their expenditure under it. Questions with reference to reformatories, police stations, and others of that kind had been raised, and if once the proposition of the noble Lord is admitted, similar questions will be raised by others. The question at once arises, How low down in the scale of expenditure is the Sheriff to go in fixing the capital expenditure of the county. I have already said that the whole proposal of the Bill is based upon a broad and intelligible principle, and upon that ground I must decline to accept the noble Lord's suggestion.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: I think it would not be impossible to meet the difficulty in some cases of expenditure out of capital; but I am bound to say that I attach very little importance to this point, and I do so because in my opinion the whole of these rates fall really on owners and not on occupants. It has been the custom in Scotland to make most of the rates payable half by the owner and half by the occupant; but, under the present system of letting, the whole must ultimately fall on the owners. The rates levied during existing contracts will fall upon the occupants. I approve of the system of half-rates upon owners and occupiers, and if it prevailed in England I think it would convince a good many persons who entertain rather curious views upon these matters, for ultimately the whole of these rates come out of the rent.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee, read:

THE MARQUESS OF LOTHIAN: My Lords, in moving that the House resolve itself into Committee upon this Bill, I should like to say a few words upon it, as by your Lordships' permission the other night I made no remark on the Bill. I shall say very little, because the Universities (Scotland) Bill, which I introduced last year into this House was, after most careful consideration by your Lordships, and alteration in many particulars, read a third time; but, owing to the lateness of the period of the Session at which the Bill left the House, it was impossible for the House of Commons to consider it then. Under the circumstances I think I am justified in considering that your Lordships are perfectly aware of the object, and principles of this Bill. I think the most practical way of asking your Lordships to consider the Bill which was read a second time the other night, is to look at it as if had been considered during one Session of Parliament, and that the Amendments which have been made to it in the House of Commons during this Session are Amendments on the Bill as it was passed by your Lordships' House last year. The Bill introduced into the House of Commons was almost identical in every important particular with that which passed your Lordships'

House last year. There was one slight alteration made with reference to the constitution of the University of St. Andrew's, another as to the constitution of the Commission, and another with reference to the Botanical Gardens and Observatory in Edinburgh. They were taken out of the financial portions of the Bill. I cannot refrain from expressing now, on the part of the Government—as I see the noble Earl, to whom we are indebted in the matter, on the cross-benches—the gratitude which is due to him for the generous gift which he has made of the whole of his magnificent observatory apparatus and library for the public use. With these few observations, I beg to move, “That the House do now resolve itself into Committee.”

*THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: My Lords, it is quite unnecessary to occupy your time with many remarks for the reasons just given by the noble Marquess who has moved this Bill. It corresponds very closely with the Bill which was introduced last year, on which so much attention was bestowed, but there are two or three points to which it is necessary to call attention. Your Lordships will bear in mind, while this Bill is passing through Committee, that it deals very thoroughly indeed with the University question, and introduces great changes. It deals with the whole question of the management of Universities, their property and revenues, as well as their discipline, touching, therefore, that which has been for all time in the hands of the Senatus Academicus. It takes the general control from the Senatus Academicus, and also places the power of making orders after the expiration of the Commission in the University Courts, on which the graduates of the Universities will be largely represented. It is important we should bear those facts in mind, with reference to various points to which your Lordships' attention will be called in Committee. With regard to the constitution of the Courts, there is one important change, and, as I think, a very considerable improvement. Last year it was proposed that nominees of the Crown should be appointed on the University Courts. As your Lordships know, considerable difference of opinion prevails on University questions between the two opposing parties, one of whom I may describe as the party of the Senatus Academicus, or the professorial body, and the other whom I can only describe by a name well understood in Scotland, although, perhaps, not a very classical name, that is, the extra-mural teachers. When the Crown took the power of appointing Assessors on the University Courts, it might have been very easily attempted to remedy any manifest disproportion which might exist between the relative powers of those two parties. I hold that the Crown ought not to be entrusted with a power of that sort, and last year exception was taken to those appointments in this House. I am glad to say that this year those appointments do not re-appear in the Bill. There is only one other point to which I will call your Lordships' attention now, and that is with reference to the composition of the Commission. Those who have taken an interest in the development of this Bill know perfectly well that last year the noble Marquess did everything in his power to obtain the very best and most representative Commission he could. He spoke to many members of this House about the matter, and, although he was not successful in persuading many who entertain very different opinions on this matter to take seats upon the Commission, it was not his fault that he did not obtain the most representative Commission. He did all he could. The only desire of the Scotch Office was to secure a thoroughly good Commission in order to obtain a body which would carry out the measure in a manner most acceptable to the people of Scotland. I regret that the names of some who would have been of great assistance are absent, but I think those who have been placed on the Commission add considerable strength to it. One thing may be said: both the University parties are this year represented upon the Commission. When you have two parties existing, and questions to be decided by a Commission as to which great difference of opinion prevails between them, there is only one alternative in dealing with the two parties which represent the opposite shades of opinion: they must be altogether omitted from the Commission, or a fair and adequate representation of each side must be given upon it. This year the latter course has been taken, and upon the whole I think it is a wise course, because it is now quite certain that the divergent opinions will be expressed at the Commission in the most complete and satisfactory manner; so that the general body of the Commissioners will be able to apply themselves to the consideration of the various questions, and it is absolutely certain that every question of interest arising will be discussed in the most intelligent and intelligible form. I think, therefore, in that way the Commission is improved. Perhaps, as my noble friend Lord Elgin is not present, I may say that I am glad he is to sit upon the Commission. With your Lordships' permission, I will reserve any further remarks I may have to make upon matters of detail until they arise in Committee.

Motion agreed to; House in Committee accordingly.

Clauses 1, 2, 3, and 4 agreed to.

*THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: In clause 5, at line 35, I propose to insert the word "Lord" before the words "Provost of Dundee." I merely wish to say a few words in support of my proposal. In the first place I am perfectly well aware that this is a proposition upon which it would not be possible for me to take the sense of the House, and therefore if the Government do not see their way to entertain it favourably, I do not feel disposed to press it. At the same time I think it is only right I should bring this question before the House. My Lords, in years long gone by, the Provost of Dundee was always styled "Lord-Provost." As your Lordships know Dundee played an important part throughout early Scottish history. In the days of Queen Mary the Lord Provost was appointed one of the Commissioners to arrange the marriage of the Queen in France. He was one of the Committee of the Lords upon the Articles sanctioning the Queen's demission of the Crown. He was also appointed Lord High Commissioner. During the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries petitions and applications to the Corporation were addressed "To the Lord Provost"; and that title was continued and was unanimously recognized by the Convention in 1692. A little later the Provostship was placed in Commission, and, when a new Provost was appointed, the ancient title was not renewed. But Her Majesty has lately been pleased to grant a Charter to Dundee, making it a royal city; and, therefore, I would suggest to the First Minister of the Crown, for his consideration whether it may not be possible for him to submit to Her Majesty the title, "Lord Provost of Dundee" with a view to the restoration of the title as used in former days.

Amendment moved, Clause 5, line 35, before the words "Provost of Dundee," to insert the word "Lord."—(The Earl of Camperdown.)

THE MARQUESS OF LOTHIAN: My Lords, I should be very sorry, while saying that I cannot assent to the proposal of the noble Earl, if it should be thought I do not recognize the antiquity of the office of Provost of Dundee, but it seems to me this is not the occasion or the place to confer such a title. It seems to me that the object of the noble Earl is, by a sort of side wind, to obtain for the Provost of Dundee a Parliamentary recognition of his claim to the title of Lord Provost. There are other towns in Scotland which at one time had no less right to the title Lord Provost for their chief authorities, but they no longer possess that right. Whether or not the Provost of Dundee ought to have the title of Lord Provost is not, I think, a question which ought to come before the House in this way. If that title is to be given him by Act of Parliament, it ought to be by some Act dealing directly with the privileges and position of the City of Dundee. I presume the question has arisen now in consequence of Dundee having lately been raised to the rank and position of a city; but that circumstance does not, ipso facto, give a right to the title and dignity of Lord Provost. I think there has been a little misapprehension on that point, and, therefore, I take this opportunity of making this statement. I do not at this moment say whether the Provost of Dundee has a right to the title Lord Provost or not; I only say this is not the way to raise the question upon a Bill dealing with an entirely different matter.

A Noble LORD: As the Provost of Dundee has been mentioned, I should like to ask the noble Marquess whether or not it is intended to give him a seat upon the University Court of St. Andrews, irrespective of the union of the University College of Dundee with the University of St. Andrews? Ought his seat to be made conditional upon the affiliation of the University College of Dundee to St. Andrews, or is he to have a seat on the University Court irrespective of such union?

THE MARQUESS OF LOTHIAN: The noble Lord has called attention to a point of some difficulty, because, under the constitution of the University Court of St. Andrew's, it was provided that the Provost of Dundee should have a seat upon that Court, but he would not have a seat unless the University College of Dundee was affiliated to the University of St. Andrew's. However, that can be provided for on the Third Reading, upon the Report.

LORD NAPIER AND ETTRICK: There is another matter. My attention was called to the constitution of the University of St. Andrew's by a noble Lord, not present to-night, who takes a lively interest in academical questions—Lord Powis. He pointed out to me that there was a discrepancy between the constitution of the University Court of St. Andrew's and those of all the other Universities. In the case of all the other Universities the Provost has a seat on the University Court, and that is so with regard to the University of St. Andrew's; but, in addition to that, in the other three Universities, the Provost, the Town Council, and the Magistrates have the right of appointing an Assessor. The object of making such a provision is to give the Municipal body a more sustained interest in academical affairs. Now, in the case of the University of St. Andrew's, the Provost and Town Council have not the right of appointing an Assessor. Perhaps, if both the Provost of St. Andrew's and the Provost of Dundee were on the Council, the Municipal element might be considered strong enough. Of course, the Provost's functions are of a transitory character. In some cases they may be elected, but in no case would they have the privilege of sitting for four years on the Council. I ask, then, why is there no power given for the appointment of an Assessor in the case of that University?

A Noble Lord

THE MARQUESS OF LOTHIAN: The answer is simple enough: it is because, in the case of the University of St. Andrew's, if this proposal is carried out, there will be two municipal representatives then of the town of St. Andrew's and the City of Dundee. In the case of the other Universities, there will be only two representatives of the municipality. If the noble Lord's proposition were to be accepted, in the case of St. Andrew's there would be no less than four representatives of the municipal body.

LORD NAPIER AND ETTRICK: They might be nominated alternatively.

THE MARQUESS OF LOTHIAN: That would import confusion into the Bill.

LORD NAPIER AND ETTRICK: Perhaps the noble Marquess will also consider that there is no certainty that the Provost of Dundee will ever sit upon the Council. However, I do not desire to press the point further.

THE EARL OF MORLEY: The question raised by the noble Lord who spoke previously was, whether the word "Lord" should be inserted before "Provost."

*THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: I withdrew the Amendment. I would only point out to the noble Marquess, with regard to what he has stated as to the Provost for the time being, that is dealt with by sub-section (g). I thought it was the intention of the Government to make the Provost of Dundee a member of the body of St. Andrew's University. That is very clearly expressed in the Affiliation Clause. In cases where the contrary was proposed, words were inserted in the Bill, saying that this should only be done when the College was affiliated to, and made to form part of, the University. If the noble Marquess does not intend the Provost of Dundee to be on the University Court, unless the Dundee College is affiliated to St. Andrew's University, he has simply to remove the name from where it stands now and place it in sub-section (c), either before or after the Principal of St. Mary's College. That would dispose of the difficulty.

THE MARQUESS OF LOTHIAN: I will take into consideration the point which has been suggested by the noble Lord.

LORD NAPIER AND ETTRICK: I am not out of order in asking another question upon this clause. This clause contemplates the creation of a number of Assessors who are to be nominated by many diverse authorities. I confess I do not distinguish from the language used whether it is absolutely obligatory on all those authorities to nominate the Assessors, or whether they have any discretionary power. If it is absolutely necessary that all those Assessors should be nominated, it seems to me some inconvenience might arise. It might occur that this duty of nominating Assessors will not, on some occasion or other, either by neglect, accident, or ill-will, be performed. If all the obligations in that respect were not performed at the right time, would the Court be then not legally constituted, and would its acts be invalidated or not? It seems to me it might be better to make the nomination of all those Assessors rather discretionary than obligatory. In general, they will undoubtedly be nominated, but on some occasion or other there might be a failure in the nomination at the right time. I merely want to know whether the nomination of all these Assessors is discretionary or obligatory, and whether their presence is absolutely necessary to constitute a University Court.

THE MARQUESS OF LOTHIAN: The noble Lord has asked two questions; one, Whether it is absolutely necessary that all the Assessors should be elected, or if a smaller number would be sufficient? and the other, Whether the University Court would be a properly constituted body even if the full number of Assessors were not elected to it? In answer to the first question, I will inform the noble Earl that it is not obligatory to elect the full number of Assessors, though I have no doubt that in all cases the full number would be elected. In answer to the second question, there is no doubt the University Court would be a properly constituted body, although there were vacancies upon it.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: I am now going to ask your Lordships to strike out the last sentence of the last sub-section of Clause 5, on page 4. It runs as follows:—"No member of the Senatus Academicus of any University shall be entitled to vote or take part in the election of any Assessor of the General Council of the University." The effect of this clause is to disfranchise the whole body of Professors of all the Universities in regard to voting for an Assessor representing the General Council of the University. I want to know what is the reason for such a proposal being inserted in the Bill. No such proposal was inserted in the Bill last year, or as it was introduced this year, and I think I shall be able to give your Lordships very good reasons why you should vote with me against this sub-section. In the first place I suppose the argument which will be used against me is this: That the members of the Senatus are already represented by three Assessors whom they themselves will vote for; and therefore, if they are graduates of the University, they ought not to vote for any further Assessors; and if they are not members of the Council they are all the more disqualified and unfit to vote for such assessors. Now, in the first place, I wish to point out that the number of those whom you propose to disfranchise is absolutely infinitesimal in comparison with the whole number of Graduates in the Universities. In St. Andrew's University the Members of the Senatus are 15 in number, and there are 1,508 members of the General Council; in the University of Glasgow the Senatus has 29 members, while there are 4,562 members of the Council; at Aberdeen there are 24 members of the Senatus, and 3,109 of the General Council; and at Edinburgh there are 41 members of the Senatus as compared with 6,100 members of the Council. In other words, there are members of the Senatus who, without this clause, would vote for these Assessors to the number of 109, as compared with 15,279 members of the General Councils; and this amendment, therefore, has been introduced solely for the purpose of disfranchising those 109 persons. It would not, of course, be fair if I were to state the case only in that way, because I ought to remind your Lordships that those 109 members of the Senatus would have an influence with regard to those elections considerably out of proportion to their mere numbers, because the whole 109 being connected with the teaching in the Universities, are necessarily present during the greater part of the year; and as there might be some difficulty in collecting a large number of the members of Council the votes of the 109 would be more important than their comparative numbers would seem to indicate. But, my Lords, I would ask what reason is there for a proposal of this sort? What had the Professors done? You are to single them out, and disfranchise them alone. You are not to treat the Provosts of the various University towns in the same way. The Provosts have seats upon the University Courts, and if they are members of the Council they will also vote for the Assessors who are sent to represent the Council. Besides that, in three cases out of four the provost will appoint an Assessor of his own, and he is therefore represented much more fully than these Professors. But you do not treat him or anybody else in the same way that you are treating these Professors. If colleges are affiliated to the University, and if the members of the Colleges are all members of the University, they will have a vote in this respect. So that it simply comes to this, that the Senatus is selected, and the Senatus alone to be disfranchised. I hope the House will consider the very great alteration which is made by this Bill in the relative powers of the Senatus and the University Court. I will again remind your Lordships that we have taken away from the Senatus the whole power of administration over the resources; we have given the Courts a general control over the proceedings of the Senatus, and therefore we have increased the power of the Court to a very large extent. But the Bill proposes as it now stands that we shall not be content with that; we are to go further and disfranchise the Senatus altogether. The insertion of this Clause seems to me to be a very great mistake. It was not in the Bill when first drafted. My Lords, it seems to me a very mean and petty proceeding, and I trust your Lordships will strike out this Clause.

*LORD WATSON: My Lords, I must express my sympathy with the motion now made to the House, whether it be successful or no. I can quite understand the principle of disfranchising Professors who sit in the University Courts, but why should you disfranchise Professors who do not sit in the University Courts? Even then, I should not object to legislation in this direction if it were general, and not personal and invidious. This Bill contemplates that there shall be brought into the University affiliated Colleges which are to be represented in the University Court. Every teacher in those Colleges is left at liberty to vote for an Assessor in the General Council, but not one of the Professors in the University is permitted to do the same. I have not yet heard any reason why that invidious distinction should be made between the two bodies. I should have thought that upon the rationale of the question, the weightier reasons would be in favour of the Professors, and for this reason: that the Universities of Scotland owe their distinction in the past, and will owe any success which they may have in the future, not to the provisions of any Bill of this character, however useful they may be, and I admit their usefulness to the full, but upon the character and the attainments of the Professors who constitute the Senatus.

THE MARQUESS OF LOTHIAN: My Lords, I cannot help saying that I am sorry the noble Earl has thought it right to introduce this Amendment; because the form in which he has put it (and I admit that the arguments he has used are very strong) makes it appear that the Government by this proposal in the Bill desires to put an invidious distinction upon the Professors, but I need not say that is very far indeed from the intention of the Government. In the University Courts the Senatus Academicus are fully represented by the four Assessors. The Senatus Academicus elects four Assessors, and the Council also elects four Assessors. As I understand, what the noble Earl contends is, that this puts a slur in some way upon the professorial element.

*THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: And upon them alone.

*THE MARQUESS OF LOTHIAN: Upon them alone; that they are debarred from voting as members of the General Council. It is possible there may be differences of opinion upon matters affecting the University between the Assessors who represent the General Council and the Assessors who represent the Senatus Academicus. I do not like to look forward to any such differences, but it is possible they may arise, and I cannot help thinking it is a provision your Lordships will accept which secures that while the Senatus Academicus has a larger representation than by the Bill of last year, not only in actual numbers, but in proportion, they should not have a vote for the Assessors as members of the General Council. I really do not know how to answer the noble Earl when he says this is a provision which is invidious to the Professors; still less do I know how to answer Lord Watson's remark, from which he appears to think that the Government do not recognise to the full what the Universities have owed to the Professors in the past, and how much the success of the Universities will be due to them in the future. But the Government wish to draw no such distinction. They do recognise most absolutely, and to the full, that the entire success of the Universities must depend upon the professional body. But there was one point advanced by the noble Earl which rather tells against his own argument. He pointed out, and very truly, that the professorial vote, if allowed to them as members of the General Council, would be infinitesimal. I would ask, is it worth while when the Bill comes up from the House of Commons in this form to raise this question, which is really a question of sentiment? Really, it is nothing more than a question of sentiment; because the noble Earl has himself shown that the voting power of the Professors on the General Council would be almost nil; that is to say, it would come practically to about 1 in 150. My Lords, I am afraid I cannot accept the Amendment of the noble Earl, but, in declining to accept it, I repeat that I most absolutely repudiate the idea of a slur of any kind being put upon the not the question. The question is, what the Bill does, in fact. It is no use telling a man that you do not intend to cast a slur upon him if you disfranchise him. The Professors ask why this has been done. It was not done when the Bill first came into the House dealing with the position of all these various parties and Universities. If the Government intends to inaugurate a system of counting up votes, and to say that so-and-so will have so many votes in a particular assembly, and, therefore, that they have no right to complain if they are not allowed to vote for the Assessors, I think they have set themselves an impossible task, and a task which I do not think Parliament either can, or ought to, undertake. I wish to remind your Lordships again that, by this Bill, great power is given to the University Courts and to the General Council. It is not a question whether there is any intention to cast a slur or not, but it is a question whether it is not a wrong step, a very wrong course indeed, as it is a most invidious thing, to take away the votes of these Professors. I am very sorry to be forced to take the sense of the House upon the matter, but I am afraid I must do so.

Amendment, Clause 5, page 4, line 39, to omit the words, "No member of the Senatus Academicus of any University shall be entitled to vote or take part in the election of any Assessor of the General Council of the University."

On Question, "That those words stand part of the Clause," their Lordships divided:—Contents, 24; Not-contents, 8.

*THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: My Lords, I propose, in Clause 8, to leave out the words "University Court," and to substitute the word "Commissioners." The object of the Amendment is this: As the Clause now stands, it will be necessary, on the 1st February every year, for the University Court to fix the Governors of the General Council. Should there be any points of difference, it merely means that you will give facilities for raising and reviewing them, by each year fixing the number of the quorum of your General Council. I propose that the number should be fixed by the Commissioners, and the result would be that, in the future, if any one wished to make an alteration in the General the Court were disposed to do so, the thing would be done. It is very desirable there should be the means of raising questions every year. Then, of course, by a subsequent Clause in the Bill, after the expiration of the Commissioners' functions, it is in the power of the Court to pass any necessary ordinance.

THE MARQUESS OF LOTHIAN: I am not quite sure that the number fixed by the University Court, as proposed by the noble Earl, would not remain in perpetuity.

*THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: In Clause 21 it says they shall have the power of altering or revoking any ordinance framed and passed under the Act of 1858, and of making new orders.

THE MARQUESS OF LOTHIAN: I do not think that would come under the new ordinance. I think they would be absolutely unalterable. However, I will consider the matter.

*THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: May I ask the noble Marquess whether he will give it his favourable consideration?

THE MARQUESS OF LOTHIAN: I cannot say that I will give it favourable consideration, but I will give it consideration.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

SUCK DRAINAGE BILL.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That, in the case of the Suck Drainage Bill, Standing Orders 84, 214, 215, and 239 be suspended, and that the Bill be now taken into consideration, provided that amended prints shall have been previously deposited."—(Mr. Herbert Gardner).

MR. STOREY (Sunderland): There was a public Bill for the drainage of the Suck recently before the House. That Bill has been withdrawn, and now we are to have a private Bill considered upon the Suspension of the Standing Orders. It is a Bill of an extraordinary character. It is not, in a right sense, a private Bill at all. It was originally a public Bill, but in the process of being passed through this House it has been transformed into a private Bill, and a private Bill of the very worst type. There has been inserted in it a clause empowering the Government to hand over to private speculators a sum of £50,000 of the public money.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, University of Dublin): No.

MR. STOREY: As I understand the Bill, it was originally a measure to enable a body of persons who had commenced operations for the drainage of the River Suck to continue those operations. The promoters, consisting principally of landowners, obtained some years ago power to carry out these works and to obtain the money from the Government by loan. When they proceeded with the work, that happened to them which has happened to every similar body in Ireland—they found that the estimates placed before them were woefully and hopelessly inadequate: All the money has been spent, and now they come to Parliament for extended powers. The Government introduced a public Bill to enable them to grant £50,000 out of the public funds, but under the stress of the opposition which it met, the Bill was withdrawn, and now a clause empowering the Government to give the £50,000 has been, or is to be, inserted in the present Bill.

Mr. MADDEN: No.

Mr. STOREY: The hon. Gentleman says "No." Then how is it intended to get this money? Every one knows that if this sum of £50,000 is not given in a free grant it will be impossible to go on with the works. The money is absolutely necessary, and the Government have hit upon this excellent plan of granting it. They were conscious that they would be unable to pass a public Bill this year, and they, therefore, support this private Bill in which they propose to insert a clause guaranteeing as a free gift this sum of £50,000 of the public money.

Mr. MADDEN: No.

Mr. STOREY: Then what is the object of the clause? If this were a private Drainage Bill under which the promoters proposed to carry out the works at their own expense or under existing Acts I should not have felt it necessary to take any objection. The fact is that the promoters have begun the work; they have expended a large sum of money, and they find that the effect produced has been absolutely nil. So far it has done more harm than good, and unless they can get more money than was originally asked for the whole of their works will be useless. Clause 5 of the amended disely the form to which the hon. Member takes no objection. It is a Bill for the raising of capital, and it provides for the due representation of the persons interested upon the Drainage Board.

Mr. STOREY: I am obliged to the right hon. Gentleman for his explanation. I have no doubt that the Bill, from his point of view, is an innocent Bill, but from my point of view it shows the trail of the serpent. It proposes that the Government shall have power to lend £115,000 to these gentlemen, but the Government know and the House ought to know that admittedly that sum is not sufficient for the purpose. But if this Bill passes it is intended to bring in a further Bill of a single clause empowering the Government to give an additional sum of £50,000. This may be an exceedingly clever proceeding, but it is one to which I take a serious objection, and I beg to move as an Amendment that standing order No. 84 be struck out of the Motion.

Sir G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy): The ways of this House are extremely wonderful. About five minutes ago I went to the office of the House to get a copy of the Bill, and I found in it a clause to the effect that the taxpayers of this country are to pay £50,000 towards the expenses of this Suck Drainage. Therefore, hon. Members, cannot be blamed if they have been misled and knew nothing of this clause, having been struck out. I am reminded very much of what happened in the American War. Armed cruisers were fitted up, but the guns were not put on board, they were sent out from this country perfectly innocent cruisers, but they met the guns somewhere else and took them on board. That seems to me to be precisely the nature of this Bill: The Government want to smuggle this dangerous cruiser through the custom house of the House of Commons, and then put the guns on board in another stage. In that case all criticism in regard to the Bill will be evaded. The Government have learned their lesson with regard to the public Bill, and now they want to avoid criticism. It appears to me to be hardly a fair way of dealing with the matter. None of us knew of the existence of such a proposal, and it was only by accident we were warned that such a measure was to be brought forward. So far from the Bill being an innocent measure, I look upon it as a cruiser which is to be armed hereafter, and I shall, therefore, second the Amendment.

Amendment proposed, to leave out "84."—(Mr. Storey.)

Question proposed, "That '84' stand part of the Question."

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): This is really a very simple Bill, and although the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Storey) has called it clever, I look upon it as an honest and straightforward proceeding. What has happened is this: A number of proprietors have established the Suck Drainage Board. They have spent £100,000 and the whole value of the works will disappear and the money be absolutely lost unless something further is done. There can be no doubt that great good has been done to the low lying lands by the works already constructed. The people of the district have spent £100,000 and the Government is asked to give £50,000. The time for the hon. Member for Sunderland to raise an objection is when the Government come forward to give this £50,000 as a free grant. The hon. Member seems to think that the Government have done something dreadfully wrong in dropping a public Bill and allowing the promoters to bring in a private Bill, but he forgets that he himself offered such an amount of opposition to the public Bill that it was impossible at this period of the Session to pass it. I sincerely trust that the House will not allow the Bill, which is a perfectly innocent measure, to be rejected because the Government may hereafter be called upon to contribute £50,000.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): The hon. Member for Kirkcaldy said that the ways of this House are perfectly wonderful. So are the ways of some hon. Members in the House. Last year when the Ulster Canal Bill was before the House the right hon. Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld) was mainly instrumental in handing over to a private company a sum of £300,000 against the wishes of the Irish Members, and I now ask that the same measure should be meted out to the promoters of the present Bill. In this case we have a body of landowners who have already expended their own money—a good deal of it foolishly no doubt—asking for a Government Grant. Why should they not have it? This country has robbed Ireland long enough, and it is high time that we got a little of our money back again. I fail to see why hon. Members should now be straining at a gnat after having swallowed a camel in connection with the Ulster Canal. In my opinion, this is a most excellent Bill, and it is the first time in the history of the landlords of Ireland that they have proposed to give representation to the ratepayers. During the last 90 years this country has taken 300 or 400 million sterling out of Ireland, and we are now simply trying to get £50,000 of it back again. I quite agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) that unless we drain the Shannon it is of very little use to drain the Suck, but the engineers are of a different opinion, and I am ready to place my drainage conscience, if there is such a commodity, in their hands.

*THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E): As the House is aware, the Government originally brought in a Bill dealing with the drainage of the Suck. We have now withdrawn that Bill, and in lieu of it a private Bill has been brought in. I am aware that great objection was raised in various quarters to the Government scheme, but perhaps the same objections do not apply to this measure. A very large amount of money has already been expended upon the drainage of the Suck; a considerable number of labourers are at this moment engaged upon the works, and unless this Bill passes this Session that money will have been wasted and the works must be stopped.

MR. STOREY: What amount of money has been spent by the promoters?

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: £100,000.

MR. STOREY: Which was borrowed from the Government?

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Yes, borrowed from the Government. But the labourers who are now engaged will be turned off, and if at any future time Parliament should decide upon resuming the construction of these works it can only be done at a great loss. We cannot leave the works half finished without squandering the money which has been spent already. I, therefore, hope that all who have the interest of Ireland at heart will support the Bill.

Sir G. Campbell

MR. PHILIPPS (Lanark, Mid): The hon. Member for North Longford (Mr. T. Healy) complains of something that was done last Session in reference to the Ulster Canal Bill, but we supported him on that occasion, and I think it is rather hard that we should be subjected to his reproaches now. Originally four Drainage Bills were introduced by the Government this Session, and the Chief Secretary has done his best to slip one of them through. He put down a notice that they were to be referred to a Select Committee, but the Bann Drainage Bill was the only one submitted to the Committee, although the Committee took it for granted that the other three would be brought before them in due course. I cannot, therefore, understand why this attempt should be made to slip one of these Bills through the House when there is a Committee in existence to whom the whole subject was referred. The right hon. Gentleman says that if the Bill is not passed the money already expended will be wasted, but that will be the fault of the Government themselves, because they might have taken these Drainage Bills in the week which was devoted to the consideration of the Royal Grants. Under these circumstances, it is too bad for the Government to come forward at this period of the Session and attempt to throw on us the responsibility of wasting the money which has already been expended. I do not think that the money has been spent for any useful object at all. Most of the money which has been spent in the improvement of the Irish rivers has been absolutely thrown away. I see that hundreds of thousands of pounds have been spent on the Bann drainage works, while the total receipts are £70 a year, and it costs £1,100 a year to keep them up. I think the House will be wisely to reject this Bill altogether.

MR. HAYDEN (Leitrim, S.): So far as drainage operations are concerned, I believe that, since the composition of the Board was changed two years ago, they have been carried out to the satisfaction of all the parties concerned. If the Bill is not passed, the money already expended will be lost, and a number of labourers will be turned out. Under all the circumstances, I think it is better that we should accept the money which the Government offer to give.

*DR. COMMINS (Roscommon, S.): I wish to add my testimony to the useful nature of these works. The Bill as it stands pledges the credit of the rate-payers for the money, and it is, perhaps, the first instance in which landlords and tenants have cordially united in an effort of local government. They are endeavouring to help themselves, and have already pledged their credit to the extent of £100,000, which they will have to pay whether the money is lost or not. I believe that if the grant proposed to be given by the Government is sanctioned by this House, the whole of the money already expended will prove remunerative. I am by no means in favour of subsidies, but in this case, it is to be given in support of a well meant effort to improve the condition and cultivation of the district, in which parties of all shades of political feeling have joined.

MR. STOREY: I should like to have your ruling, Sir, upon a point of order. Upon the Order Paper to-day, No. 21, is "Suck Drainage [Provision of Funds]: Committee thereupon." The object is to pass a Resolution for the purpose of bringing in a Bill to provide the £50,000 which is to be granted to the promoters of this Bill. What I wish to know is whether it is in order to take this Bill into consideration until that Resolution has been passed?

*MR. SPEAKER: That Resolution has no reference to the present Bill, and there is nothing out of order in taking a Bill into consideration.

MR. STOREY: Standing Order No. 81 requires that the Chairman of Committee of Ways and Means shall make a Report to the House previously to the Second Reading of any private Bill by which it is intended to authorise, confirm, or alter a contract with any Department of the Government whereby any charge upon the Imperial Exchequer may be created. And any Resolution to that effect must be circulated, with the Votes, two clear days at least before being considered by a Committee of the whole House. Although this Bill does not authorise, confirm, or alter a contract, it is a private Bill, the object and aim of which is to create a charge of £50,000 upon the Imperial Exchequer. In this case there has been no Report from the Chairman of Committee of Ways and Means and no Resolution.

*MR. SPEAKER: There is nothing in the Order to which the hon. Member refers which renders it out of order to proceed with this private Bill. The question before the House is the Suspension of the Standing Orders, so that the Bill may be considered.

MR. COURTNEY: The hon. Gentleman has cast a reflection upon the manner in which I have discharged my duty, but he has himself admitted that there is no contract touched upon in the Bill which required a Report. The Bill is absolutely independent and complete in itself. It is an ordinary Drainage Bill, and as such has passed through Committee, and is now awaiting consideration. I understand that, if possible, the Government propose to pass through the House another Bill, but it will be a totally distinct Bill, and will have the effect, if passed, of giving to this Drainage Board a grant of £50,000. It is quite evident that if that Bill does not pass the Drainage Board will be unable to complete their operations. I do not offer an opinion one way or the other. I am only pointing out that this Bill is complete in itself.

MR. STOREY: Upon the point of order I contend that the object of this Bill is to "alter" an existing arrangement with a view of throwing a pecuniary burden upon the public.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): It was resolved, some years ago, that in connection with these drainage works a sum of £100,000 should be expended not by the Imperial Exchequer, but by a local levy. It would, perhaps, have been preferable that the matter should have been dealt with by a public Bill, but that being impossible a private Bill has been introduced. I do not think that the House ought at this stage to disregard the opinion of the Committee to whom the Bill has been referred. If it could be shown not only that the money already expended has been wasteful and useless, but that it would be wasteful to expend more, there would be a case against the Bill, but it has not been contended that the additional expenditure now proposed will fail to make the former expenditure effectual.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): I hope that the House will not pass the Bill. We have been informed that the measure is wholly independent in itself.

So are the letters of the alphabet. J is simply a letter and so are O and B; but J O B spells job. The provisions of the Bill are to be coupled with a grant of £50,000 out of the pockets of the taxpayers, and, therefore, they cannot be looked upon as independent in themselves. We are told that this is an admirable work, but the promoters have not afforded us an opportunity of judging whether that is so or not. The promoters say that the works will be useless if this Bill is not passed. It is not a matter of much consequence whether that is so or not, because they cannot be of any permanent advantage.

MR. BIGGAR (Cavan, W.): We are told that if the Government give £50,000 the work already done will not be lost. I presume that is on the principle of throwing good money after bad. It is further said that the works were badly managed by the old engineer, but that there is a new engineer now, and the works will be better carried out. But we have no guarantee, as far as I can see, that the new man will be any better than the old. All we know of the old engineer is that he failed, and there is every reason to suppose that the new man will fail also. I believe that the engineer was guilty of an act of great folly. Instead of commencing at the mouth of the sea, he commenced at the upper end of the Suck, with the certainty that the obstructions and floods would be far greater than they were before.

*MR. PIERCE MAHONY (Meath, N.): Only this week I had reason to put a question to the Government in regard to moneyspent in connection with harbour works at Fenit, County Kerry, directly contrary to the instructions of the Lord Lieutenant, under which ratepayers were induced to give a guarantee, and I was informed that although the Government admit the misapplication of funds in this instance still they can suggest no remedy. Under these circumstances, until the Government can find some means of securing the proper application of money granted I shall vote against this and every similar Bill.

The House divided:—Ayes 14
Noes 49.—(Div. List, No. 287.)

Main Question again proposed.

Mr. STOREY: I believe that I should be in order in moving the omission of the other Standing Orders. I do not propose to take that course, but I shall divide the House against the Motion.

The House divided:—Ayes 151; Noes 50.—(Div. List, No. 288.)

Bill considered.

Mr. STOREY: I think that we, who have taken a consistent course in regard to these Drainage Bills, have good reason to complain of the conduct of the Government in persisting with this Bill, after having abandoned the Shannon and the Barrow Bills.

*Mr. SPEAKER: Does the hon. Member intend to move an Amendment?

Mr. STOREY: I intend to move the omission from Clause 25 of the words "one hundred and fifteen," in order to insert the words "sixty-five," my object being to provide an adequate sum for the works in question, inasmuch as the Government themselves have declared that they cannot be completed under £165,000.

*Mr. SPEAKER: It is not competent for the hon. Member to widen the scope of the Bill by increasing the amount provided for in the measure.

Mr. STOREY: In that case it will answer my purpose just as well to move to reduce the amount.

*Mr. SPEAKER: It will be for the House to consider whether such an Amendment as the hon. Member has the expenditure will come out of the Public Exchequer. Some day it may be repaid; but if so, it will be a very exceptional experience. Unless the Government grant £50,000 in addition the works cannot be carried out. £100,000 out of the £115,000 have already been expended, and the only effect of this Bill, without the Government grant, will be to throw away £15,000 more of the public money. In the interests of the Public Purse, and altogether careless of the estimate which the Treasury Bench may place upon my proceeding, I intend to resist this Bill as far as I can, believing that it is vicious in itself, and that the Government are attempting by a side wind to avoid a discussion of the matter. I had no intention of trifling with the House.

*Mr. SPEAKER: What I said was that the House would judge whether the Amendment was not a trifling Amendment. The hon. Member moved, in the first place, to increase the amount, and he now moves to diminish it. Will the hon. Member state what his precise Amendment is?

Mr. STOREY: I move to reduce the sum from £115,000 to £100,000. I said I would do so as a matter of Parliamentary tactics, and in order to show that the financial provision in the Bill is inadequate unless it is supplemented by a free grant from Parliament. I beg to move the omission of the words "and fifteen."

Amendment proposed, in page 5, line 24 and 29, to leave out the words "and fifteen."—(Mr. Storey)

Question proposed, "That the words 'and fifteen' stand part of the Bill."

COLONEL NOLAN: It is difficult to follow the arguments of the hon. Member for Sunderland. I thought he was going to lend us too much money; but towards the middle of his speech he changed his intention, and suggested that we should have received £100,000 instead of £115,000. I know the hon. Member says he has made the Motion as a mere matter of form; but his mere matter of form might have the effect of throwing a large number of men out of work. Of course, it is as well the hon. Gentleman should be allowed to air his eloquence. What is the use of the hon. Member being eloquent if he has not occasionally an opportunity of airing it?

But the hon. Gentleman has majorities of 98 and 101 against him. It is perfectly clear that the House want to pass this private Bill, and by what he is doing the hon. Gentleman can only succeed in wasting the time of the House and prolonging the discussion. He has put his case very well; with such an extremely bad case, I wonder he could do so well. I can understand the House refusing Ireland money or refusing it a particular Bill; but for a small minority to prevent the Government bringing forward a proposition which they think they ought to do in justice to Ireland, is hardly treating the weaker country fairly.

*SIR J. SWINBURNE (Staffordshire, Lichfield): May I ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the interest on the public money expended on the Shannon has been paid regularly?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): If the hon. Gentleman will give notice of his question, I will endeavour to give him an answer.

MR. CHANCE: I have to congratulate the hon. and gallant Gentleman upon his championship of the rights of a majority, but I think his observations would have come with better grace from a Gentleman who was in the habit of being one of the majority. I have also to congratulate him in his startling novelty. I heard with surprise the hon. and gallant Member say he was afraid the House would grant Ireland too much money. I say without fear of contradiction that that is the very first time the hon. and gallant Member has been troubled with scruples upon the point. I have never known him afraid that too much money would be granted upon these semi-charitable, and, I may say, semi-jobbing works. I do not think the Amendment is a frivolous one, and I am strengthened in that belief by the fact that when, on the Estimates, some one desires to object to the insufficiency of the amount granted, the only thing he can do is to move that the Vote be reduced.

*MR. SPEAKER: I must ask the hon. Gentleman to discuss the particular Amendment before the House.

MR. CHANCE: That was what I was attempting to do—

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

Colonel Nolan

MR. CHANCE: The case of the hon. Member for Sunderland is a very simple one: it is that it is unsafe to give power to borrow £115,000, and he sees a lesser danger in permitting £100,000 rather than £115,000 to be borrowed. I will not say more, but simply content myself by declaring that I propose to support the hon. Member for Sunderland, whether my reasons commend themselves or not to the House.

*DR. COMMINS: There is a consideration in favour of this Bill which seems to have been overlooked. It is evidently forgotten that all these works are embankment works. The Suck runsthrough peat moss, and great mischief is done by it overflowing its banks. Crops are destroyed, and disease often disseminated. In order to provide against such a state of things, the works so far have been mainly embankment works. The money spent will be lost unless the works are completed. The House is called upon to make a beneficial work complete, and prevent it from being what it will otherwise be—a source of danger. In fact, if the work already undertaken is not made complete, it will be a curse instead of a blessing to the people of the neighbourhood, as an overflow, if it should happen, would be all the worse for it. It is upon this that I shall support the Bill.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: In the course of a somewhat long life spent in administration I have heard a great deal of what the hon. and learned Gentleman has just told us. A great deal of money has been spent in embankment works, and no good done. I object to these works being undertaken at the expense of the taxpayers.

MR. PHILIPPS: The hon. and gallant Member for Galway said the House was very anxious for this Bill. I do not know what there is to make the House anxious for the Bill, because this is the first opportunity we have had of discussing the Bill in the House, while no statement has ever been made on behalf of the Bill. It has been said that if a great deal more money is not spent on the drainage of the Suck, the money that has already been spent will be absolutely wasted. But then, as far as I can understand, it is admitted on all sides that, to complete the drainage of the Suck, not £115,000, but £165,000 is required. If £115,000 is not enough to finish the drainage of the river, I do not suppose we shall do much perceptible harm if we reduce the sum to £100,000. The hon. and gallant Member also said it is only a small minority who oppose this Bill; but let me point out that it is a growing minority. Last year one of these Drainage Bills was opposed by only three Members, but now most of the hon. Members who sit on this side go into the Lobby in opposition to this Bill. The hon. and learned Member for Roscommon said that disease is generated and crops are destroyed by the overflowing of the river. But surely all these facts ought to be put before the House. Some Member of the Government should put these facts before us in an authoritative way. This Bill has been introduced in a private way, and by it we are asked to lend money for an object in favour of which not a single argument has ever been advanced by anyone in a position of authority.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Should I be in order, Mr. Speaker, in making the Motion the right hon. Member for Halifax made on July 2, 1888?

*MR. SPEAKER: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. and learned Gentleman, but I have used a strong expression from the Chair. I remain of the same opinion; but I think it would perhaps be well to allow the House to take a Division upon the Amendment in the ordinary course before the House.

The House divided:—Ayes 182; Noes 56. (Div. List, No. 289.)

MR. PHILIPPS: I now beg to move the omission of Sub-section (a) of Clause 6. We have not heard a word from any Member of the Government, or from any member of the Select Committee, as to the additional value which is to be given to the lands specially benefited by this drainage scheme. If the drainage is going to improve the value of the lands specially benefited, why should not these lands pay the whole expense of the scheme? Sub-section (a) charges the sum of £13,000 upon a certain contributory area. I do not want to be unfair. I do not want to charge the whole of the cost on the lands specially benefited, unless those lands are going to receive large benefits. Perhaps some one will tell us what was the evidence taken before the Select Committee, and at what amount the improvement of the lands specially benefited was assessed? Of course, if I receive a satisfactory reply I shall be ready to withdraw my Amendment.

Amendment proposed, in page 4, line 34, to leave out Sub-section (a) of Clause 6.—(Mr. Philipps.)

Question proposed, "That Sub-section (a) of Clause 6 stand part of the Bill."

MR. CHANCE: I think that before we divide upon this Amendment we should have some explanation as to the incidence of the charges.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: May I point out that these are questions which were dealt with in Committee, and that if our private Bill legislation is to have any value, we must assent to the verdict of the Committees? It is impossible for this House to go into details and the grounds upon which the conclusions of Committees were arrived at. It must be obvious to the House that if we debate here the details of every private Bill, it will be utterly impossible for the House to conduct its private legislation and any legislation whatever.

MR. STOREY: I think that is a fair contention to make in the case of ordinary Bills. The point we make is that we ought to have an opportunity of discussing the details of these Drainage Bills when we are called upon to give £50,000 as a free grant; but that owing to the peculiar methods adopted by the Government, we shall be prevented from discussing the details. There will simply be a clause granting £50,000 for the Suck drainage, and on that clause it will be impossible to discuss the details. We cannot permit such Bills as this to pass without opposition. As to the particular point before the Committee, our contention is similar to that we urged on the other Bill. We hold that if there are advantages accruing directly to certain lands, those lands should be required to bear the cost of the works, and that you should not go to other lands which benefit merely because they are in the locality and compel them to bear part of the expense. That is our contention, and it is a contention which, if we had been in Committee on the original measure, we should have sustained by prolonged argument. We admit the difficulty of considering these points in a private Bill, but the blame does not rest with us; it rests with the Treasury Bench, and the Treasury Bench alone. The right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury has not defended it, and if the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary were present he would not defend this particular provision. The only reason for its adoption is that they find it extremely hard to raise the money, and they try all sorts of Irish devices for raising it instead of adopting the old-fashioned Irish method—the method practised before Ireland was debauched by England—of making those who benefit pay for the benefit they receive.

MR. COURTNEY: This Bill came before me in the ordinary way as an unopposed Bill, and all its details were considered. It would have been in the power of hon. Members who object to the measure to oppose it, but it was not opposed and was committed like every other ordinary unopposed private Bill. The hon. Member (Mr. Storey) may stake his head as much as he likes, but he cannot alter the fact by so doing. The hon. Gentlemen in charge of the Bill and the Speaker's Counsel came before me to consider the details of the Bill which were dealt with in the ordinary way. With regard to the particular Amendment now before the Committee there is a distinction drawn between lands drained and benefited and land benefited though not drained; but there is no doubt that the works under the Bill will have a beneficial effect on the slopes above the actual drainage area. The hon. Gentleman shakes his head again, whether at the principle I state or at the facts to which I have referred I do not know. I should have thought the principle commends itself to everyone, and as to the facts they were proved before me. Due notice was given of the Bill by advertisement in the district interested, and if there had been any objection to the scheme opposition would have been offered; but there was no opposition. The locality at large must be taken as assenting to the Bill, in so far as they showed no dissent. It may be impossible by arguments or facts to convince those who have made up their minds not to be convinced; but, at any rate, the conduct of the Bill before me was perfectly regular.

Mr. Storey

SIR G. CAMPBELL: This Bill, as the right hon. Gentleman says, was treated as an unopposed Bill; consequently, there was no real discussion on it. We are told that we could have opposed it at an earlier stage, but we knew nothing about it. It was smuggled through Committee. ["No, no."]

MR. COURTNEY: Then everything is smuggled through Committee.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: Opportunity was given for private individuals to oppose the Bill if injuriously affected by it, but this measure affects the pockets of the British taxpayer, which is a very different thing. The Bill has been described as a conjunction of the letters "J O B"—job—but to my mind, it is something more than a job—it is a dodge. Advantage has been taken of a private measure to get a principle through the House which could not be got through in a public Bill. These are the circumstances under which the Bill now appears before us, and I say we are amply justified in discussing its details. We had no opportunity of knowing what was going on in the Private Bill Committee; and though I have every respect for the opinion of the Chairman of Committees, I think I am not wrong in saying that when a Bill has gone before him as an unopposed Bill it is not his function to rise—

*MR. SPEAKER: I fail to see how the hon. Member's observations are relevant to the question before the House, which is that of security for the repayment of advances.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: That question is most important. I understand from the First Lord of the Treasury that no interest on the advances in connection with the Suck drainage has been paid—

*MR. W. H. SMITH: No such question was ever asked. The question was in regard to the Shannon drainage.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: Very well; I would now ask if any interest has been paid on the advances made for the Suck drainage. I am told the interest is owing; and if that is so, I say it would be wrong to permit these people to incur new liabilities while they have not discharged their old ones.

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (MR. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): I answer the hon. Gentleman's question

The money advanced has been advanced on the security of the property, that is to say, the property of the area drained, and I believe I am justified in saying that that security is quite ample in every respect.

Sir G. CAMPBELL: Has the interest due been paid?

Mr. JACKSON: If the hon. Gentleman will give me another moment I will satisfy his curiosity. Until the works have been completed or stopped—admittedly stopped—no award can be made of the charge which will come upon the different districts; and until that takes place the interest upon the sum already advanced accumulates. I am not aware that there is anything whatever unusual in that, therefore the objection now being offered to this Bill—[cries of "Oh!"]—well, if hon. Gentlemen do not like that word, the delay which is taking place in the passing of the Bill will delay the repayment of the money. The way to recover the money is to pass this Bill.

The House divided:—Ayes 197; Noes 60.—(Div. List, No. 290.)

Sir G. CAMPBELL: I beg to propose an Amendment at the end of Clause 6, which, I think, will be regarded as a very reasonable one. We all know that the interest of these advances has not been paid, but has, as it is emphatically called, been allowed to "accumulate." Under the circumstances I would move the Amendment which I have placed on the Paper.

Amendment proposed, in page 5, line 10, at the end of Clause 6, to insert the words—

"Provided that the interest on all moneys borrowed under the provisions of previous Acts, and secured on the same subjects, shall first be paid."—(Sir George Campbell.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

Colonel NOLAN: The Amendment is an utterly absurd one. There can be no payment until the award is made. After a drainage work is executed the engineer goes down and awards so much for each proprietor to pay. At present the proprietors do not know how much thrown out of work, and all the present evils increased.

Mr. STOREY: I should like to ask where is the absurdity of the Amendment? We are aware that there is to be an award, and that the individual proprietors will not know how much interest they have to pay till the award is made. But we do not ask individual proprietors to pay. We are dealing with the promoters of the Bill; and are promoters to come to the House and ask for loans and to be so impecunious as not to be able to pay the interest they owe? I ask the House to reflect on what they are doing. It is all very well to say that the interest for the last 10 years has never been apportioned; why if it is apportioned it will never be paid. We are going to carry this evil on still further. There will be no award until the works are completed; and who believes that they will be completed with this amount of money? In a year or two hence a further sum will be asked for, and we shall be told that until that is expended no interest will be paid. Sir, I hope the Amendment will be pressed to a Division. We stand here determined to show the country that this is a deliberate attempt in an underhand fashion to get public money; and we do not mean to be brow-beaten by any one person, or any number of persons, or to be prevented from declaring that we intend on behalf of our constituents to resist the application of this money.

*Dr. COMMINS: The observation that this is a deliberate attempt to get public money is an observation that might be applied to every private Bill the object of which is to borrow money from the Treasury. The hon. Member says he has had no opportunity of examining the provisions of the Bill, but not a thing was done to prevent any Member examining the Bill in the fullest manner. It passed through Committee in a most ordinary way, and the subject has been before us since the early days of the Session. The hon. Member has dealt with the Bill as though it were a private speculation for the benefit of private promoters, but that is not the case, as no one of them whatever will gain a penny by it—

MR. CHANCE: We have had from the Secretary to the Treasury what we usually do have from him, an extremely straightforward, candid, and modest explanation of the circumstances of this loan. He has told us frankly that nothing has been paid on previous loans entered into a considerable number of years ago.

MR. JACKSON: I do not know if the hon. Member understood. I said nothing had been paid because no award had been made. Until that is done it cannot be said that the money is due.

MR. CHANCE: I quite understand. The hon. Gentleman stated nothing had been paid; not a penny had gone back to the Treasury, because, as he said, there had been no allotment of land. But what I should like to know is this: when the original loan was made by the Treasury was that transaction complete in itself, or was it contingent upon the future advance of this £115,000 more? I have heard of such a transaction generally condemned as paying interest out of capital, and these financial arrangements seem to me to be very like that of paying the interest on old liabilities by incurring new liabilities, and so we may go on ad infinitum. The Chairman of Ways and Means has spoken of this Bill having been discussed in Committee, but the only discussion it received was from the right hon. Gentleman, two other Members of this House, and your counsel, Sir; but I do not think the House will consider that discussion in that way is altogether satisfactory before agreeing to a Bill on which is to be grounded a demand for £50,000 of public money. We have it from the Chairman of Ways and Means that this Bill was smuggled through the House.

MR. COURTNEY: No; I said that if this Bill was smuggled through the House, then every Bill was smuggled through the House.

MR. CHANCE: I take it the logical mind of the right hon. Gentleman enabled him to see the possibility of some smuggling transaction; the idea of smuggling occurred to his mind. It was smuggled through in some sense; the Government Bill was introduced as a "bonnet" or a stalking horse, while the private Bill was preparing.

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is not speaking to the Question before the House, the amendment of Clause 6.

MR. CHANCE: If the line I was pursuing is not open to me, Sir, of course I accept your ruling. I was led into it by the fact that an opposite line of illustration was taken by the right hon. Gentleman the Chairman of Ways and Means.

*MR. SPEAKER: Not upon this Amendment.

MR. CHANCE: No, not on this Amendment, but the same spirit runs through all the clauses. I will only say that in the statement of the right hon. Gentleman the Chairman of Ways and Means, when he alluded to the logical consequences of this, he could not show that the action of the Government in this matter has been fair and honest.

MR. PHILIPPS: My hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Galway says the Amendment is absurd because no money can be paid on previous Bills because no award has been made or can be made until the drainage works are complete. But I do not see how that follows, because any competent engineer knows what land he is going to drain, or he ought to know. If it is impossible for the engineer who drew up this drainage scheme to tell us what land he is going to drain and how much land is to be improved in value by the works, then I think the scheme ought not to be accepted. I would ask the Financial Secretary who has told us that interest has accrued on former loans, but is not due until the works are complete, to tell us what is the amount of interest that has accrued—I will not say is due—but what would be the amount due if the works were finished to-day? This is a question I think ought to be answered before we go to a Division.

*SIR J. SWINBURNE: I beg leave to move the adjournment of the Debate. This Bill proposes by a side-wind to provide the sum of £50,000.

Motion made, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Sir John Swinburne.)

And, it appearing to Mr. Speaker that the Motion was an abuse of the Rules of the House, he proceeded to put the Question thereon forthwith.

The House divided:—Ayes 52; Noes 218.—(Div. List, No. 231.)

Original Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 58; Noes 217.—(Div. List, No. 292.)

MR. STOREY: I have another Amendment which I want to present to the critical consideration of the House. I have only got one more. It is in Clause 16. I have mentioned it privately to the right hon. Gentleman the Chairman of Ways and Means, and I am extremely hopeful that both he and the hon. Members from Ireland will join me in asking for this change in the Bill supposing we go to a Division. Clause 16 reads:—

"Any increase in the value of the land upon the occupiers interest, on which any annuity is charged, which shall have resulted from the execution of Works by the Board, shall be excluded in ascertaining the value of such land for any of the purposes of the Land Act (Ireland) 1881, and any Act amending the same."

The object of the clause as I want it would be this—that the increased value of the land accruing from these works should not be taken into account in order to increase the tenants' rent in future arrangements. We did this in the case of the Bann Bill, in regard to which the Chief Secretary in Committee frankly admitted that I was right in regard to my contention, and he made the alteration desired. The Amendment which I propose brings the clause of the Suck Bill exactly into the form of the clause which has been agreed to in the Bann Bill. I submit that if that form of clause be good for the Bann Bill it ought to be good for the Suck Bill. The clause as it stands in the Suck Bill does provide that within the flooded areas increase of value shall not be taken as a ground for increasing rents hereafter; but in the case of the lands which are immediately outside the flooded areas, the improvement which will accrue to them from the works to be carried out might well be taken account of in future settlements of rent to increase the rent. That would be extremely wrong, and I think we taxpayers who have to pay £50,000 to be provided out of the Public Exchequer, should ask that whatever value accrues from these drainage works should not be reckoned by the landlords in order to increase the rents which the tenants are to pay. If that be a fair contention, and it was felt to be unanswerable in the other case, I hope there will be no objection to my Amendment—Clause 16, page 8, line 25, after "land," to strike out the words "upon the occupier's interest in which any annuity is charged." I beg to move the Amendment.

COLONEL NOLAN: This is really a very small matter, and I hope the Government will agree to it. The Amendment involved reaches the vanishing point, but if these people outside are benefited, it is only right that they should pay for it.

MR. T. M. HEALY: The Amendment proposed by my hon. Friend is a very fair one, and I trust the Government will accede to it.

*DR. COMMINS: The Amendment provides for the valuation of the occupiers' interest as separate from the landlords', and simplifies the working of the measure very considerably.

MR. CHANCE: I hope the right hon. Gentleman will accept the Amendment. There are two classes of land which may be benefited by the change—land specially benefited without the obligation of an annuity, and land not specially benefited. As the clause is drawn, it is confined wholly to land specially benefited—that is, land upon which an annuity is charged. The land not specially benefited is within the contributory area. That land will derive some trifling advantage from the drainage works, yet it would, nevertheless, be subject to an increase of rent under this section, for the clause only excepts from increase land specially benefited. The Amendment will remove an anomaly, and will in reality do very little more.

MR. SEXTON: I trust the right hon. Gentleman will accept the Amendment, for it would be extremely hard if the outside occupiers, who will derive an extremely small advantage, should be subject to an increase of rent hereafter.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The matter is very insignificant, and I certainly, on the part of the Government, shall not offer any opposition.

MR. COURTNEY: The intention of the promoters, as represented to me, was that no increase would be made in the future valuation of rents in consequence of these works.

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause," put, and negatived.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That Standing Orders 223 and 243 be suspended, and that the Bill be now read the third time."—(Mr. Herbert Gardner.)

MR. STOREY : I think I may appeal to the right hon. Gentleman after the evidence he has had of the objections to this particular Bill in its present shape to postpone the Third Reading. I fear we shall be deprived of the opportunity of discussing the grant of £50,000. We have done a great deal to get the Bill through so far, and I would suggest that the Third Reading stage should be held over.

COLONEL NOLAN : No, no ; pass the Bill.

MR. STOREY : If my hon. Friend presses the Bill, he will meet with no small opposition. What I suggest to the Government is to hang this Bill as it were between heaven and earth until he sees whether the House will or will not grant the £50,000, which is necessary for the purposes of the Bill.

*MR. W. H. SMITH : I think the hon. Gentleman has given abundant reasons why the House should now read the Bill a third time. We have been discussing the Bill for three hours ; he and his friends have made their protest before the public and before the world against the Bill, and nothing more could be said even if we had a Debate on the Third Reading. It is obvious that it would be a useless expenditure of public time were we to postpone this Bill, which is to go to another place, and to be dealt with there according to the Standing Orders. The hon. Gentleman said they will not have an opportunity of discussing the Money Bill. If the Government bring in that Money Bill this Session there will be abundant opportunity for discussing it on its several stages, or if we bring it in next Session there will also be ample opportunity to discuss the application of the £50,000. Under these circumstances I think I shall carry with me the great majority of even the hon. Members who have supported the hon. Gentleman during the last three hours, in desiring that the Bill should be read a third time, and without further Debate, and that it should go to another place.

SIR G. CAMPBELL : Sir, the Motion before the House is not for the Third Reading, but for the suspension of the Standing Orders. In the case of this most extraordinary and dangerous Bill, I do not think the Government should ask it, and I oppose this course most strongly.

MR. PHILIPPS : The right hon. Gentleman withdrew the Bill, and we were justified in thinking that it would not be brought in again until next Session, but he has brought it in one-half a private Bill and the other half a public Bill.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR : At the time I withdrew the Bill I explained the course which I intended to take.

MR. PHILIPPS : I am sorry the newspapers did not think the right hon. Gentleman's observations worthy to be reprinted. Our opposition to the Bill has at all events been justified, for out of the Amendments we proposed the Government have accepted one. I oppose this Motion, and I shall vote against it.

QUESTIONS.

ADULTERATED LARD.

SIR RICHARD PAGET (Wells): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if his attention has been called to a recent publication by the Agricultural Department (No. 24, of 1889), in which quotations are made from the Official Report of the Agricultural Department of the United States to the following effect—

"That the total Annual Exports of Lard from the United States are about 320,000,000 lbs., of which about 40 per cent are 'Compound or Refined' lard; that no less than 93,000,000 lbs. were sent in 1888 from the United States to this Country; that amongst the adulterants used in compound or refined lard, 'dead hog grease, or dead hog stearine is one of the most frequently mentioned; that 'the term dead hog grease is used to indicate the oil or lard obtained from animals which die of disease, or are smothered in transportation or die on the way to the slaughterhouses.'"

Whether, in view of these alarming official statements, and the possible danger to health from the consumption of an article of food thus adulterated, Her Majesty's Government will consider the propriety of prohibiting the introduction of the spurious substance designated "Compound or Refined Lard;" and, whether, in the event of the importation of artificial lard being still permitted, he will direct that (following the analogy of the entry of margarine) a separate entry shall be made in the Monthly Returns of the Board of Trade distinguishing genuine lard from the artificial compound?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): Her Majesty's Government are not prepared to prohibit all adulterations of lard, as it would require a large and expensive staff to test all imports, and there is no evidence that the bulk of such lard is other than harmless. Whilst agreeing with the accuracy of the statements quoted by the hon. Baronet, I think a closer perusal of the Report shows that the ingredients of these compounds are not so deleterious as is supposed, consisting in great measure of cotton seed oil. I learn from the Customs that they are prepared, on obtaining the sanction of the Treasury, to assign a separate heading for lardine in the import accounts of next year.

NAVAL CHIEF ENGINEERS.

SIR JOHN COLOMB (Tower Hamlets): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty what is the average amount of annual pay and allowances, if any, of the Engineer Officers in chief charge of the engines and machinery of battleships taking part in the Naval Manœuvres; and, what is the average amount of annual pay and allowances, if any, of the Chief Accountant Officers in charge of the books and accounts of those ships?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): The average annual pay and allowances of the chief engineers in charge of the machinery on the battleships engaged in the manœuvres is £488, and that of the accountant officers £475.

ST. KATHARINE'S HOSPITAL.

MR. FENWICK (Northumberland), (on behalf of Mr. CREMER (Shoreditch)): I beg to ask the hon. Member for Penrith if, as the representative of the Charity Commissioners, he can state whether the vacancy caused by the decease of the late Master of St. Katharine's Hospital has been filled up; and, if so, what duties the new Master has to perform; what salaries and emoluments the new Master is to receive; and, whether the Charity Commissioners are taking any steps to reform the management of the hospital, and to utilise for educational and other useful purposes its increasing revenues?

*MR. J. W. LOWTHER (Penrith): The Charity Commissioners are informed by the chapter clerk of St. Katharine's Hospital that the vacancy caused by the decease of the late Master has been filled up. The duties attaching to the office are those prescribed in the rules of the hospital, which were laid upon the Table of the House in the month of June last. The salary and emoluments of the new Master are the same as those of his predecessor. As the hon. Member was informed on the last occasion when the matter was discussed in the House, the Charity Commissioners have no power to take any steps to reform the management of the charity except upon an application from the majority of the governing body, and such application has not yet been received.

CYPRUS.

MR. FENWICK (on behalf of Mr. CREMER): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether a reply has been sent to a memorial from the Archbishop of Cyprus and other members of a deputation now in this country, dated 19th July, respecting reforms in the administration of Cyprus; and, if so, whether he will inform the House as to the purport of that reply; whether Her Majesty's Government is prepared to act on the suggestion of the High Commissioner as regards the conversion of the tribute to Turkey, by which it is expected that considerable economies may be effected in the annual payments charged on the Cypriote or the English taxpayers; whether the recommendations of Her Majesty's Treasury, transmitted last year to the High Commissioner for Cyprus, as regards reductions in the Civil Service, have been acted upon; and, whether the Government will give favourable consideration to the appeal of the Cypriote deputation for utilisation and encouragement of the agricultural resources of the island, and for lessening the additional burdens laid on the inhabitants since the occupation of their island for Imperial purposes?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. de Worms, Liverpool, East Toxteth): No definite reply has yet been sent to the Cyprus deputation, as their representations are still the subject of discussion between them and the Secretary of State, with whom they are to have a further interview on the 15th inst. Her Majesty's Government are anxious to commute the tribute, and have the subject under consideration; but the matter, being an international one, is of much delicacy, and presents many serious difficulties. Economies were effected this year in the Estimates of the current year to the extent of £1,075, and it is contemplated that further economies will be effected as time goes on, with a view to carrying out the wishes of the Treasury. As regards the last paragraph of the question, Her Majesty's Government are giving their best consideration to the suggestions of the deputation on all subjects affecting the welfare of the island. Papers have been laid on the Table, and will be distributed as soon as possible, dealing with the different questions raised by the Memorial; but with reference to the concluding words of the question, I may state that since the British occupation there has been a large remission of taxation.

GOVERNMENT CONTRACTORS AND WORKMEN.

MR. FENWICK (on behalf of Mr. CREMER): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether there are any workmen employed at the Houses of Parliament, or other Government works, who are paid by Messrs. Brass, the Government contractors, 4½d. per hour; whether such workmen are frequently engaged in cleaning and painting lofty parts of the Houses of Parliament; whether the contractors are allowed 6d. per hour for such men, and, if so, why they deduct 1½d. per hour; and whether the Government have come to any decision as to the appointment of a Committee to consider the desirability of engaging directly through their Clerks of Works all workmen employed at Government Offices, so that the amount voted by Parliament may be received without any deduction?

A LORD OF THE TREASURY (Sir H. MAXWELL, Wigton): There are only four men at the Houses of Parliament whose wages are as low as 4½d. per hour, and very few elsewhere. Such workmen are not frequently, only occasionally, engaged in cleaning lofty parts of the Houses of Parliament, and that at times when otherwise they would have to be discharged. There is no danger in the work. The contractors are allowed for these men 6d., less 16 per cent, or 5 1-25d. per hour. The present contract does not expire until March 31, 1891. The Government have undertaken before that date to fully consider what modifications it may be possible or desirable to make in the present system governing the employment of workmen in the public buildings, and the matter is now engaging attention. If it should be found that the assistance of a Committee of the House of Commons would be desirable in the investigation of the question, the Government will ask the House to appoint one in the course of next Session. But in the present position of the inquiry it is impossible to say whether it will be necessary to invite the assistance of a Committee of the House.

RAILWAY AND CANAL TRAFFIC ACT.

SIR R. PAGET: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he will be good enough to state to the House the manner in which the Board of Trade propose to proceed to consider the objections of traders, farmers, and others with regard to railway rates, charges, and classification under the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1888; whether the hearing of parties will be conducted in public; by whom the hearing will be conducted; and when they will commence; whether it is the intention that parties may be heard at their own discretion either in person or by counsel; and whether it is proposed to deal, in the first instance, with Imperial questions involving matters of principle such as terminals and short-distance clauses; or to deal with groups and objections submitted by special classes of farmers, traders, or to deal separately with the classification schedule submitted by each Railway Company?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: A Circular explaining the procedure to be adopted at the hearing of objections, of which I will hand a Copy to the hon. Baronet, will be sent to each Railway Company and each objector, and will be given the utmost publicity. The hearings will be conducted in public by the principal permanent officers of the Department, presided over by Lord Balfour of Burleigh, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Board of Trade, who will have such expert advice as may be necessary. Parties will be heard either by themselves or by representatives, as they may deem desirable. It is proposed, in the first instance, to deal with questions involving matters of principle, commencing with terminals. Further details the hon. Baronet will find in the Circular.

SIR R. PAGET: Will the right hon. Gentleman say when the parties will be heard?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: On October 15.

CUSTOM OFFICERS, LIVERPOOL.

MR. J. MCCARTHY (Londonderry): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether it is a fact that the out-door officers of Customs at Liverpool petitioned the Board of Customs on June 13 last relative to certain travelling allowances of which they have lately been deprived; and if so, whether the officers have not yet received an answer to their petition; whether the examining officers of Customs at Liverpool petitioned the Treasury upon the same subject on June 18 last; and whether the decision of the Treasury has been made known to the officers interested; and if not, whether he will explain the cause of the delay?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (MR. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): The two Petitions referred to are in the hands of the Board of Customs. The question raised by the examining officers, whose Petition was sent to the Board in the first instance, is of wider scope than that to which the Petition of the out-door officers relates. The subject of both is somewhat intricate and involves an important principle. Moreover, as some of the points have been directly raised before the Royal Commission on Civil Establishments, the Board had necessarily to await the Report of that Commission before taking action in the matter. Careful consideration is now being given to the subject, and a decision may shortly be expected.

FEVER AT GIBRALTAR.

SIR W. BARTTELOT (Sussex, N.W.) on behalf of Sir JOHN KENNAWAY (Honiton): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether it is a fact that in 11 months, in four adjoining rooms on the ground floor in the Spanish Pavilion of Gibraltar, there have been four cases of fever, two of which have been serious cases of enteric; and whether he can give assurance that the unsanitary state of the building will be dealt with at once?

*THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE WAR OFFICE (MR. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): There have been three cases of fever, of which two were enteric, in four adjoining rooms on the ground floor of the Spanish Pavilion during the last 11 months. The rooms of the lower floor have been closed, and steps have been taken for dealing at once with the sanitary defects of the Spanish Pavilion, if any remain after the overhaul it recently underwent. There has been no case of fever since June.

LOCAL TAXATION LICENCES.

COLONEL ANSTRUTHER (Woodbridge): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether it is the case, that the amount of annual licences payable in January by any individual be paid into the nearest Post Office, and the licences received from the Postmaster, that the amount so paid is transmitted to the General Post Office in London, and thus lost to the country in which the money was paid, whereas, should the money be paid into a county town to the collector of Inland Revenue, that then the county would receive the benefit?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (MR. BRIDGES, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): The value of licences taken out at Post Offices is paid over eventually to the credit of the account of the Inland Revenue at the Bank of England, and the Inland Revenue Department, in the Quarterly Return rendered to the Local Government Board, appropriates the proceeds to the credit of the administrative county in which such Post Offices are located.

EDINBURGH POST OFFICE.

MR. WALLACE (Edinburgh): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he has received a Memorial, dated 22nd June, 1888, and a further Memorial, dated 1st July, 1889, from certain Lower Division Clerks in the Edinburgh Post Office on the subject of temporary employment as Surveyors?

Sir M. Hicks Beach

Clerks; and, if so, whether he can say about what date he may be able to state to the Memorialists if their grievance can be remedied?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES Cambridge University): The Memorials referred to by the hon. Member were duly received. I should like to explain that lists are made out periodically of officers who are anxious to be employed in giving temporary assistance to surveyors, and when such assistance is needed the officers whose names are on the lists are, provided they are considered fully qualified, selected for the purpose. After the receipt of the first Memorial the officers who signed it were informed to this effect, and that when opportunities occurred they might apply, but many of them omitted to do so when last invited. A new list for Edinburgh will be made this autumn, and the Memorialists' qualifications will then be carefully considered.

TURIN STREET BOARD SCHOOL.

Mr. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department by whose authority the Turin Street Board School was occupied as a temporary barrack by the police upon the occasion of the visit of the Chief Secretary for Ireland to Bethnal Green on the 30th ultimo?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): I am informed by the Commissioner of Police that the school buildings were not occupied by the police; but, the permission of the caretaker of the school having been first obtained, some police were placed in the yard so as to be out of sight and not to attract a crowd.

Mr. PICKERSGILL: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that at the last meeting of the London School Board the statement was made by a responsible officer that authority had not been given?

Mr. MATTHEWS: I am not aware of that fact.

LEEDS POST OFFICE.

senders, and other out-door employees at Leeds are, in each case, less than those paid at Manchester, Birmingham, Glasgow, Edinburgh, Dublin, and Liverpool; and if he will consider whether such inequality of payment should continue for similar services?

*Mr. RAIKES: Yes, Sir; I am aware of the fact stated by the hon. Member. The rates of wages vary in different localities, as they bear some relation to the size and importance of the various offices. The office at Leeds does not belong to the same category as any of the six offices the hon. Member mentions, and I fear I cannot admit any sufficient reason for altering the present organisation.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT ACT—ALTERATION OF BOROUGH BOUNDARIES.

Mr. WOOTTON ISAACSON (Tower Hamlets): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether his attention has been called to the fact that notwithstanding the provisions of "The Local Government Act, 1888," requiring the Local Government Board to hold a local inquiry whenever any representation is made to them that it is desirable to alter the boundary of any borough, several provincial Corporations have, during the present Session, introduced into Parliament Bills for the extension of their boundaries without any previous local inquiry, thereby not only imposing considerable expense on the ratepayers by a more costly mode of proceeding in the first instance than by a local inquiry, but also inflicting serious expense on landowners and others opposed to the inclusion of their property within the borough boundary, and tending, by the serious expense of appearing before a Parliamentary Committee, to deprive small landowners of the opportunity of being heard in opposition to the proposed extension; and whether, since considerable extensions of boundaries sought for by provincial Corporations have been refused by Parliamentary Committees on the ground that the land in question was of a rural character and not fit or ripe to be included within the limits of the proposed tension have great difficulty in recovering the costs to which they have been put, he would consider if any and what further steps could be taken to give effect to the provisions of "The Local Government Act, 1888;" and to prevent the needless expenditure of time and money incurred by imposing upon a Parliamentary Committee the consideration of a question capable of being dealt with more satisfactorily and economically by a local inquiry.

MR. RITCHIE: It is the fact that in the case of certain municipal boroughs during the present Session Local Bills have been introduced for the extension of the borough boundaries without any previous local inquiry under the Local Government Act. These several Bills have been referred to the Select Committee on Police and Sanitary Regulations Bills. The views of that Committee on the general question of the extension of boroughs by Local Bills are stated in the Report on the Grimsby Extension and Improvement Bill, presented to the House on March 29th last. In that Report the Committee stated, amongst other grounds for their conclusion, that the extension of the borough should be granted; that the petition for the Bill was lodged in Parliament before the County Council came into existence; that although the Act creating the County Councils had passed it did not come into active operation until after the time that the promoters took steps to obtain the Local Act; and that if they had been guided solely by the words of Section 54 of the Local Government Act, and had not come to Parliament, they, in all probability, would have had a delay of 12 months before anything could have been done. The Committee were also impressed with the undoubted fact that the promoters had already incurred a large proportion of the total expense of obtaining the Bill, and that the whole of that expenditure would have been thrown away if the Committee had declined to entertain the Preamble. As regards the second paragraph of the question, in all cases where an application is made to the Local Government Board in pursuance of the Local Government Act for a provisional order for an extension of a borough boundary, the Board will direct the necessary local inquiry, unless they are clearly of opinion, upon the facts submitted to them, that the application should not be proceeded with. In any case hereafter in which it is proposed to obtain an extension of the boundary of a borough by a Local Bill instead of by application for a Provisional Order under the Local Government Act, it will be for Parliament to determine what course they will adopt with reference to the measure.

LADY VISITORS TO PRISONS.

MR. PICKERSGILL: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will state the names of the prisons in England and Wales to which ladies have been appointed as voluntary visitors; and what is the number of prisons to which such appointments have for the first time been made since September, 1887?

MR. MATTHEWS: There are 26 prisons in all to which ladies have been appointed as visitors. I shall be happy to show the hon. Member the list. Appointments have been made to two of these prisons—Devizes and Durham—since September, 1887.

MOVABLE DWELLINGS.

MR. STEPHENS (Hornsey): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he is in a position to give an approximate estimate of the number of persons living permanently in movable dwellings?

*MR. RITCHIE: I am unable to give an approximate estimate of the number of persons living permanently in movable dwellings. I may mention, however, that the number of persons enumerated as sleeping in caravans and tents, and in the open air on April 1, 1881, the date of the last census, was as follows:—Males, 4,668; females, 3,901—making a total of 8,569.

MR. STEPHENS: I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether the powers under Section 9 of "The Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1885," over tents, vans, sheds, and other similar structures, for purposes of public health, have been made use of by Sanitary Authorities; whether any, and, if so, how many Sanitary Authorities have made bye-laws under Sub-section (2) of Section 9 of "The Housing of the Working Classes

Mr. Wootton Isaacson

Act, 1885," for promoting cleanliness in, and the habitable condition of tents, vans, sheds, and similar structures, used for human habitation, and for preventing the spread of infectious disease by the persons inhabiting the same, and generally for the prevention of nuisances in connection with the same. And whether the Local Government Board have taken steps by circular or otherwise to draw the attention of Sanitary Authorities to the extensive powers at present possessed by them, under Section 9 of "The Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1885," with regard to tents, vans, sheds, and other similar structures?

*MR. RITCHIE: The Local Government Board, after the passing of "The Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1885," brought specially under the attention of the several Urban and Rural Sanitary Authorities the provisions of Section 9 of that Act as regards the regulation of tents, vans, sheds, and similar structures used for human habitation. With regard to Sub-section 1 of that section, the Board have no information as to the extent to which Local Authorities have availed themselves of their powers under the sub-section. With respect to Sub-section 2, no bye-laws under that sub-section have been confirmed by the Board. In three instances only have bye-laws been proposed by Urban and Rural Sanitary Authorities, and these are now under consideration.

MR. STEPHENS: I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council of Education whether it has been found practicable to enforce the school attendance of children travelling with canal boats in the district to which the canal boat is registered as belonging, according to the requirements of the "Canal Boats Act, 1877;" whether, owing to difficulties connected with the enforcement of the provisions of the "Canal Boats Act, 1877," with regard to the elementary education of children belonging to canal boats, attempts had been made, apart from the special provisions of the "Canal Boats Act, 1877."

*THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): I have no information as to the last two paragraphs of the question; but Mr. Brydone's Report, which will be included in the forthcoming Blue Book, shows that a great deal has been done to carry out the "Canal Boats Act," and that its enforcement has in many cases reduced the number of children on board the boats, and there is reason to believe that the substitution of special bye laws in respect of such children, in lieu of those of the district in which they happen to be, as is proposed in the "Movable Dwellings Bill," would be of great service.

THE SESSIONS RELIEF ACT.

MR. SWETENHAM (Carnarvon): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been drawn to the statement of Mr. Justice Hawkins, in charging the Grand Jury at Birmingham on Saturday last, that "The Sessions Relief Act, 1889," directs that, when prisoners have committed offences indictable for trial at Quarter Sessions, the witnesses are to be bound over to Quarter Sessions, unless the Justices, for "special reasons," otherwise direct; that the Act did not state what these special reasons were, and did not appear to apprehend the seriousness of a man lying in gaol three or four months at the expense of the county. In that division of Warwickshire there were no fewer than 17 prisoners awaiting their trial whose offences had been committed since the 28th of June, and who must wait in gaol until between the 2nd and 10th of October, when the next Sessions would be held; and whether, in order to prevent as far as possible the recurrence of the cruelty of keeping prisoners awaiting their trial in the manner they are being kept in the division of Warwickshire referred to, and the expense to the county, he will issue a Circular to the Magistrates' Clerks of the Petty Sessional Divisions, stating that the near approach of the Assizes as compared attention

until I exceeding my proper functions if I issued to Magistrates' Clerks a Circular professing to give an authoritative construction of the Assizes Relief Act, 1889. It is for Justices to decide upon all the circumstances whether "special reasons" exist for sending any case to the Assizes, and I apprehend they would take into consideration, among other circumstances, the comparative proximity of the Assizes and Sessions.

H.M.S. SULTAN.

MR. ISAACSON: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he has any further information as to the progress made in raising the Sultan?

LORD G. HAMILTON: No news has been received since July 28, when a preliminary trial was made by the salvors of their pumps.

SHORT SIGHT AND ELEMENTARY SCHOOLS.

DR. FARQUHARSON: I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether he has yet received any reports from his Inspectors regarding the alleged increase of short sight in the children attending public elementary schools?

*SIR W. HART DYKE: As the Inspectors have no previously ascertained data upon which to form a comparative judgment upon the point, a considerable time would necessarily elapse before they could be expected to give an opinion; but the matter has not been lost sight of, and I hope it may be possible to secure some reliable information in connection with it.

GUNS IN BARBETTE.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty what proportion of first-class ironclads have guns mounted in barbette, and if these would be disabled if hit at the hole and within a few feet of the muzzle by shot of 4.7 guns when fired with the new powders; if the 4.7 guns can fire 10 shots a minute?

LORD G. HAMILTON: Six of the 19 first-class ironclads have their main armament mounted in barbette. The chases of these guns are in common with guns placed in turrets exposed to injury by shot. As to the probable effect of a shot from a 4.7 gun on the chase near the muzzle, I must refer the hon. and gallant Member to the answer to a similar question put by him to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War on Tuesday. It has not been found practicable to give the chase of these guns greater protection, but as they will usually be pointed towards the enemy they will present a comparatively small target.

THE CALEDONIAN CANAL.

MR. FINLAY (Inverness, &c.): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether the attention of the Government has been drawn to the present condition of the Caledonian Canal, and especially to the fact that traffic is much impeded owing to the state of Loch Oich; whether inquiries have been made as to the works necessary to remedy the present position of affairs; and whether the Government will consider the propriety of taking measures, in co-operation with the Commissioners with a view to having the required works executed?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): As regards the present condition of the Caledonian Canal, the Commissioners have, within the last two years, undertaken the renewal of the lock gates, in accordance with a special Report by their Engineer Superintendent, which is appended to the annual Report recently presented to Parliament. The estimated cost of the work was £20,000, and Parliament has passed a vote of £5,000 as the first contribution towards this outlay. Owing to the severe drought this summer, the traffic on Loch Oich is much impeded, and this subject is under consideration.

VENEZUELA.

MR. WATT (Glasgow, Camlachie): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the Government have received information that the vessel of a British subject named Philip, of Trinidad, was seized by a Venezuelan revenue cutter, and threatened to shoot him, and made off with his boat and cargo, leaving him in a destitute condition on the uninhabited island of Patos; whether a Government official, sent to the Bocas to inquire into the facts, fully corroborated Philip's statements; and whether the Government have taken any steps to obtain from Venezuela redress for this outrage?

Mr. Matthews

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSSON, Manchester, N.E.): No information of such a case having occurred has reached Her Majesty's Government.

STATEMENTS BY PRISONERS.

MR. SWETENHAM (Carnarvon, &c.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether, in view of the divergent practice of Judges in allowing or disallowing a prisoner, who is defended by counsel, to make a statement to the jury in a capital or lesser case, some allowing it only to be made before counsel's address for the defence, and some, as in a recent case, after a speech by counsel and evidence called for the defence, and some disallowing a written statement to be read, he will confer with the Lord Chancellor as to the desirability either of calling a meeting of Judges to decide upon a uniformity of practice, or of bringing in a Bill next Session to extend the practice prescribed by the Criminal Law Amendment Act to all indictable offences?

MR. MATTHEWS: Her Majesty's Government have both in this Session and the last introduced a Bill which would remedy the anomalies pointed out by my hon. and learned Friend, and, although various circumstances have delayed it so far, I hope the next Session it may be passed into law.

IRELAND—BOYCOTTING—CASE OF MELLON AND DOYLE.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND (Fermanagh, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the case of John J. Mellon, Wm. P. Doyle, and Gregory Kavanagh, who were arrested in Gorey, at 8 o'clock on the morning of the 12th July, on the charge of boycotting, and detained in custody till 8 o'clock p.m. when they were brought before a Magistrate, who remanded them, accepting bail for their appearance; whether he is aware that, although the Petty Sessions clerk informed the Magistrate (Colonel Miller) that the bail bonds could be prepared by half-past 10 o'clock a.m. on the 13th, on the application of the police, Colonel Miller fixed 2 o'clock the next day as the time for taking the recognizances, and that the solicitors for the prisoners, after having been three times refused an interview with them, was at length allowed to see the prisoners separately in presence of Head Constable M'Cormick; and whether he will give directions that prisoners detained in any Constabulary barracks will be permitted in future to have private interviews with their solicitor; whether it is a fact that these three prisoners, in spite of the remonstrance of a constable, were ordered by the head constable to be detained on the night of the 12th July in a cell about five feet by eight feet, which was in a disgustingly filthy condition, drunken prisoners having been previously confined in it; and whether steps will be taken to guard against the danger to prisoners' health likely to arise from confinement in such dens?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I understood that as the 13th July was a fair day, 2 o'clock was fixed as the most convenient hour for taking the recognizances. The police did refuse to allow Mr. Scott, a solicitor, to interview the prisoners without a District Inspector's authority. Immediately upon Mr. Scott applying to the District Inspector, he gave him permission to see the prisoners, but in the presence of the police, as the men were in custody, and had not yet been brought before a Magistrate. It is not the case that any constable remonstrated with the head constable as is alleged in the question; nor was the lock-up in a dirty state when the prisoners were placed in it.

MR. W. REDMOND: Might I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether it is not a fact that the charge made against these men has since been withdrawn?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I cannot answer that question without notice.

POSTAL FACILITIES IN IRELAND.

MR. P. J. O'BRIEN (Tipperary, N.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he, some time ago, received a Memorial, largely and influentially signed, from a number of ratepayers resident in the parish of Kilruane, in the postal district of Nenagh, County Tipperary, and also from a number of merchants and traders in the town of Nenagh, praying that a post office for the receiving and delivery of letters might be established at Kilruane; and, whether, having regard to the fact (as set forth in the Memorial) that this large and important district, comprising in its area 13 townlands, is several miles from the nearest post office, whereby the residents are subject to very great inconvenience, he will see his way to have the want supplied?

*MR. RAIKES: Yes, Sir; the Memorial to which the hon. Member refers received my careful consideration; but I was unable to sanction the establishment of a post office at Kilruane, partly on account of the additional expense involved, and partly because the arrangement would have rendered necessary a change in the order of the present post from Nenagh, and excluded certain places now within that post. The letters which would be left to be called for at a post office at Kilruane only average two or three a week; and I regret that the circumstances do not admit of the Memorialists' wishes being complied with.

COST OF DEFENDING PRISONERS.

MR. O'DOHERTY (Donegal, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the provisions of the Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act, for payment out of moneys provided by Parliament for the defence of persons charged whose trial has been removed, have been at all put into operation, and to what extent; whether any direction under the 14th section of that Act have been given by the Lord Lieutenant with respect to persons charged and their counsel; whether the rules made under the 15th section have been construed by Crown Solicitors as tying them down to the payment of travelling expenses only; and, whether, having regard to the trial of a score of poor Donegal peasants in Queen's County, he will see that proper directions for the payment of the cost of the defence are given at once?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The provisions of the Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act, referred to in the first paragraph of the question, have been put into operation. The directions referred to in the second paragraph have been given. Crown Solicitors have not construed the rules made under the 15th section as limiting payments to travelling expenses only. In addition to those payments an allowance, according to a scale approved by the Treasury, is made for maintenance and loss of time to traversers and their witnesses. The necessary directions have already been given for the payment, according to the fixed scale, of such of the expenses in connection with the prosecution mentioned as are authorised under the Act.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): Are we to understand that in the case of these poor men who were arrested last February, whose families have been impoverished by their long imprisonment, and who are to be kept in prison till next October, the trial has been removed to the centre of Ireland, a long distance away, and the Government are not going to pay the expenses of their solicitors?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have done my best to answer the question on the Paper. If the right hon. Gentleman will put a question on the Paper, I will do my best to find out what the practice is.

EVICTON AT ABBEYFEALE.

MR. WILLIAM ABRAHAM (Limerick, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if his attention has been called to the circumstances attending the eviction of William Harnett (aged 87) on Friday last, near Abbeyfeale, County Limerick, on the estate of Mr. James Esmonde, J.P., when Dr. Bolster, who attended at the request of the authorities, declared Harnett's life in danger, and ordered that he should not be removed, and the Rev. William Casey, P.P., who was present for the purpose of administering the last sacrament to Harnett, was twice forcibly prevented by order of District Inspector Rice; and will District Inspector Rice be directed not to prevent a clergyman having access to one of his parishioners under similar circumstances?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Rev. William Casey twice refused to go outside the police cordon along with the rest of the people assembled, unless removed by force. When removed he subsequently tried to force his way through the cordon. He was prevented, as there was no necessity for his presence. Harnett was not removed, his family were, but at once re-admitted as caretakers. Every consideration was shown to the tenant and his family in the carrying out of the eviction, and Mrs. Harnett thanked the District Inspector for the kindness shown.

MR. ABRAHAM: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman if his attention has been called to a letter published by Father Casey, in which the rev. gentleman states that the daughter called him to administer the sacrament to her dying parent, that he was again pushed back by Mr. Wright, the Inspector, and when the Inspector seem disposed by his entreaties to allow him, a policeman with fixed bayonet rushed up and reminded him of the orders that had been given? Will the right hon. Gentleman grant an inquiry so that Father Casey can give evidence?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No, Sir; I see no reason for an inquiry.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): Had the right hon. Gentleman this case before him when he declared that the relations between the constabulary and the people had improved?

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

ACCOMMODATION IN VOLUNTARY SCHOOLS.

*MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON (Shropshire, Oswestry): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, if he will state the number and the names of the Voluntary Schools, where, as at Luton, the accommodation provided has been calculated on the 10 square feet basis?

*SIR W. HART DYKE: The accommodation of the voluntary schools in Luton continues to be calculated for the purposes of annual grant at eight square feet. Instances of the wider computation of ten feet where the question has arisen of the accommodation to be supplied in order to cover a deficiency in a district are common, and have recently occurred at Nottingham, Swindon, and Liversedge. If I were to give an exhaustive list I should have to go back to the earliest years after the passing of the Act of 1870.

WESTERN AUSTRALIA.

MR. GEORGE CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether it has been brought to the notice of the Secretary of State that ~~from~~ the settlers in Western Australia ~~are~~ by no means unanimous in accepting the proposed plan of responsible government; and, whether, on the contrary, he has received representations from the Albany district, in the south-west of the Colony, objecting to the proposed plan.

BARON H. DE WORMS: A Petition, which is from the Albany district, was brought under the notice of Parliament in the Command Paper, c. 5,743, p. 31. It was signed by 90 persons. A careful consideration of it did not lead Her Majesty's Government to modify their opinion that the people of Western Australia and of the other Australian colonies are right in advising the early establishment of responsible government in Western Australia.

MR. LEIGHTON: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he can lay before the House any further communications from the Governor of Western Australia with reference to the granting of a responsible Constitution to the colony; and whether he has received any further communications on the subject from the other Australian colonies?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: A telegram from the Government of South Australia to its Agent-General, asking him to impress on the Imperial Government the desirability of passing this Session the Western Australia Bill, has been received, and to-day a further telegram has come in from Lord Carrington, communicating an address from the members of the Legislative Assembly, New South Wales, relative to the passing of the Bill. The telegram is too long to read now, but it has been sent to the Press.

OVERHEAD WIRES AND SPIKED WIRE FENCES.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether Her Majesty's Government intend to propose legislation on the subject of overhead wires, or whether the Local Authorities of urban municipalities and of counties (including the County of London) can deal with these matters under the power of making bye-laws which the Legislature has conferred on them? I beg also to ask the right hon. Gentleman if his attention has been called to the growing practice of erecting spiked wire fences of a character dangerous to young and old along public roads and paths; and, distinguishing genuine lard from the artificial compound?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): Her Majesty's Government are not prepared to prohibit all adulterations of lard, as it would require a large and expensive staff to test all imports, and there is no evidence that the bulk of such lard is other than harmless. Whilst agreeing with the accuracy of the statements quoted by the hon. Baronet, I think a closer perusal of the Report shows that the ingredients of these compounds are not so deleterious as is supposed, consisting in great measure of cotton seed oil. I learn from the Customs that they are prepared, on obtaining the sanction of the Treasury, to assign a separate heading for lardine in the import accounts of next year.

NAVAL CHIEF ENGINEERS.

SIR JOHN COLOMB (Tower Hamlets): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty what is the average amount of annual pay and allowances, if any, of the Engineer Officers in chief charge of the engines and machinery of battleships taking part in the Naval Manœuvres; and, what is the average amount of annual pay and allowances, if any, of the Chief Accountant Officers in charge of the books and accounts of those ships?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): The average annual pay and allowances of the chief engineers in charge of the machinery on the battleships engaged in the manœuvres is £488, and that of the accountant officers £475.

ST. KATHARINE'S HOSPITAL.

MR. FENWICK (Northumberland), (on behalf of Mr. CREMER (Shoreditch)): I beg to ask the hon. Member for Penrith if, as the representative of the Charity Commissioners, he can state whether the vacancy caused by the decease of the late Master of St. Katharine's Hospital has been filled up; and, if so, what duties the new Master has to perform; what salaries and emoluments the new Master is to receive; and, whether the Charity Commissioners are taking any steps to reform the management of the hospital, and to utilise for educational and other useful purposes its increasing revenues?

*MR. J. W. LOWTHER (Penrith): The Charity Commissioners are informed by the chapter clerk of St. Katharine's Hospital that the vacancy caused by the decease of the late Master has been filled up. The duties attaching to the office are those prescribed in the rules of the hospital, which were laid upon the Table of the House in the month of June last. The salary and emoluments of the new Master are the same as those of his predecessor. As the hon. Member was informed on the last occasion when the matter was discussed in the House, the Charity Commissioners have no power to take any steps to reform the management of the charity except upon an application from the majority of the governing body, and such application has not yet been received.

CYPRUS.

MR. FENWICK (on behalf of Mr. CREMER): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether a reply has been sent to a memorial from the Archbishop of Cyprus and other members of a deputation now in this country, dated 19th July, respecting reforms in the administration of Cyprus; and, if so, whether he will inform the House as to the purport of that reply; whether Her Majesty's Government is prepared to act on the suggestion of the High Commissioner as regards the conversion of the tribute to Turkey, by which it is expected that considerable economies may be effected in the annual payments charged on the Cypriote or the English taxpayers; whether the recommendations of Her Majesty's Treasury, transmitted last year to the High Commissioner for Cyprus, as regards reductions in the Civil Service, have been acted upon; and, whether the Government will give favourable consideration to the appeal of the Cypriote deputation for utilisation and encouragement of the agricultural resources of the island, and for lessening the additional burdens laid on the inhabitants since the occupation of their island for Imperial purposes?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. de WORMS, Liverpool, East Toxteth): No definite reply has yet been sent to the Cyprus deputation, as their representations are still the subject of discussion between them and the Secretary of State, with whom they are to have a further interview on the 15th inst. Her Majesty's Government are anxious to commute the tribute, and have the subject under consideration; but the matter, being an international one, is of much delicacy, and presents many serious difficulties. Economies were effected this year in the Estimates of the current year to the extent of £1,075, and it is contemplated that further economies will be effected as time goes on, with a view to carrying out the wishes of the Treasury. As regards the last paragraph of the question, Her Majesty's Government are giving their best consideration to the suggestions of the deputation on all subjects affecting the welfare of the island. Papers have been laid on the Table, and will be distributed as soon as possible, dealing with the different questions raised by the Memorial; but with reference to the concluding words of the question, I may state that since the British occupation there has been a large remission of taxation.

GOVERNMENT CONTRACTORS AND WORKMEN.

MR. FENWICK (on behalf of Mr. CREMER): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether there are any workmen employed at the Houses of Parliament, or other Government works, who are paid by Messrs. Brass, the Government contractors, 4½d. per hour; whether such workmen are frequently engaged in cleaning and painting lofty parts of the Houses of Parliament; whether the contractors are allowed 6d. per hour for such men, and, if so, why they deduct 1½d. per hour; and whether the Government have come to any decision as to the appointment of a Committee to consider the desirability of engaging directly through their Clerks of Works all workmen employed at Government Offices, so that the amount voted by Parliament may be received without any deduction?

A LORD OF THE TREASURY (Sir H. MAXWELL, Wigton): There are only four men at the Houses of Parliament whose wages are as low as 4½d. per hour, and very few elsewhere. Such workmen are not frequently, only occasionally, engaged in cleaning lofty parts of the Houses of Parliament, and that at times when otherwise they would have to be discharged. There is no danger in the work. The contractors are allowed for these men 6d., less 16 per cent, or 5 1-25d. per hour. The present contract does not expire until March 31, 1891. The Government have undertaken before that date to fully consider what modifications it may be possible or desirable to make in the present system governing the employment of workmen in the public buildings, and the matter is now engaging attention. If it should be found that the assistance of a Committee of the House of Commons would be desirable in the investigation of the question, the Government will ask the House to appoint one in the course of next Session. But in the present position of the inquiry it is impossible to say whether it will be necessary to invite the assistance of a Committee of the House.

RAILWAY AND CANAL TRAFFIC ACT.

SIR R. PAGET: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he will be good enough to state to the House the manner in which the Board of Trade propose to proceed to consider the objections of traders, farmers, and others with regard to railway rates, charges, and classification under the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1888; whether the hearing of parties will be conducted in public; by whom the hearing will be conducted; and when they will commence; whether it is the intention that parties may be heard at their own discretion either in person or by counsel; and whether it is proposed to deal, in the first instance, with Imperial questions involving matters of principle such as terminals and short-distance clauses; or to deal with groups and objections submitted by special classes of farmers, traders, or to deal separately with the classification schedule submitted by each Railway Company?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: A Circular explaining the procedure to be adopted at the hearing of objections, of which I will hand a Copy to the hon. Baronet, will be sent to each Railway Company and each objector, and will be given the utmost publicity. The hearings will be conducted in public by the principal permanent officers of the Department, presided over by Lord Balfour of Burleigh, the Parliamentary Secretary

But the hon. Gentleman has majorities of 98 and 101 against him. It is perfectly clear that the House want to pass this private Bill, and by what he is doing the hon. Gentleman can only succeed in wasting the time of the House and prolonging the discussion. He has put his case very well; with such an extremely bad case, I wonder he could do so well. I can understand the House refusing Ireland money or refusing it a particular Bill; but for a small minority to prevent the Government bringing forward a proposition which they think they ought to do in justice to Ireland, is hardly treating the weaker country fairly.

*SIR J. SWINBURNE (Staffordshire, Lichfield): May I ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the interest on the public money expended on the Shannon has been paid regularly?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): If the hon. Gentleman will give notice of his question, I will endeavour to give him an answer.

MR. CHANCE: I have to congratulate the hon. and gallant Gentleman upon his championship of the rights of a majority, but I think his observations would have come with better grace from a Gentleman who was in the habit of being one of the majority. I have also to congratulate him in his startling novelty. I heard with surprise the hon. and gallant Member say he was afraid the House would grant Ireland too much money. I say without fear of contradiction that that is the very first time the hon. and gallant Member has been troubled with scruples upon the point. I have never known him afraid that too much money would be granted upon these semi-charitable, and, I may say, semi-jobbing works. I do not think the Amendment is a frivolous one, and I am strengthened in that belief by the fact that when, on the Estimates, some one desires to object to the insufficiency of the amount granted, the only thing he can do is to move that the Vote be reduced.

*MR. SPEAKER: I must ask the hon. Gentleman to discuss the particular Amendment before the House.

MR. CHANCE: That was what I was attempting to do—

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

Colonel Nolan

MR. CHANCE: The case of the hon. Member for Sunderland is a very simple one: it is that it is unsafe to give power to borrow £115,000, and he sees a lesser danger in permitting £100,000 rather than £115,000 to be borrowed. I will not say more, but simply content myself by declaring that I propose to support the hon. Member for Sunderland, whether my reasons commend themselves or not to the House.

*DR. COMMINS: There is a consideration in favour of this Bill which seems to have been overlooked. It is evidently forgotten that all these works are embankment works. The Suck run through peat moss, and great mischief is done by it overflowing its banks. Crops are destroyed, and disease often disseminated. In order to provide against such a state of things, the works so far have been mainly embankment works. The money spent will be lost unless the works are completed. The House is called upon to make a beneficial work complete, and prevent it from being what it will otherwise be—a source of danger. In fact, if the work already undertaken is not made complete, it will be a curse instead of a blessing to the people of the neighbourhood, as an overflow, if it should happen, would be all the worse for it. It is upon this that I shall support the Bill.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: In the course of a somewhat long life spent in administration I have heard a great deal of what the hon. and learned Gentleman has just told us. A great deal of money has been spent in embankment works; and no good done. I object to these works being undertaken at the expense of the taxpayers.

MR. PHILIPPS: The hon. and gallant Member for Galway said the House was very anxious for this Bill. I do not know what there is to make the House anxious for the Bill, because this is the first opportunity we have had of discussing the Bill in the House, while no statement has ever been made on behalf of the Bill. It has been said that if a great deal more money is not spent on the drainage of the Suck, the money that has already been spent will be absolutely wasted. But then, as far as I can understand, it is admitted on all sides that, to complete the drainage of the Suck, not £115,000, but £165,000 is required. If £115,000 is not enough to finish the drainage of the river, I do not suppose we shall do much perceptible harm if we reduce the sum to £100,000. The hon. and gallant Member also said it is only a small minority who oppose this Bill; but let me point out that it is a growing minority. Last year one of these Drainage Bills was opposed by only three Members, but now most of the hon. Members who sit on this side go into the Lobby in opposition to this Bill. The hon. and learned Member for Roscommon said that disease is generated and crops are destroyed by the overflowing of the river. But surely all these facts ought to be put before the House. Some Member of the Government should put these facts before us in an authoritative way. This Bill has been introduced in a private way, and by it we are asked to lend money for an object in favour of which not a single argument has ever been advanced by anyone in a position of authority.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Should I be in order, Mr. Speaker, in making the Motion the right hon. Member for Halifax made on July 2, 1888?

*MR. SPEAKER: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. and learned Gentleman, but I have used a strong expression from the Chair. I remain of the same opinion; but I think it would perhaps be well to allow the House to take a Division upon the Amendment in the ordinary course before the House.

The House divided:—Ayes 182; Noes 56. (Div. List, No. 289.)

MR. PHILIPPS: I now beg to move the omission of Sub-section (a) of Clause 6. We have not heard a word from any Member of the Government, or from any member of the Select Committee, as to the additional value which is to be given to the lands specially benefited by this drainage scheme. If the drainage is going to improve the value of the lands specially benefited, why should not these lands pay the whole expense of the scheme? Sub-section (a) charges the sum of £13,000 upon a certain contributory area. I do not want to be unfair. I do not want to charge the whole of the cost on the lands specially benefited, unless those lands are going to receive large benefits. Perhaps some one will tell us what was the decision taken before the Select Committee, and at what amount the improvement of the lands specially benefited was assessed? Of course, if I receive a satisfactory reply I shall be ready to withdraw my Amendment.

Amendment proposed, in page 4, line 34, to leave out Sub-section (a) of Clause 6.—(Mr. Philipps.)

Question proposed, "That Sub-section (a) of Clause 6 stand part of the Bill."

MR. CHANCE: I think that before we divide upon this Amendment we should have some explanation as to the incidence of the charges.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: May I point out that these are questions which were dealt with in Committee, and that if our private Bill legislation is to have any value, we must assent to the verdict of the Committees? It is impossible for this House to go into details and the grounds upon which the conclusions of Committees were arrived at. It must be obvious to the House that if we debate here the details of every private Bill, it will be utterly impossible for the House to conduct its private legislation and any legislation whatever.

MR. STOREY: I think that is a fair contention to make in the case of ordinary Bills. The point we make is that we ought to have an opportunity of discussing the details of these Drainage Bills when we are called upon to give £50,000 as a free grant; but that owing to the peculiar methods adopted by the Government, we shall be prevented from discussing the details. There will simply be a clause granting £50,000 for the Suck drainage, and on that clause it will be impossible to discuss the details. We cannot permit such Bills as this to pass without opposition. As to the particular point before the Committee, our contention is similar to that we urged on the other Bill. We hold that if there are advantages accruing directly to certain lands, those lands should be required to bear the cost of the works, and that you should not go to other lands which benefit merely because they are in the locality and compel them to bear part of the expense. That is our contention, and it is a contention which, if we had been in Committee on the original measure, we should have sustained by prolonged argument. We admit the difficulty of considering these points in a private Bill, but the blame does not rest with us; it rests with the Treasury Bench, and the Treasury Bench alone. The right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury has not defended it, and if the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary were present he would not defend this particular provision. The only reason for its adoption is that they find it extremely hard to raise the money, and they try all sorts of Irish devices for raising it instead of adopting the old-fashioned Irish method—the method practised before Ireland was debauched by England—of making those who benefit pay for the benefit they receive.

MR. COURTNEY: This Bill came before me in the ordinary way as an unopposed Bill, and all its details were considered. It would have been in the power of hon. Members who object to the measure to oppose it, but it was not opposed and was committed like every other ordinary unopposed private Bill. The hon. Member (Mr. Storey) may stake his head as much as he likes, but he cannot alter the fact by so doing. The hon. Gentlemen in charge of the Bill and the Speaker's Counsel came before me to consider the details of the Bill which were dealt with in the ordinary way. With regard to the particular Amendment now before the Committee there is a distinction drawn between lands drained and benefited and land benefited though not drained; but there is no doubt that the works under the Bill will have a beneficial effect on the slopes above the actual drainage area. The hon. Gentleman shakes his head again, whether at the principle I state or at the facts to which I have referred I do not know. I should have thought the principle commends itself to everyone, and as to the facts they were proved before me. Due notice was given of the Bill by advertisement in the district interested, and if there had been any objection to the scheme opposition would have been offered; but there was no opposition. The locality at large must be taken as assenting to the Bill, in so far as they showed no dissent. It may be impossible by arguments or facts to convince those who have made up their minds not to be convinced; but, at any rate, the conduct of the Bill before me was perfectly regular.

Mr. Storey

SIR G. CAMPBELL: This Bill, as the right hon. Gentleman says, was treated as an unopposed Bill; consequently, there was no real discussion on it. We are told that we could have opposed it at an earlier stage, but we knew nothing about it. It was smuggled through Committee. ["No, no."]

MR. COURTNEY: Then everything is smuggled through Committee.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: Opportunity was given for private individuals to oppose the Bill if injuriously affected by it, but this measure affects the pockets of the British taxpayer, which is a very different thing. The Bill has been described as a conjunction of the letters "J O B"—job—but to my mind, it is something more than a job—it is a dodge. Advantage has been taken of a private measure to get a principle through the House which could not be got through in a public Bill. These are the circumstances under which the Bill now appears before us, and I say we are amply justified in discussing its details. We had no opportunity of knowing what was going on in the Private Bill Committee; and though I have every respect for the opinion of the Chairman of Committees, I think I am not wrong in saying that when a Bill has gone before him as an unopposed Bill it is not his function to rise——

*MR. SPEAKER: I fail to see how the hon. Member's observations are relevant to the question before the House, which is that of security for the repayment of advances.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: That question is most important. I understand from the First Lord of the Treasury that no interest on the advances in connection with the Suck drainage has been paid——

*MR. W. H. SMITH: No such question was ever asked. The question was in regard to the Shannon drainage.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: Very well; I would now ask if any interest has been paid on the advances made for the Suck drainage. I am told the interest is still owing; and if that is so, I say it would be wrong to permit these people to incur new liabilities while they have not discharged their old ones.

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): I can answer the hon. Gentleman's question.

The money advanced has been advanced on the security of the property, that is to say, the property of the area drained, and I believe I am justified in saying that that security is quite ample in every respect.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: Has the interest due been paid?

MR. JACKSON: If the hon. Gentleman will give me another moment I will satisfy his curiosity. Until the works have been completed or stopped—admittedly stopped—no award can be made of the charge which will come upon the different districts; and until that takes place the interest upon the sum already advanced accumulates. I am not aware that there is anything whatever unusual in that, therefore the obstruction now being offered to this Bill—[cries of "Oh!"]—well, if hon. Gentlemen do not like that word, the delay which is taking place in the passing of the Bill will delay the repayment of the money. The way to recover the money is to pass this Bill.

The House divided:—Ayes 197; Noes 60.—(Div. List, No. 290.)

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I beg to propose an Amendment at the end of Clause 6, which, I think, will be regarded as a very reasonable one. We all know that the interest of these advances has not been paid, but has, as it is emphatically called, been allowed to "accumulate." Under the circumstances I would move the Amendment which I have placed on the Paper.

Amendment proposed, in page 5, line 10, at the end of Clause 6, to insert the words—

"Provided that the interest on all moneys borrowed under the provisions of previous Acts, and secured on the same subjects, shall first be paid."—(Sir George Campbell.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

COLONEL NOLAN: The Amendment is an utterly absurd one. There can be no payment until the award is made. After a drainage work is executed the engineer goes down and awards so much for each proprietor to pay. At present the proprietors do not know how much they have to pay. They cannot, therefore, pay the interest—no matter how willing they are to do so; and meanwhile all the works will be stopped, the men thrown out of work, and all the present evils increased.

MR. STOREY: I should like to ask where is the absurdity of the Amendment? We are aware that there is to be an award, and that the individual proprietors will not know how much interest they have to pay till the award is made. But we do not ask individual proprietors to pay. We are dealing with the promoters of the Bill; and are promoters to come to the House and ask for loans and to be so impecunious as not to be able to pay the interest they owe? I ask the House to reflect on what they are doing. It is all very well to say that the interest for the last 10 years has never been apportioned; why if it is apportioned it will never be paid. We are going to carry this evil on still further. There will be no award until the works are completed; and who believes that they will be completed with this amount of money? In a year or two hence a further sum will be asked for, and we shall be told that until that is expended no interest will be paid. Sir, I hope the Amendment will be pressed to a Division. We stand here determined to show the country that this is a deliberate attempt in an underhand fashion to get public money; and we do not mean to be brow-beaten by any one person, or any number of persons, or to be prevented from declaring that we intend on behalf of our constituents to resist the application of this money.

*DR. COMMINS: The observation that this is a deliberate attempt to get public money is an observation that might be applied to every private Bill the object of which is to borrow money from the Treasury. The hon. Member says he has had no opportunity of examining the provisions of the Bill, but not a thing was done to prevent any Member examining the Bill in the fullest manner. It passed through Committee in a most ordinary way, and the subject has been before us since the early days of the Session. The hon. Member has dealt with the Bill as though it were a private speculation for the benefit of private promoters, but that is not the case, as no one of them whatever will gain a penny by it—certainly not those in charge of the Bill. It is not a Bill to promote private interests, it is a Bill to support public improvements.

MR. MACNEILL: The letter goes on to state that on the previous Wednesday my hon. Friend complained to Sir Hervey Bruce, one of the Visiting Justices. He says:—

“If the Prisons Board have no evidence of the condition of my eyesight, it is simply because they have never taken the trouble to inquire. The doctor here, so far as I know, has never been asked; at any rate, he has never asked me about my eyes. As a matter of fact, I protest against the whitewashed cell, as I have protested ever since I came here. My general health also is bad, and I am nearly crippled.”

I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether the Visiting Justice forwarded a Report, and where is that report now; and do the Government know, as a fact, whether Mr. Conybeare's eyesight is impaired or not?

MR. W. McARTHUR: Would it not be worth while—if only to satisfy the anxiety of the hon. Member's constituents—for the right hon. Gentleman to have a proper Medical Report of the health of the hon. Member for Camberne, and lay it before the House?

MR. BALFOUR: The Medical Officer of the prison, a most competent man, has daily opportunities of seeing the hon. Member. It is his business to report to the Prisons Board should there be anything in the gaol injurious to the hon. Gentleman's health. Nay, he has ample power, without going to the Board at all, to see that such changes are made in the treatment of the hon. Member as would prevent any injurious consequences. Of course, I shall be glad to make further inquiry, but under these circumstances I think there is no reason for any anxiety.

THE MAYBRICK CASE.

MR. A. O'CONNOR: May I ask the Home Secretary whether it is true, as stated in a great many newspapers, that one of Her Majesty's Judges was, at the termination of a criminal trial in Liverpool yesterday, followed and mobbed by a hissing and hooting crowd; whether the jurors and witnesses in the case were also hissed and hooted; and whether the prisoner, who had been found guilty of poisoning her husband, was cheered when placed in the prison van?

MR. MATTHEWS: I have no official information upon the points to which the hon. Gentleman has referred.

I have seen the statements in the newspaper, and I have read with the deepest regret that that kind of popular review of the conduct of either Judge or jury should ever be witnessed in this country.

MR. A. O'CONNOR: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he has seen from the papers, or learned from any official source, whether the police, who were in great force on that occasion, either batoned or bayoneted or shot the people?

RULES AND ORDERS OF DEBATE.

The Order of the Day having been called for the House to resolve itself into Committee of Supply,

MR. SEXTON: I wish to submit a question to you, Sir, in regard to an entry on the votes as to the proceedings yesterday in Committee of Supply. At half-past five o'clock a Division was in progress on an Amendment to reduce the vote for the Irish Constabulary. When the Division came to an end, it then being after half-past five, the Chairman did not leave the Chair according to the established rule, but put another Motion—namely, the main question on the Vote. Objection was taken to that proceeding, it being after half-past five, and the First Lord of the Treasury then rose and moved “that the Question be now put.” The Chairman accepted that Motion and put the question. On being asked whether there was a precedent for that course the Chairman said there was a precedent on November 14 of last year. But there is a difference between the proceeding on the 14th of November last year and that of yesterday, because in the former case no objection was taken to proceeding after half-past five o'clock, and no objection appeared in the Report of what passed. As soon as the Division after half-past five was over the Chairman was bound by the Standing Order to leave the Chair, and after objection was taken further proceeding with contentious business ought according to the rule, as I understand it, to have been abandoned. I, therefore, wish to ask you, Sir, if you are disposed to inform the House what is the proper step to be taken by an hon. Member to have the entry on the Votes expunged where the rule has been transgressed.

I also object to the entry as being inaccurate and incoherent. The entry says—

"It being after half-past five o'clock and objection being taken to further proceeding, the Chairman rose to interrupt the business."

These words are inaccurate, because the Chairman rose to put a new Motion, a further Motion—namely, the main question, and then objection was taken. I submitted that the record ought to be amended so as to make it either a faithful or an intelligible representation of what actually took place.

*MR. SPEAKER: I was not aware that the right hon. Gentleman was going to raise a point of order, and, indeed, it is irregular to do so after the business has commenced, and after the occasion on which the point of order arose. But I must respectfully decline to constitute myself a Court of Appeal from the decisions of the Chairman of Committees. The point of order raised yesterday was settled; and if any doubt lingered in the mind of the right hon. Gentleman as to the ruling of the Chairman of Committees it was within his competence to bring it before the House at the time. The Chairman is perfectly competent to decide a point of order in Committee; and I never heard of an appeal being made from the decision of the Chairman to the Speaker. From what I can see of the proceedings I believe they were perfectly in accordance with precedent and with the common law and practice of Parliament. If when half-past five is reached an Amendment to a question is then being decided by a Division, the time of the interruption of business is thrown forward. When the first question on the Amendment is decided, the main question is proposed, and if objection is taken thereto it is quite in order to move the closure pursuant to the new Standing Order. As for the entry in the Votes I do not observe anything which is irregular. I find it states that "Mr. W. H. Smith rose in his place and claimed to move 'That the Question be now put.'" It is quite competent for the right hon. Gentleman to move that Motion, at the time indicated, and it is the form in use since the new Standing Order, "Sittings of the House," came into force. But I must protest against any reference being made to me against any decision arrived at in Committee; and I have only entered thus far into the matter out of regard for the right hon. Gentleman and out of respect for the House generally. No irregularity occurred, in my opinion, but these proceedings were perfectly regular.

MR. SEXTON: Of course, Sir, I bow to your ruling, and I shall take the opinion of the House on another occasion. But in the matter of the accuracy of the records of the House, you surely, Sir, are the guardian of the House. The record states—

"It being after half-past five of the clock and objection being taken to further proceedings the Chairman rose to interrupt the business."

This statement is inaccurate, and that part of it with respect to objection being taken is incoherent and unintelligible.

*MR. SPEAKER: I will communicate with the right hon. Gentleman to see that the record is correct, but I have no reason at present to doubt its accuracy.

MR. COURTNEY: Perhaps I may be allowed to say one word. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Belfast has power to arraign my conduct in this particular, by a Motion made in the House, which is the proper step to take. What was done yesterday was strictly in accordance with the precedents which have been followed both in Committee and in the House. In the particular point to which he has called attention—as to the word "rose"—he is perhaps justified in his remark. The exact situation may be represented in this way. The Chairman rose, and thereupon he would have left the Chair, objection being taken to further proceeding, had not the right hon. Gentleman moved that the Question be now put. The only point is that the Chairman was on his legs throughout the incident, and therefore the word "rose" is inaccurate.

MR. SEXTON: I perfectly accept the right hon. Gentleman's explanation, but will he be good enough to see that the record corresponds with his narrative?

CLASS II.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £84,062, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1890, for the Salaries, Allowances, and Expenses and Pensions of various County Court Officers, of Divisional Commissioners and Magistrates in Ireland, and the Expenses of Revision."

*MR. A. PEASE (York): The Motion which stands in my name has been described in the public press as an attack upon the Resident Magistrates of Ireland. I demur to that description of it, for it is not my intention to attack the Resident Magistrates of Ireland generally, but rather to attack the system under which they are appointed, and the manner in which the Chief Secretary administers that system. So far from desiring to denounce the whole body of the Resident Magistracy, I would have them placed in a much higher position in the public estimation, where their impartiality and independence would be above suspicion. It will be my disagreeable duty to criticise the conduct of one or two individuals, but I do not desire to attribute the characteristics of these to the whole class to which they belong. Indeed, in some parts, at any rate of Ulster, the Resident Magistrates are the only Magistrates now saturated with Orange prejudices; and at the hands of the Stipendiary there is the only hope for the Nationalist to obtain that justice which is the birthright of every subject of the Crown. It is my sincere wish to ensure a respect for constituted authority, which is now impossible. I am aware the Chief Secretary and a certain number of hon. Gentlemen opposite look upon the Mr. Cecil Roches, the Captain Segraves, and the County Court Judge Webbs—the latter of whom earned, in some degree at any rate, his preferment to his present position through being assistant author of the articles "Parnellism and Crime," and who has shown his gratitude for his preferment by doubling or increasing on appeal the sentences passed on Members of this House, and other political opponents of the Chief Secretary—I know that these men are looked upon as saviours of society. They are not saviours of society; but I believe there have been Resident Magistrates, County Court Judges, and Judges of the High Court, who have stood between the Government and their attempt to prostitute and degrade the law for political purposes. While the Chief Secretary and a certain section of Irish officials, and those adventurers who may be described as men who bring their loyalty to market, have been engaged in working the law for their own ends, and to gratify a faction, and bringing thereby contempt upon the law, hatred upon its administration, making the rights of property intolerable, and depriving the people of their Constitutional liberty, there have been men in Ireland who have resisted the pressure of the Castle, of the Government, and that social pressure of the ascendancy class in Ireland, more potent because more insidious, there have been men who have endeavoured to give the same law to the Nationalist and the Catholic as to the Protestant and Tory. Now, we find from a Return laid before the House that all the 90 and odd members of the Resident Magistracy occupy their positions during pleasure, and whose pleasure? The pleasure nominally of the Lord Lieutenant, but the pleasure actually of the Chief Secretary. Sir, they occupy their position during the pleasure of a Party man and a Member of the Government. I imagine that in no country would such a state of things be looked upon as fair, either to the public at large or to that section of the judiciary to which these men belong, and I do not think it is fair to the Resident Magistrates themselves that they should feel that the retention of their position, and in some cases their very livelihood, depends, not upon the conscientious discharge of the duties of their office, but upon the favour of the Chief Secretary. Such a condition of service must, in the course of time, degrade the Bench in public estimation, and lead to a certain servility on the part of members of the Bench. I regard unquestioning obedience to the law the state of mind which a good Government should try to cultivate; but the present Administration by the methods they pursue, constantly raise in the minds of the people the questions: Are the trials fair trials, are the Justices who try the cases fairly appointed, and are the authorities anxious to secure fair trial for the prisoners, as they are to secure the convictions of the men brought before the Courts? When a Nationalist is brought before a political opponent presiding over one of these Courts, appointed partly on account of his Party bias by a political Minister with strong Party ties, to deal with a case into which political feeling enters very largely, I say the public at large naturally ask the question, is the tribunal a fair tribunal, and is the Magistrate fairly appointed? Now, let me call the attention of the Committee to the qualification of the Resident Magistrates for their office. Of the 90 and odd Resident Magistrates I find that 27 have served in the Army, the Indian Army, or the Militia. Now, it seems to me these are qualifications that do not commend themselves to the people, having regard to the tribunals before which their leaders are brought. They savour rather of a state of Martial Law than of what we expect to see in the United Kingdom under Constitutional Law, and under the reign of what we regard as the Ordinary Law. If we look to the former avocations of Resident Magistrates as given in the third column of this Return we find some very curious qualifications set down. I will not read the names of the Resident Magistrates, but if we commence with No. 7 on this list we find the name of a gentleman who is described as having formerly been a "resident county gentleman and Honorary Secretary to the Tipperary Agricultural Society." Well, I cannot for the life of me see in what way his having been Honorary Secretary to the Tipperary Agricultural Society could be a qualification for the position of a Stipendiary Magistrate in Ireland. The next on the list is described as having "served seven years in the 8th Hussars, and afterwards in the Militia"; the next "served in the Army, and was afterwards Assistant Commissioner in the Dublin Police"; the next "served as High Sheriff in County Limerick in 1881," and "kept all terms for the Bar, but for family reasons was not called." So I might go on through the list giving the qualifications for these gentlemen holding the position they do. There is another objection I take to the system under which Resident Magistrates now act, and that is that there is a confusion between their judicial and executive functions. Under Lord Spencer an effort was, I believe, made to prevent this confusion in the duties of the Resident Magistrates from arising, and to insure that the Magistrates who made orders in Court should not execute the decisions themselves. But now the spectacle is frequently seen of a Resident Magistrate adjudicating on a political case in Court, and then going out to give effect to the orders in person at the head of the police, and sometimes with a blackthorn in his hand, aiding the constables to baton the people. Before I have done I shall allude to some instances of this kind in respect to one Resident Magistrate; but I am glad to say that, so far as my own knowledge goes, it is the only case of a Resident Magistrate taking part in the beating and batoning of the people; there may be other cases, but they are not within my own knowledge. I may call attention to the dictum of an Irish Judge in reference to the Magistracy—it is old, but it is as applicable now as it was to the times in which it was delivered.

"But there is one remedy that would, in my estimation, more than any other, especially contribute to soothe the minds of the discontented peasantry and thereby enable them patiently to suffer the pressure of those burdens which cannot under existing circumstances be effectually removed; I mean the equal and impartial administration of justice. . . . It is not improbable that many men have crept into the Commission who, however useful they might occasionally have been, ought not to remain. The needy adventurer,—the hunter for preferment,—the intemperate zealot,—the trader in false loyalty,—the jobbers of absentees—if any of these various descriptions are found their names should be expunged from the Commission."

*THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): May I ask the hon. Gentleman who he is quoting from, and when and where this was said, and was it in reference to the ordinary Bench or to Resident Magistrates especially?

*MR. A. PEASE: The learned Judge was referring, I believe, to the whole Magistracy of the country. The name of the learned Judge was Fletcher. I cannot give the exact date, but he was delivering a charge to the Grand Jury in County Wexford.

MR. W. REDMOND: In 1814.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: That is a long time ago.

MR. E. HARRINGTON: So much the better.

*MR. A. PEASE: Well, I say some of these Resident Magistrates are unfitted by their previous training to adjudicate on the cases brought before them under the Crimes Act, and many others are equally unfitted for the executive functions they have to discharge. I have myself seen what I can only describe as the crazy ferocity of a Resident Magistrate almost bring about one of those scenes of bloodshed and brutality which are, unhappily, frequent in Ireland, events which, however much they may gratify the appetite of Tories for giving the Irish a lesson, do more to stimulate the passions of the people and to degrade the Executive, the administration of the law, and to injure the prospects of good orderly government than any other incidents whatever. In one particular instance I have in mind nothing but the good sense of the District Inspector who was at the head of a large force of constabulary and who very freely and liberally interpreted the orders he received prevented an inexcusable scene of wanton bloodshed and brutality. We had yesterday some strictures upon the conduct of the police, but I may say that, so far as my own experience goes, I have never seen the police behave badly except when they have been badly handled by the Resident Magistrates, and although the Resident Magistrates who have mismanaged the police do not form a large proportion of those whose names are mentioned in this Return, yet there have been occasions when the mismanagement of Resident Magistrates has brought about scenes that are a scandal to any civilised country. Such a scene was that at Mitchelstown, when Captain Segrave had command. Hon. Gentlemen opposite must be aware of the chronic disposition and mental attitude of some of these gentlemen towards the people at large. While travelling in the West of Ireland not so long ago, I, for the greater part of one day, had the companionship of a Resident Magistrate, and an agreeable, courteous, pleasant companion he was. In the course of conversation we got on to the question of hunting in the district, and the stopping of hunting by the occupiers of land in several parts of Ireland, and I asked if hunting had been so stopped in the district near where we then were. He informed me that an attempt had been made, but he said—

“We gave them a lesson on the first occasion when they tried to prevent us going on their land. We—and I suppose he was including other Magistrates;

“had the men before us and we gave them—I forget the exact sentence,

“but three or six months’ hard labour for objecting to our riding over their land.”

Now, if there is one amusement more than another that depends upon the good will of the agricultural community it is hunting. I was shocked, not only by the account of the punishment inflicted—I cannot myself understand how it could be inflicted; I do not think it could be legally inflicted [Hear, hear! from Mr. BALFOUR]; but we have a reckless executive in Ireland who obey no law but their will—but, as I was about to say, I was more shocked by the lightness with which my companion referred to the whole proceeding and the punishment awarded to these men. I can only say of the part of Yorkshire in which I reside that if there were landlords who set themselves to level and destroy the homes of the people as some Irish landlords have, then I should say that all those engaged in agriculture would be fully entitled to take every legal means in their power to prevent these exterminators—the devastators of the country and the burners and levellers of the people’s homes—from the amusement of riding over the fields of those whom they were persecuting. I say this, being myself a strong supporter of the sport. What shocked me more in the conversation with the Resident Magistrate, of whom I speak, was not so much what he said as the manner in which he said it. An incident, of which he seemed to be particularly proud, was having escorted a batch of 40 evicted tenants and their sons to Sligo, where they were sentenced to terms of imprisonment with hard labour for 12 or 18 months. I believe this gentleman to be an honourable and naturally a kindly-disposed man, but his mind appeared to me to be utterly corrupted by the brutal system which he had been called upon to carry out for a number of years. The system was bad enough before the Chief Secretary touched it, but the appointments made to the Magistracy since his time have been more scandalous than before. I was about to allude to Captain Segrave, but I am not quite sure whether his appointment was not made under the present President of the Board of Trade, so I pass that appointment by, and call particular attention to that of Mr. Cecil Roche. [Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: He was not appointed by me.] The right hon. Gentleman has told the House, however, that Mr. Cecil Roche had been advanced and promoted because he considered that his action in Ireland had deserved it. [Mr. BALFOUR: "Hear, hear."] Who was Mr. Cecil Roche? He was a gentleman who at General Election times was a lecturer and orator engaged on behalf of the Conservative Party. He was engaged by the Irish Loyal and Patriotic Union as an itinerant agitator. It seems to me, therefore, that while Houston and Pigott brought their loyalty to market and sold it to the Times, Mr. Cecil Roche did very much the same thing in selling his loyalty to the Chief Secretary. But those qualities which make an administrator hated and create ill-feeling and bitterness among classes in Ireland, seem to me to be the chief recommendations to distinction in the eyes of the Chief Secretary, and a speedy and direct road to promotion and reward. In the mere figures of the convictions recorded before Mr. Cecil Roche I think we have something like a fulfilment of the prophecy held out by Mr. M. Blake, who was Sessional Crown Solicitor for Cork, and who resigned that office on the passing of the Crimes Act. In his letter of resignation he said:—

"The nature of the procedure under the Crimes Act seems to me to deprive the Crown Prosecutor of any discretion in discriminating between the innocent and guilty—while the tribunal before which he would have to act appears scarcely to have the independence that, in my judgment, ought to characterise any court intrusted with the liberties of the people."

I have not been able to find out the full number of convictions in cases tried before Mr. Cecil Roche under the Crimes Act, but between March of last year and the previous August this Mr. Cecil Roche appears to have heard charges against 90 persons, of whom he convicted 84. These facts are surely significant of the temper of the man. A learned Judge of the High Court has expressed something very like contempt for these Courts. While Captain Plunkett has found a motto suitable for the Irish Constabulary policy of the Chief Secretary, Baron Dowse has found one for the right hon. Gentleman's Coercion Courts. Yesterday he said of them—

"I am no great admirer of these inferior Courts; it appears to me their motto is, 'I am Sir Oracle, let no dog bark.'"

Now it will be said that in the hearing of these cases Mr. Cecil Roche had the assistance of another Resident Magistrate; but everybody knows that every Resident Magistrate has to play second fiddle to Mr. Roche, and in one case he openly denounced as too lenient a sentence passed in his presence by the presiding Magistrate, Mr. Kilkelly, who thereupon asked Colonel Turner to relieve him from the duty of sitting with Mr. Roche again. Well, Mr. Roche is promoted, and Mr. Kilkelly is removed to another district. It is impossible to review anything like a considerable proportion of the cases tried before Mr. Cecil Roche, we shall never know what the common people have suffered at the hands of Mr. Roche; but we can gather some idea of it from what has happened in the cases of Members of this House. The wicked severity of Mr. Roche is illustrated by his sentencing the hon. Member for East Clare (Mr. Cox) to four months' imprisonment, on the charge of unlawful assembly, in attending a meeting in a proclaimed district and delivering a speech to his own constituents, the main burden of which was a denunciation of crime and outrage. The best comment upon the sentence is that the County Court Judge reduced it to one month's imprisonment as a first-class misdemeanant. At the risk of wearying the Committee to whom I know the reading of extracts is distasteful, I will read some passages from the speech of the hon. Member for Clare, including the incriminating language, and for this speech I ask the Committee to remember the hon. Member was sentenced by Mr. Roche to four months' imprisonment. Here is an extract from the speech delivered to his constituents:—

"I would implore the young men of Clare, and I wish my voice could reach the ears and hearts of every young man to-night, and this Lisdoonvarna case may point a moral if it cannot adorn a sad tale for them. Let them shun outrages and avoid the tempter to evil deeds as they would shun Satan himself, and if for no holier and higher motive, at least for the selfish motive of their own safety. There are foolish people in the country who think revenge should be wreaked for any petty act of local tyranny. I do not think the common sense of the country will accept their opinions and views against the opinions and views of our great leader, Mr. Parnell, or the greatest statesman of modern times, Mr. Gladstone. Wherever and whenever you meet with such men avoid and shun them, for, believe me, theirs is no good purpose. The louder they boast of their patriotism and what they are prepared to do and dare the more reason have you to shun them, for, believe me, nine out of every ten of such men are in the pay of our enemies. We have now the great Liberal Party of England at our back, with their great leader, Mr. Gladstone; we have the English democracy with us, as will be told to you in a few minutes by Mr. Conyngham. With such allies, nothing can stop or stay our march to liberty, save and except the commission of outrage, which must inevitably drive our allies from our side, and bring joy, hope, and satisfaction to the hearts of the miserable gang of coercionists—the Cullinane Balfour now in office. Harken, then, to the advice of the great leader who never yet gave wrong counsel or advice; follow the counsel of the veteran leader of the Liberal Party, be guilty of no crime or outrage, follow the open and Constitutional agitation which will certainly bring us to the goal of our long lost right! "Adhere to the doctrines and teachings of the National League—but I forget my friends. Balfour says the League has been proclaimed in Clare. I ask you, is it? [Loud shouts of "No!"] I wish Balfour were here to listen to that thundering shout; he would know the value you place on his proclamation. I beseech you all, young and old, to adhere to the Constitutional teachings of the National League."

Well, these utterances are the crime for which the hon. Member for East Clare was sentenced to four months' imprisonment. Next on the list we come to the treatment of the hon. Member for West Kerry. Mr. Roche sentenced the hon. Member for West Kerry (Mr. T. Harrington) to six months' hard labour for reporting in his own newspaper a speech delivered to his own constituents, and that sentence horrified and disgusted a good many Conservatives and honest Tories, and I believe has done more to throw light on the manner in which the Chief Secretary has the law administered in Ireland than any other sentence passed under the Crimes Act. The hon. Member for the Harbour

Division of Dublin (Mr. T. Harrington), who has had no connection with the paper for years, although by a clerical error his name appeared on the list of proprietors, was for the same offence in January, 1888, sentenced to six weeks' hard labour—an infamous sentence, the appeal against which has been taken to the High Court, without, however, any day having as yet been fixed for the hearing. This is in itself a significant commentary of the High Court on the action of the Chief Secretary from the Magistrate. Mr. W. O'Brien was sentenced by Mr. Roche to six months for alleged conspiracy; and the comment on this sentence by another County Court Judge was the reduction of it to six weeks. There are other cases on the list, but I think I have quoted enough to show what treatment the political opponents of the Chief Secretary have at the hands of Mr. Cecil Roche. I should like to quote what a London Unionist paper says with regard to some of these convictions—

"To us it appears clear that Mr. Roche, the Magistrate who tried Mr. T. Harrington's case, decided it contrary to the weight of evidence. There is an apparent vindictiveness about this prosecution which is not creditable to the Government. It will be said throughout Ireland, and with good reason, that Mr. T. Harrington has been prosecuted and convicted not because he had any connection with the Kerry Sentinel, but because he is Secretary of the Irish National League."

Then the article goes on to say—

"Even Irish County Court Judges are becoming ashamed of the petty and contemptible prosecutions of Mr. Balfour. Yesterday Judge Morris converted Mr. Sheehy into a first-class misdemeanant, at the same time strongly expressing himself against the infliction of degrading and humiliating punishments on political prisoners."

This is how Mr. Cecil Roche has distinguished himself in endeavouring to pass humiliating and degrading sentences on the political opponents of the Chief Secretary, and for this he has got his reward. Now, what sort of example do these gentlemen set, one of whose functions is to suppress the practice of boycotting in Ireland? The hon. Member for West Kerry alluded yesterday to this matter of boycotting on the part of Mr. Cecil Roche. That gentleman was solicited in the usual way for his annual subscription towards Tralee races, but he declined to have anything to do with the matter, and introduced for the first time a political element into these matters. He could not, he said, have his name associated with that of the hon. Member for West Kerry. The original letter of Mr. Cecil Roche, dated July 26th, has been put into my hand, and in this letter Mr. Roche declines a subscription on the ground that he does not feel justified in giving his support, owing to the presence on the Committee of an individual whom it was his painful duty to sentence to a term of imprisonment, and who, in his journal, systematically insulted those engaged in the maintenance of law and order. At the same time, there appears to be a letter from Colonel Turner, in which he says that under ordinary circumstances he would have been glad to subscribe, but as he saw in the list of stewards a person who had been a persistent breaker of the law and a constant traducer of the Royal Irish Constabulary, he must decline to do so. These two men, I say, are setting the example of boycotting to the country. I have always thought that even where a man has been a criminal, that having been convicted and suffered his term of imprisonment, he is to be regarded as having purged himself of his crime. I do not suppose that even Mr. Cecil Roche in his heart of hearts regarded the hon. Member as a criminal. And, now, I should like to give a few samples of the sentences passed by Mr. Cecil Roche. His sentences are the heaviest passed in any of the Coercion Courts in Ireland. In one case Dennis McNamara, of Banis, convicted of the crime of selling United Ireland, was, on November 26th, 1887, sentenced by Mr. Cecil Roche to seven days' imprisonment. This crime of selling United Ireland appears to have been committed in every part of the country, and yet this man alone appears to have been singled out for prosecution. A month afterwards, for a repetition of the same offence, the man was sentenced to two months' imprisonment with hard labour; and not long after that for displaying in the window of his grocer's a representation of a harp without a crown, and a shamrock with the motto, "God save Ireland" on it, he was brought up before Mr. Cecil Roche and fined £2. Sir, the device for the display of which this man was fined

£2 is to be seen in this Chamber, and, if it were daylight, it could be seen in the stained glass of the windows. If it is a crime to display such a device in Ireland, surely it should also be a crime to do it here. Besides being fined £2, this man was subjected to a course of petty persecution. Policemen were told off to take the names of the people entering his shop, and some were permitted to ransack his little place, take away a part of his stock-in-trade, the object, obviously, being to ruin him in his business. Then a man named Brosnan was sentenced by Mr. Cecil Roche to one month's imprisonment for selling United Ireland. A man named O'Rourke was sentenced to the same term of imprisonment for selling the Cork Herald, and Pat Ferriter was sentenced to three months' imprisonment with hard labour for selling United Ireland. There are a number of other cases tried by Mr. Cecil Roche where the sentences were equally atrocious from our point of view. There was the case of Moynahan and Quinlan, who were sent to prison for one month each for "something between a boo and a laugh, in fact a mongrel laugh;" and there is the case of M'Carthy, who was sentenced to 14 days' imprisonment for simply refusing to go off the footpath to make way for a policeman. Another man named Sullivan was sent to gaol for three months for "having arms in a proclaimed district," the "arms" consisting of a "heavy leaden bullet," which the man—against whom not a particle of evidence was brought—said he had seen in the road and had picked up for a marble. I could mention many other cases to show that amongst the most abominable and cruel sentences passed by any Resident Magistrate under the Coercion Act are those of Mr. Cecil Roche. But Mr. Cecil Roche has distinguished himself in another way. On a good many occasions after his wearying labours in the Coercion Court, he has taken relaxation in batoning the people. He did that at Miltown Malbay. A number of blacksmiths had been tried, or rather sentenced—for no evidence of conspiracy whatever was given—to imprisonment with hard labour, and a small crowd cheered them. The police charged the crowd, and Mr. Cecil Roche himself joined in the assault, striking the people with his stick. Then, again, on 12th January, 1888, at Dingle, a number of men were sentenced to imprisonment for one month for laughing and groaning at the police on their way to prevent a meeting of the National League. There was the usual termination to a Petty Sessions—a number of people gathered sympathising with the prisoners—the crowd was charged, and with 30 constables, Mr. Cecil Roche cruelly attacked the defenceless people and batoned them mercilessly. Then at Rathmore, on the 11th February, a number of men had been sentenced to three months' imprisonment with hard labour for a trivial and technical assault on the police, and as soon as the business of the Court was over Mr. Cecil Roche retired to the public street and batoned the people. I maintain that this is not only brutalising to the people, but degrading to the administrators of the law. I certainly consider that this gentleman whom the Chief Secretary has advanced and preferred on account of his services "in the cause of law and order in Ireland," is, perhaps, the worst case I could adduce. It is an illustration of the spirit and method of the Chief Secretary, and I shall ask the Committee—though I will not ask it to endorse all I have said in regard to this individual or any other individual—to support me when I move the reduction of this Vote, as a protest against the way in which this system is administered by the Chief Secretary, and against the system itself. I think that all men will in their calmer moments regard this system as one inimical to the partiality and independence of the Stipendiary Magistrates in Ireland. In order to test the feeling of the Committee on the question, I will conclude by moving the reduction of the Vote by £1,000.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £83,062 be granted for the said Service."—(Mr. Alfred Pease.)

MR. P. J. POWER (Waterford, E.): Various instances have been given by the hon. Gentleman who preceded me as to the manner in which the law is administered in Ireland. He has dealt with the action of Mr. Cecil Roche, and he has shown that a state of things prevails in Ireland which very few Members of this House could conceive.

Mr. A. Pease

So far as I am personally concerned—and I think I may say the same on behalf of my Colleagues in this House, and of hon. Members from Ireland generally—we should welcome heartily the appearance of English gentlemen amongst us, whatever their politics may be.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

MR. P. J. POWER proceeded: I think if they would only go to see the country, they would better understand the question; but they must not go and stay amongst partisans on either side. I believe that if a gentleman goes there and stays at hotels, he will soon learn for himself more in connection with the Irish Question than he could gain by any amount of reading. Now, the hon. Member for York has done that. In his speech he referred to two cases which were tried before the notorious Cecil Roche. I do not propose to deal with any other cases which come under the notice of that Stipendiary Magistrate for, probably, some of my hon. Friends sitting around me, and especially my hon. Friend the Member for Kerry, who has experienced the leniency of that Magistrate, will be better able to say a few words as to his administration of justice. I desire to point out this—that nowadays in Ireland they do not go through the form of reading the Riot Act; they declare a meeting illegal and immediately order the police to baton the people indiscriminately. I have in my hands a case tried by two Magistrates, in which a number of people were accused of unlawful assembly, and that assembly consisted of a demonstration of sympathy with the families of men who had been imprisoned under the Coercion Act. Now, the constables who gave evidence in the case said that no disturbance or disorder of any kind occurred. There was merely a procession of men and carts bearing presents for the families of the imprisoned men. But it was a glaring case in the eyes of the Magistrates, and the result was that two men were sentenced to two months' imprisonment for taking part in the demonstration, and a number of other men got six weeks' hard labour for the same so-called offence. It may be ancient history, but I should like again to draw the attention of the Committee to the action of one of the principal Stipendiary Magistrates in Ireland who administered so-called justice in Cork and the adjoining counties. Every person interested in our country is, I think, prepared to admit that it is absolutely necessary, if the country is to be prosperous, that respect for law and order should exist, but we say that if you want to have order in any community, the first thing to do is to appoint capable and impartial men to administer just and even-handed law. The right hon. Gentleman when he carried his Coercion Bill through the House of Commons assured hon. Members that he had no intention whatever of interfering with the liberty of the press, but my hon. Friend the Member for the City of York has pointed out case after case in which newsvendors have been imprisoned for long terms of hard labour for selling papers which can be sold with impunity on this side of St. George's Channel. Even to-night, on my road down to the House, I bought a copy of United Ireland, which contained reports of meetings of suppressed branches of the National League. The vendor of that paper to me will certainly not be prosecuted, but people selling a copy of the same paper in Ireland are subject to prosecution. But now I wish to call attention to the case of Captain Segrave. I may be told that Captain Segrave's case is still under consideration, but may I point out that there are scores of people in Ireland who are suffering long terms of imprisonment, many with hard labour, and who have been sentenced by benches of Magistrates on which this gentleman occupied the principal position? Unfortunately we hear no expression of hope from hon. Gentlemen opposite that the persons who have been so sentenced shall be set at liberty. One of the most disastrous occurrences in Ireland was that at Mitchelstown, and at the inquest which was held in connection with it, touching the murder of the three people who lost their lives on that occasion, Captain Segrave was called as a witness, and I propose now to quote the account which this gentleman gave of himself on oath, and I will then ask the House whether they expect the people of Ireland or of any other country to respect the law which is administered by a gentleman of that description. Captain Segrave was first asked—"Where did you get your legal training for the position of Stipendiary Magistrate?" and he replied that he had no legal training for that position. Then he was asked, "Where did you get your military training?" His answer was, "In South Africa," and my hon. Friend who was cross-examining him on that occasion very properly remarked, "And a good place, too, to teach men to deal with an Irish crowd." It appears there was a little irony in that remark, for it was about that time that the Prime Minister had shown his good taste by speaking of the Irish as a nation of Hottentots, and therefore Africa must have been a good place to which to send a Stipendiary Magistrate in order to teach him how to deal with Hottentots. The examination continued:—

"Q. Did you ever get a commission in the Army? A. No.—Q. Did you try? A. I did.—Q. Did you fail? I did.—Q. Did you try once more? A. I tried once more for the preliminary examination. I passed the second time.—Q. Did you try again for the Commission? A. I did.—Q. Did you fail? A. I did, but not very ignominiously.—Q. How long after that did you go to the Cape? A. Not long after. I went into the Frontier Mounted Police there. I remained there a little over three years, and then left. I left the force a private. They did not seem to appreciate service there, for promotion was not rapid.—Q. Would a policeman be guilty of dereliction of his duty if he did not give your message to the County Inspector? A. I do not know. I suppose he would.—Q. Then you don't know anything about constabulary law? A. No.—Q. Had you the command of the constabulary that day? A. Yes. I was in command on that day.—Q. Did you ever see the Police Code? A. No.—Q. Were you ignorant of the instructions in the Code as to firing? A. Yes; I was.

Now, Mr. Courtney, let me point out to the Committee that this is not the description given by one of us of this Magistrate. It is a description which he gave of himself upon oath, and when hon. Gentlemen talk to us about our want of respect for law and order in Ireland, I ask them whether they themselves could respect law if it were administered by men of this description, and whether they would think of insulting the people of this country by allowing such men to administer the English law. I could give instance after instance of the doings of this gentleman, but I shall be followed by some of my hon. friends, who have had more experience of the way in which coercion is administered in Ireland, and to them I will leave the duty of further dealing with this topic. Unfortunately the Stipendiary Magistrates have not only our liberty in their hands, but they have likewise the levying of the taxes. Hon. Members may not agree with that, but I say it is so, because they get up riots and then bring down the police and military at enormous expense to the people, without consulting the local Magistrates. I could give a case which occurred in the city of Waterford in which the Stipendiary Magistrates disregarded the views of the entire Bench of local Magistrates—of Conservatives as well as of Liberals—who wished that a certain demonstration should be allowed to continue, as it always had been allowed—namely, a celebration in honour of the Manchester Martyrs. But the Stipendiary Magistrates disregarded the unanimous vote of the local Magistrates, and insisted that if a meeting were held it should be broken up. What was the result? The meeting was held, and a violent collision took place between the people and the police. Now, in the Debate which took place yesterday, the Chief Secretary made allusion to the trial which took place at Carrick-on-Suir, in which my hon. Friend the Member for North-East Cork was concerned, and he gave the House the impression that my hon. Friend deliberately left the Court before the proceedings terminated. Now, I was present on that occasion, and I say that the course which was taken was brought about by the conduct of the Resident Magistrates, and was not pre-conceived or pre-arranged in any way. In the first instance, as we approached the Court we found that a large cordon of police had been drawn across the street, and these men placed their bayonets against our breasts as we approached them. My hon. Friend was grossly assaulted. Several times he was thrust back with the butt-end of muskets, while the hon. Member for Longford, who was attending in his legal capacity to defend the hon. Member for North-East Cork, was also assaulted in a most aggravated form. At last we got into the Court, where the two Removables were sitting. The Court was by no means an open one, and the public were excluded. A lady, the sister of the late John Mandeville, who was sent to an early grave by the action of the Government, sought admission, but I suppose as it was known she was in sympathy with my hon. Friend she was refused the right to enter, and it was not until my hon. Friend the Member for North-East Cork himself went out of the Court and insisted on her admission that she was allowed to enter. What caused my hon. Friend to leave the Court was this. A slight demonstration took place in the gallery; I have heard demonstrations more pronounced at the New Law Courts in London. The Stipendiary Magistrates at once ordered the galleries to be cleared. My hon. Friend the Member for Longford asked the people not to make any further demonstration, and assured the Bench that if they were allowed to remain they would accede to his request. But it was of no use. The Stipendiary Magistrates insisted on the galleries being cleared. My hon. Friend said:—

“If this is not to be an open Court, and if the people are to be batoned out of the galleries, then I also will leave with them.”

And I believe I never saw a more pronounced specimen of incapacity on the part of the Magistrates than that I witnessed on that occasion, for my hon. Friend the Member for North-East Cork, in spite of the order of the Magistrates, which somehow was not conveyed to the police, walked quietly away, and soon afterwards left the town. The Magistrates at once issued a warrant for the arrest of my hon. Friend, and then adjourned the Court until the following day. In that little town—in this country you would only call it a village—there were 180 armed policemen, and the Stipendiary Magistrates, finding they could not secure his arrest, gave orders for 150 additional policemen and two companies of military to be drafted into the town on the following morning. What was the result? The Court sat the next morning. The Court House was surrounded by this large force of police and military. My hon. Friend's name was called inside and outside the Court. At that time he was many miles away on his road to Manchester to address the constituents of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland. But what I wish to point out more particularly is that this little community was put to great expense by the action of the Stipendiary Magistrates, and this, I think, justifies my assertion that the Magistrates not only have the lives and liberties of the people in their hands, but they have also the imposing of taxes upon them. I wish further to point out that the present coercion is aimed not at crime and criminals, but at political opponents and at political organisations, and its main objects are to break down organisations which have been found to be absolutely necessary for the preservation of the lives of the people. Now, I should like to read to this Committee a statement made by the County Court Judge at Waterford. In addressing the Grand Jury at Quarter Sessions the learned Judge said:

"I have examined the records of the past year, and I am glad to be able to tell you, as you will be glad to hear, that the amount of crime in the county and city of Waterford investigated in this Court during the year 1887 is very light—I may say insignificant. It consists of only 15 cases of the ordinary nature which require no comment from me, and considering that the population of the county and the city at the last census was 112,768, the number of 15 cases may reasonably be called small. But, gentlemen," added the learned Judge, "you have no reason to pride yourselves in this county on being exceptionally free from crime. I am, as you are aware, County Court Judge for two other counties, Cavan and Leitrim, and I am sorry to tell you that the record in Waterford, light as it is, is the heaviest of the three. In Cavan, with a population of 129,000 people, there were only 14 cases; while in Leitrim, with a population of 89,000, I had only 11 cases returned for trial. The total of the three counties is 40 cases, and it may be observed that the cases returned for trial to Quarter Sessions do not represent the criminal state of the county. I have also obtained the number of cases returned for trial to the Assizes of each county, and I find they are fully as"—

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! I do not see how that is connected with this Vote.

MR. P. J. POWER: I am endeavouring to connect it in this way: I wish to prove that there is little or no crime in the county, but that, owing to the representations of these Stipendiary Magistrates that there is a good deal of crime, we are deprived of the ordinary privileges of a Constitutional people. I will not much longer dilate upon this subject, but I should like to draw attention to the fact that, owing to the representations of these Stipendiary Magistrates, many people who are returned for trial by these Magistrates are drafted to Belfast and elsewhere to be tried. I wish to prove that there is absolutely no need for the services of the Stipendiary Magistrates. So far from repressing crime, they stimulate it. I should like to quote some further remarks by this County Court Judge with regard to how the juries do their duty. He said—

"I have made an examination of the criminal statistics of England and Scotland, and I find, strange to say, that the rate of convictions to committals in Waterford bears exactly the same proportion as it does in England and Wales, while in Leitrim the percentage of convictions as compared with committals is 82, and that is a greater percentage than is to be found in any part of Great Britain."

Owing to the representations of the Stipendiary Magistrates we have been called upon in Waterford to pay a sum of over £800 for special police purposes. Now the principal Stipendiary Magistrate in my district is Captain Slack, one of the best men to ride to hounds in the South of Ireland, and that is his principal qualification for the post he holds. How does he use the extra police which, owing to his representations, are drafted into this part of the country? Many hon. Gentlemen, I know, are fond of the sport of fox-hunting, but they wish to enjoy it in the ordinary way with the concurrence of the farmers and the people. But the Stipendiary Magistrates in my part of the country carry on their sport only through the assistance of these extra police, and there has hardly been a hunt lately in that part which was not followed by the police on outside cars. I think very few hon. Gentlemen sitting in this House would care to carry on their sport under such humiliating conditions. They would prefer to hunt over the land with the concurrence of the farmers and of the people. I may add that the Marquess of Waterford has never consented to hunt under these humiliating circumstances. It is only since he left, and since these Stipendiary Magistrates have been left to themselves that the hunting has been of this nature. In conclusion, allow me to say in regard to the suggestion which is often made, that the same law prevails in England as in Ireland, that I foresee one great difficulty with which we shall have to contend when we obtain the management of our own affairs, and that difficulty is that we shall have to wean the people from the idea that the law is not even-handed, for owing to the administration of these Stipendiary Magistrates no one can possibly believe that justice is even-handed in Ireland.

MR. WADDY (Lincolnshire, Brigg): I desire to state to the House not mere theory, but, as far as I am able to do so quietly, I desire to describe what I myself have seen in Ireland, and I do so because one of the difficulties we are in in this House is this, that whenever any facts are stated or are contained in a question asked from these Benches, the answer we are invariably met with is, "According to my information it is not so." What that information is we can never ascertain, and we can, therefore, only state here over and over again, upon our honour as English gentlemen and as Members of this House, that which is within our knowledge. We believe that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary is often deluded by the information given him, and that he publishes to the country reports which are absolutely false. This is not a wholly financial question which we are discussing; it involves an important principle connected with the system of Resident Magistrates, who are, after all, a necessary part of a system which is bad as bad can be. I am not prepared to find so much fault as some people with the Government for having Resident or Removable Magistrates; they could not get on without them. Of course, if they were carrying on Constitutional Government they would not need such weapons as these. Let us look a little at the details of this Estimate. I presume we are dealing with the items under letters D, E, F, G, and H on page 311 of the Estimates. If so, we are in this position. We have, first, Executive officers, then we have Magistrates, and both for the Executive officers and the Magistrates you are asking not only salaries and incidental expenses, but you demand also travelling expenses for Magistrates whom you call Resident Magistrates, and who naturally would not be expected to need much in the way of travelling expenses. But, as a fact, they are not Resident Magistrates; they are Magistrates sent about from one part of the country to another for the special purpose of turning the regular, the recognised, and the legally appointed Magistrates out of their seats, in order that they may do the special work for which they are appointed, and for which they are supposed to be qualified. Why do the Government send the men up and down the country in this fashion? Why do they take two gentlemen far away from their homes to do this work? Why do they not trust it to the people on the spot? If it is because they must have men of superior capacity and with a most profound knowledge of the law, persons well acquainted with the natures, feelings, and idiosyncracies of the people amongst whom they live—if that is the reason for the appointment of these Magistrates then we can understand the action of the Government. But let us look at the qualifications of these men. There are 76 of these officials. Five of them are described as practising barristers, how much practice they ever had I do not know. In addition to that six others have been called to the bar; that they may well have been and not have got much farther. At any rate, I will assume that they got some knowledge of law before being called to the bar. Now these 11 are all out of the 76 who can be said to have had any definite and distinct legal training for this work for which they are supposed to be so specially fitted as to justify their being sent rampaging up and down the country, and turning the proper Magistrates out of their seats. 13 others of these Magistrates had been in the Commission of the Peace. Two of them had modestly fitted themselves for this work by having had previously no vocation at all, three had been specially prepared by occupying positions in connection with the collection of taxes, 27 were broken down failures from the Army, Navy, and Militia, and 22 had been in the Constabulary, thus making 49 militiamen, policemen, soldiers, and sailors.

ADMIRAL FIELD (Sussex, Eastbourne): Do not say sailors.

MR. WADDY: I am not at all surprised to hear an hon. and gallant Member who is such an ornament to his profession say, in a piteous and beseeching way, "not sailors." Of course, they are not such sailors as he commanded; they are the failures. Yet this principle of selection is still going on. I find on page 23 there is a very singular entry. It is—

"Allowance to four County Inspectors at head-quarters of Divisional Commissioners, £50 per annum each, and two ditto at 10s. per day each when acting as Divisional Magistrates in the Northern and Western Divisions."

This is not very clear, but it is not the policy of the Government to make these things clear. All I can say is that there exists a disgraceful system which must produce disgraceful results. We know beyond all possibility of doubt that the travesty of justice which takes place in this country of Ireland is simply and absolutely disgraceful. It is quite possible that some of these Magistrates desire to do what is right and proper, but it is difficult to have faith in some of them. What took place at Killeel only the other day? There had been a series of evictions carried out in the immediate neighbourhood, and a summons had been issued—rightly, I dare say—by the police against those who had been defending their houses. Well, some of the people imagined that they had ground of complaint against the police, and they consequently applied to two Magistrates to issue a summons. The application was refused, one of the Magistrates saying he was present at the time the offence was alleged to have been committed; he had as much to do with it as anybody. He could scarcely be expected to issue a summons against persons who had been acting with him. He, therefore, suggested that the application should be made to another Magistrate. This was done, and the summonses obtained. But when they came on for hearing the police did not attend. Of course, had an Irish Member of Parliament so acted he would have been arrested. But with the police such conduct did not matter. The cases stood over, and at the adjourned hearing two Resident Magistrates put in an appearance, presumably on the ground that the local justices were not qualified to or justified in trying offences under the Crimes Act. When the summonses came on a solicitor stood up and said he had instructions from Dublin Castle to protest against the cases being gone into. He was asked upon what ground, and he exclaimed, "What! put the Constabulary on their trial? It is monstrous and ought not to be allowed." That reason, however, did not seem quite satisfactory even to a Resident Magistrate, and accordingly an effort was made to find another. The summons itself, which was legally issued and properly signed, was examined, and the presiding Magistrate said, "It ought to have been obtained in this Court." The explanation was tendered that it was applied for, but on the suggestion of one of the Magistrates the application was withdrawn and made in another Court. Yet the Resident Magistrate pretended to believe that this afforded a sufficient reason for not calling on the constabulary to answer the charge. He said he should dismiss the summons. It was pointed out that he must give the grounds for dismissal, but he declined to do that, and simply wrote upon the summons the words, "No rule" or "No order." Not even a witness was sworn, nor was the prosecuting counsel heard. Is that even-handed justice? Now it appears to me that the ground of complaint against the police was a perfectly good and satisfactory one. It was this, that at the scene of the evictions there were two women living, both bearing the same surname, and the battering ram was used by the police on the door of the wrong woman's house. She naturally objected and asked for the summons. If that had been heard it may have been that the Magistrate would have deemed a small fine sufficient, or even the payment of the damage actually done, but the Court refused to hear the summons, and I say that refusal was a denial of justice which no lawyer, and indeed no man of sense and honesty will attempt to defend. Now that is not a solitary case, such things occur in every direction. I have stated the facts calmly and deliberately and without colouring, and I invite an answer. These people were poor people and they could not afford to appeal. You are doing in Ireland that which is most fatal to be done in any country. You may tyrannise over people and yet not do a fatal wrong, but the one thing which must be fatal to that peace between those two countries is this: if you once saturate the people of Ireland with a conviction, that not only you do not care for them, but that you deliberately poison the fountains of justice and refuse them their ordinary rights in a Court of Justice, it will be impossible to preserve peace. By giving the people cause to distrust your administration of justice—as I am sorry to say you are doing—by this system of appointing Resident Magistrates who are utterly unfit for the work, but who are at your beck and call, and do not hesitate to say openly in Court that they are specially sent to try particular cases—you are preparing for yourselves or for others a harvest of hatred which may become far more like a revolution than anything which, thank God, we have seen during the last 20 years.

*MR. P. J. O'BRIEN (Tipperary, N.): On a recent occasion I attempted to bring under the notice of the right hon. Gentleman who is responsible for the maintenance of law and order in Ireland a case of cruelty, hardship, and injustice perpetrated on one of my constituents by a gentleman who, unfortunately for them, occupied a position of Resident Magistrate; and on that occasion the right hon. Gentleman gave a distinct denial of the facts I laid before him. I now intend, Mr. Courtney, to go more fully into the case, in the hope that I may still be able to get some redress. The case I refer to is one which was tried before Colonel Waring and Mr. Meldon at Cloughjordan, County Tipperary, and it was a charge against a trader named O'Reilly, who was charged with using violence and intimidation towards one Thomas Fox, an emergency bailiff and caretaker, who was at the time in charge of a farm lately in the occupation of Mrs. Angelina Moroney and others. Mr. George Bolton, who generally takes charge of prosecutions in this county, was present, and in his statement on behalf of the Crown he said—

"O'Reilly was manager of his father's public-house, had been for some time, and had entire control of the business."

"When this man Fox went into the shop he called him a blackguard and a bailiff, and shoved him from the house, using a considerable amount of violence. I am very sorry that this should have occurred, as this has been in the past a most peaceable district. In fact, the most peaceable portion of the county. But this is no excuse for the conduct of the defendant."

John Fox was then examined and deposed:—

Mr. Waddy

"I am a Sheriff's bailiff; I reside at Thurles; I was at Coolnagown farm on the 21st May, when the Sheriff got possession, and I was placed there as caretaker; I remained there until the 5th July, on which day I came into Cloughjordan to make purchases; I went into the public-house of Michael O'Reilly; I asked him for a bottle of porter; 'I am engaged,' said he, 'call again in an hour's time; I went away then and returned in an hour's time' he was then standing behind the counter; I asked him for a bottle of porter, he said, 'What brought you in here, you scamp; you blackguard, you bailiff?' he called me a ballad singer, too.—MR. NOLAN: May be you are a ballad singer.—Witness (continuing): He came from behind the counter and caught me by the breast and shoved me out; he then gave me two boxes of his clinched fist on the breast; I am not aware of any cause for this except that I am a Sheriff's bailiff and acting as caretaker over those lands; Constable Farrell was in the shop looking on; I then went to the police barrack; the defendant followed me over; he repeated the names again which he called me in the shop, and said if ever he caught me there again he would kick me out; I was never a ballad singer; I earn my living honestly.—MR. NOLAN: That is a slander on the fraternity of ballad singers."

Fox was then cross-examined by Mr. Nolan, solicitor for the defence, and I think I cannot do better than quote the newspaper report. He said:—

"I am living in this locality since the 21st May, and no person molested me, except the shopkeepers who insulted me. It is a peaceable and respectable locality. I am Sheriff's bailiff for eight years; I was a basket-maker up to that; I was not in jail.—MR. NOLAN: Did I not see you in the dock myself? You did, I was there for drunkenness, I swear that I was not drunk more than five times; I was in Nenagh jail several times; I was never in Clonmel jail; it is ten years since I was in jail; I was fined 6s. 6d. in Dundrum for being drunk; the Sheriff brought me here; I never spoke to Mr. O'Reilly in my life until the 5th June; he was leaving the shop with a book in his hand; when I left Mr. O'Reilly's I did not go into another public-house during the hour; it was not to get up the prosecution against him I went in; I went there for porter; my demeanour was not offensive to him.—MR. NOLAN: Did he not say you had a great deal of impertinence to address him the way you did while he was engaged transacting business with a commercial gentleman? On my oath he did not.—Witness (continuing): He said that if there was nobody else to do away with me he would. There was a policeman there.—MR. BOLTON (re-examined): I went into two other houses that day for tobacco; I tendered the money for the goods and they refused supplying me.—MR. NOLAN: My client is not charged with conspiracy.—To Mr. Nolan:—I got no porter that day in town.—On your solemn oath now did you? I do not want to catch you. I did, I got one pint of porter at the public-house next the barrack. It was in the evening."

This concluded his examination, and Constable Patrick Farrell was next examined by Mr. Bolton. He said :—

"I am a constable in the R.I.C. stationed at Cloughjordan. He then handed in two copies of the Dublin Gazette, one the 23rd July, '87, and the other the 16th July, '87, containing the proclamation of the County Tipperary and notice thereof under the Criminal Law Procedure (Ireland) Act, '87. I was in O'Reilly's public-house on duty on the 5th June; I saw John Fox going in there: I saw Michael O'Reilly in the house; he was outside the counter to the best of my recollection; Fox asked for a bottle of stout, but did not get it; he asked Michael O'Reilly for the stout. Mr. O'Reilly put his two hands on his shoulders, and told him to leave the shop, that he was a scamp or a bailiff, or something like that, and that he was interfering with his business. Fox was then quietly shoved out, and I followed him to the door. Mr. O'Reilly seemed to be excited; I followed him to the door and saw him go in the direction of the barrack. In my opinion he asked for the porter in a rather peremptory tone. There was nothing else disorderly in Fox's conduct.—To Mr. Nolan: It was about five o'clock p.m., when Fox came in, and he demanded to get porter in a peremptory manner. I would not ask it the same way myself. It would excite a man the way he asked it; Mr. O'Reilly did nothing, only put his hand on his shoulder and ordered him out; I was stationed at Thurles and I know Fox's character, which is a bad one; I heard him say that Mr. O'Reilly came at him like a lion. There is not one word of truth in that; he did not strike him; he did not make use of the words—'I will do away with you,' which is unknown to me."

Sergeant Shumacker was next examined, and he deposed :—

"I am stationed at Thurles; on the 5th June Fox came to the barrack to make a complaint; O'Reilly followed him and said he was a scamp, a blackguard, and a ballad singer.—To Mr. Nolan: I do not know about his being a bad character; I found him in company with a bad character woman one night when I was stationed at Thurles; he was often up for drunkenness; Mr. O'Reilly came to the barrack to complain of his conduct."

Therefore the evidence of the prosecutor in this case was most distinctly contradicted by the testimony of the police. But, in addition to that, we have the evidence for the defence, for Mr. William O'Meara, Toomavara, was examined by Mr. Nolan, and deposed :—

"I was in Mr. O'Reilly's public-house on the 5th June; he (Mr. O'Reilly) was transacting business with a commercial man, when Fox came in and asked for porter in an authoritative manner; Mr. O'Reilly told him he was engaged; Fox gave Mr. O'Reilly some back answer, and he (Mr. O'Reilly) pushed him out; I saw Fox go to the barrack; I did not hear Mr. O'Reilly say he would do away with Fox before he shoved him out."

The Magistrates retired to consider their decision, and after a short absence returned to Court, when Major Waring said :—

"We take into account the peaceable condition of the district, and will require the defendant to give bail, himself in £40, and two sureties in £20 each, or in default one month's imprisonment."

The consequence was, Mr. Courtney, that this unfortunate man, who was the only person in charge of the establishment at the time, his aged father being very sick, had to decide whether he would go to gaol, and shut up the shop with a probable result of bankruptcy, or whether he would give bail. He gave the bail, and I now ask the right hon. Gentleman whether, having heard the true facts which I have narrated, and what I believe to be a verbatim report of what occurred at the hearing, he will give his attention to the case, and take from this unfortunate man the stigma of having had to give bail when he had committed no offence whatsoever? Before I sit down, I wish to illustrate still further the class of gentlemen who act as Resident Magistrates. The circumstance I now desire to bring under the attention of the Committee occurred in the town of Nenagh, where two priests were charged before the Removable Magistrates under circumstances which naturally excited intense indignation in the district. The town, on the occasion of the trial, was crowded with people from the surrounding districts. It so happened that as usual the worst possible man was put in charge of the Constabulary on that occasion. Major Waring was placed in authority, and I propose to endeavour to describe his conduct on that day. He was observed riding up and down the town from early morning, trying to find out some excuse for batoning the people. Eventually, in the evening, when he found that the conduct of the people afforded him no opportunity of assaulting them, he detailed a force of cavalry, and ordered them to parade up and down the roadway, thereby driving all the people on to the footpaths, and while they were crowded on the footways, he (Major Waring) gave orders to the Lancers to charge on to the defenceless people, and had they not taken refuge in the shops adjacent bloodshed, if not murder, would have been the result. This, Sir, is the conduct of one of the men in whose hands the Government place the lives and liberties of our people. It is only natural that such conduct should excite general indignation, and I have brought this case before the Committee, in the hope that it will have some effect upon the Chief Secretary, and influence him to relieve Mr. O'Reilly from this injustice done him—as also to modify his general course of action, namely, oppression of the Irish people.

*MR. H. J. WILSON (Holmfirth, W. R., Yorkshire): I wish to state one or two things that have come under my observation in Ireland. I was in Ireland at the time my hon. Friend the Member for North Roscommon (Mr. O'Kelly) was tried, and, without going into the details of the charge against him, I may say he was charged with conspiracy, and, among other things, evidence was given of meeting his friends, and it was suggested by a policeman who had been looking through a window at the time, that the hon. Gentleman appeared to be taking tea with some of his constituents. I believe the hon. Member had given advice to his constituents, such as, I hope, I should have the courage to give to mine under similar circumstances. But the particular point to which I wish to direct attention is, that the constable who gave the evidence read from a small bit of paper the names of the persons who, he said, were present at one of the meetings the hon. Member had addressed, and when asked whether he made that list out at the time he stated he had not. He was then asked when did he put the names on the paper, and he said on the previous evening. When asked what he had copied it from, he said from his book. Where was his book? was the question next put to him, and he replied, it was at the barracks. An appeal was then made to the Bench that the constable should be ordered to produce the book, and the Bench directed that it should be produced on the following day. When the next morning came, and the book was called for, the County Inspector came forward and said he had received a telegram from Dublin Castle stating that the book was not to be produced. Now, I have no great knowledge of the law; I have not specially studied it; but I know something of the practice of the Borough Bench of Sheffield, on which I have the honour to have a seat, and I have also consulted persons of experience in this country, and I have found no one who has any idea of the possibility of such a thing occurring in England, as that a Bench of Magistrates should order a book to be produced and that it should be refused by orders from any authority. Though, of course, in this case, where the Magistrates were removable by the authorities at Dublin Castle it may easily be understood that they would not feel inclined to disobey the orders of their superiors. But I ask what would any Bench of Magistrates in England say if they were dealt with in a similar manner, no matter where the order came from? I have looked at one or two of the manuals that have been published for the use of police officers, and I find that in the manual written by Major Bicknell and which is very extensively used by the police, it is stated that—

“If a constable refers to his notes in the witness box, it is competent to the prisoner's counsel to examine the note-book and cross-examine him on its contents.”

Now, I should like to know from the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary whether such a procedure as I have described is justified by the Code in use among the Irish police as to which I have already vainly endeavoured to obtain information from him? If that be the case we ought to know it. I asked Mr. Wellington Colomb, who is a high authority in Dublin Castle, whether this alleged right on the part of the Irish Executive had ever been brought before the higher courts, and he told me he was not aware that it had, and, therefore, was unable to refer me to anything of the kind; but, he added, it would be exceedingly inconvenient for the Executive to produce such books. No doubt it would; but, I said, in England we do not consider the convenience of the Executive; we only consider what is just to the accused. I wish to mention another matter, and would remind the Committee that a straw will show how the wind blows. I allude to the way in which the Courts in Ireland are arranged. The police stand in a row, with their helmets on, between the Bench and Counsel, and the people, who although deeply interested spectators, are almost blotted from sight and almost equally cut off from sound—a thing which we in this country would be very sorry to see. I may also point out that there is in this Vote a very large sum charged for the travelling expenses of the Resident Magistrates. No less than £17,000 is put down under this head, one item of £8,200 being for travelling allowances in lieu of forage, and the other £8,800 for travelling and personal expenses. It seems to me that this is a large sum of money for these gentlemen to spend in running about the country, and as I cannot understand it, I should like to have some information from the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary as to why these charges have run up so enormously. I find that though the salaries have actually fallen since 1886-7 from £43,000 to about £40,000, and the allowance in lieu of forage remains the same, the charge for travelling and personal expenses has increased from £4,500 to £8,800. I should be glad of an explanation of this. Besides the cost, look at the enormous waste of time that must take place while these Magistrates are racing up and down the country. I find Mr. Irwin, R.M., who is chiefly engaged about Limerick and Clare, going off by Cork and Bandon, 109 miles, to Ballinspittle, and then back again 159 miles to Miltown Malbay, and then back to Cork again. Then there is Mr. Cecil Roche. In 1886 he was making violent partisan speeches in the constituency in which I live. Now he is dispensing what is called "justice" in Ireland. I trace him travelling from Castleisland to Ennis, and afterwards back again to Killarney. Each of these journeys is rather more than 100 miles, which is not serious on a good English railway, but the trains are so timed on those Irish lines that each of those journeys would occupy from 8 in the morning till 5 or 6 at night, and thus he must spend three days to do one day's duty. This seems to show bad organisation and arrangement. A great deal of the time so spent might be economised, and if this were done a smaller number of Magistrates would suffice. Of course, the expenditure and loss of time on the part of the Magistrates also to a considerable extent applies to the police.

I do not know how many constables have to attend upon the Resident Magistrates when they travel; but I remember when I was at Ballinasloe seeing a Resident Magistrate there attended by a little guard of honour of the constabulary, one man taking his hat-box, and another his trunk, while others stood admiringly round the door as he entered the omnibus. If, therefore, all these expenses were added together they would make a very considerable sum. I will, however, minimise my remarks. [Cheers from the Ministerial Benches.] I shall not bring my remarks to a close because of those cheers, which would rather induce me to go on. [Cries of "Go on" from below the Opposition Gangway.] I do not wish to go on. All I will say in conclusion is that, I want to know from the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary, first, as to why and how, if the law be the same in the two countries, a telegram from Dublin Castle privileges a note-book and prevents its being produced; and, secondly, why the Resident Magistrates do not stay and administer the law in their own districts instead of running about all over the country at an immense cost to the taxpayers?

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Gentleman who has just sat down has asked for information on two specific points and with regard to one of those points—namely, the travelling expenses of the Resident Magistrates, I think the same point was taken up by the hon. Member for Lincolnshire, and I hope to be able to offer explanations which, if not wholly satisfactory to them, at any rate ought to satisfy the Committee. A criticism was passed by the hon. Gentleman who moved the reduction of the Vote on the fact that under the present system in Ireland executive and judicial functions are vested in the same individual. Now, it is the particular desire of the Government to prevent in any case the same Magistrate having to carry out both official and judicial functions in respect of one transaction, and in order to effect that object it may obviously be necessary to bring into the district of one Resident Magistrate another Resident Magistrate who has had nothing to do with the case on which he is asked to adjudicate.

An hon. MEMBER: No.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Well, it is a general rule. Of course, the Magistrate who is brought in from the outside has to travel, and he sometimes has to travel by branch lines, a fact of which complaint is made on the ground of the length of time consumed. The other point made by the hon. Member had reference to proceedings of which he appears to have been an eye-witness on the occasion of a trial, proceedings which he has said are without example in this country. Now, what were those proceedings? A certain public document was regarded as privileged, and was not therefore produced in Court.

MR. E. HARRINGTON: No, no; it was not a public document, but the policeman's notes about the case.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The report which appeared in the Freeman's Journal states that Mr. Carson said he found that those books were confidential documents for the use of the superior officer, and were therefore privileged.

MR. LEAMY: What was the date?

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: What does it matter about the date? It is a report of the particular case to which attention has been directed and appeared in the Freeman's Journal.

MR. LEAMY: Read the whole report then.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Does the hon. Gentleman really expect me to follow the example of the hon. Member who sits near him and read the whole of this report?

MR. LEAMY: Yes; I expect you to read the whole of it.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order; the hon. Gentleman is not entitled to interrupt. He must reserve what observations he has to make until he addresses the Committee.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. H. J. Wilson) gave me no notice that he intended to call attention to this matter, and when it was referred to I immediately endeavoured to obtain the best information in my power, and I believe the information I have obtained refers to the case which was alluded to by the hon. Gentleman. As I have stated the report appeared in the Freeman's Journal, and the words were that Mr. Carson said he found that those books were privileged documents.

MR. LEAMY: You are only stating what Mr. Carson said.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: That was the contention of counsel in the case, and—

MR. LEAMY: I rise to a point of order. Is it not a fact that—

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order!

MR. LEAMY: I rise to order.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! the hon. Gentleman is quite under a misapprehension as to what is a point of order. It is not a point of order to correct a statement made in the course of debate. The hon. Gentleman must reserve what he has to say until the proper time.

MR. W. REDMOND (Fermanagh, N.): I wish to ask you, Sir, whether, when an hon. Member rises in his place and says he wishes to speak to a point of order, he is not entitled to state what that point of order is before you stop him?

THE CHAIRMAN: If the hon. Gentleman says I have misapprehended what he rose for, that is so.

MR. W. REDMOND: The hon. Gentleman has not raised the point yet.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I can only say on the question of whether an hon. Member can rise on the plea of order whenever he wishes to correct a statement which he deems to be inaccurate, that if I were to adopt that practice, then I should be so constantly rising to points of order that hon. Gentlemen opposite would not be able to get through many of their speeches without interruption. Turning again to the point we were discussing before the hon. Member interposed, I will read not merely the remark of Mr. Carson but that which precedes it in the Freeman's Journal, which is to the effect that the police constable was recalled and cross-examined as to the notes he took on the night Mr. O'Kelly was at the place mentioned and asked to produce his note-book. Mr. Carson objected that this was a confidential document, the entries in which were made for his superior officers, and that it was therefore privileged. Now, this is an incident which the hon. Gentleman opposite thinks could only happen in Ireland and for which there is no precedent. The hon. Gentleman is clearly deriving his legal knowledge from what happens on the Sheffield bench—doubtless an excellent though narrow legal school—but I can assure him that for official documents to be regarded as privileged is a perfectly familiar practice in the English Courts.

*MR. H. J. WILSON: But that does not extend to a policeman's pocket-book.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: So much for the two points dealt with by the hon. Gentleman. I now pass to the most important speech in this debate. I refer to the speech delivered by the hon. Member for York (Mr. A. Pease) who moved the Amendment for the reduction of this Vote. Although that speech was delivered to an almost empty House the hon. Gentleman went into a great many important and interesting circumstances with which it will be proper that I should attempt to deal in some detail. The hon. Gentleman appears to have derived his impressions as to the Magistrates of Ireland from the speech of a certain Judge Fletcher delivered in the year 1814. I have not the least doubt that that learned Judge made remarks which were extremely appropriate to the occasion, but they are certainly not appropriate to a Vote for the Irish Resident Magistrates at the present day, inasmuch as they were delivered more than 70 years ago, before the system of Resident Magistrates was invented, I think the hon. Gentleman should have made himself better acquainted with the institution he attacks, before quoting the remarks made by a Judge who lived in the year 1814. The hon. Gentleman was, no doubt, perfectly bona fide in relating the anecdotes he has given to the Committee; but I think he went to Ireland in a very credulous spirit. The hon. Gentleman does not seem to have taken sufficient pains to sift the evidence, and that is all the more serious, when I reflect on the kind of charges he has hurled against the Magistrates. The hon. Gentleman's manner was as quiet as that of any speaker I have ever heard in this House, but his language was as violent as any I ever listened to. There is hardly any crime of which he did not accuse the Resident Magistrates.

*MR. A. PEASE: I directly repudiated from the beginning to the end of my speech that the attack I made was against the whole body. I attacked the system under which they are appointed and the manner in which it is worked by the Chief Secretary.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I fully acquit the hon. Gentleman of the charge of attacking the whole body, but he did undoubtedly hurl charges against members of that body. He accused them of grossly corrupt administration of justice, and I say that that is not an accusation to be lightly made against a judicial body, and that the hon. Gentleman ought to make himself better acquainted with the facts before coming here to prefer such a charge. He stated that these Magistrates acted on suggestions from the central Government, and upon intimations received from Dublin Castle. Sir, not only is that charge absolutely false [cries of "Oh," from the Opposition Benches—I say, absolutely false, but the hon. Gentleman had not a particle of evidence in support of it [renewed cries of "Oh!"]) not a single particle. I say that charges of this kind, which involve not merely the honour of the Resident Magistrates, but the honour of every official connected with the Government of Ireland, is not one that ought to be made lightly by one who occupies the position of the hon. Member. There are, no doubt, other hon. Members of this House from whom accusations of this kind fall so glibly that when making them they hardly realise the gravity of what they allege; but I am unwilling to see the hon. Member associating himself with those to whom I refer, or adopting the reckless methods with which they are familiar. The hon. Gentleman has made himself very merry over the qualifications of these Resident Magistrates, and he read out from a printed Return that has been laid before Parliament the various avocations which those Gentlemen pursued before they were placed in the offices which they now hold. Now, the vast majority of the Resident Magistrates have not been appointed by me, nor by a Conservative Government, but by a Radical Government. The House may take it from me that the enormous majority of these men, whose qualifications the hon. Member for York has denounced, were appointed by those of whom that hon. Member is proud to reckon himself the faithful follower. It appears to me that if we adopt the same method of procedure with regard to Members of Parliament as has been adopted by the hon. Gentleman respecting the Resident Magistrates some very singular deductions might be made. I presume that the qualifications of Members of Parliament are not less important than those of Resident Magistrates. In their hands lies not merely the whole legislation of the country, and a great deal of its administration, but apparently also the revision of all the judicial sentences passed in Ireland; and therefore the qualifications required in them are not smaller than those required for a Resident Magistrate. Well, if I were to take the book with which we are all familiar, and to read out the antecedents of the House generally, and treat them in the manner the hon. Member treated the antecedents of the Resident Magistrates, I could, if it were worth while, bring out more ridiculous results than the hon. Gentleman has done. As the hon. Member for York has thought fit several times to quote the opinions of the Superior Courts, I may call his attention to the opinion on this very point of Mr. Baron Dowse, who said yesterday:—

“As far as I am concerned I would rather have a Resident Magistrate with whose legal capacity the Lord Lieutenant is satisfied than a Member of Parliament with whose legal capacity nobody is satisfied.”

I think there is a great deal of wisdom in the learned Judge's remark. Then I pass to the next point made by the hon. Member for York. The hon. Gentleman, to prove his case against the Resident Magistrates, quoted a private conversation which he had with one of that body, whose name he did not give. I do not know what view that Magistrate may have of the use to which the hon. Gentleman has put a private conversation which had all the privileges that ought to appertain to a private conversation, which obviously was intended to be quoted in this and the accuracy of which there was no opportunity of testing if the hon. Gentleman's version of it is incorrect. I say that the hon. Member for York should have lent no aid to a proceeding of that kind; nor so because on the face of the account of the conversation to be inaccurate, since he said the Magistrate told him that he had persons in prison for three or six months for the offence of trying to stop other persons from hunting over their land. That is an extravagant and absurd statement. It is perfectly legal to prevent people from hunting over your land; and we are to be told that that ridiculous sentence was actually given, and that it was never thought worth while by anybody to bring that sentence before a Superior Court and have it quashed and the Magistrate who passed it discredited. The hon. Gentleman also commented with much severity on the light tone in which the Magistrate described having escorted to gaol certain prisoners who were sentenced to 12 or 18 months' imprisonment. Why, those men who were sentenced to 12 or 18 months' imprisonment were not tried before a Criminal Court, as the hon. Gentleman appears to think.

*MR. A. PEASE: I said they were escorted to Sligo, and I ought to have added to undergo their trial at the Assizes.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I confess I rather fail to understand what the accusation is. Apparently we are asked to condemn absent men, Resident Magistrates in Ireland, because one of their body in a private conversation did not speak with sufficient gravity of the duty of escorting to their trial certain men who were afterwards condemned by an Irish Judge and jury to 12 or 18 months' imprisonment for a very brutal and horrible offence.

*MR. A. PEASE: I am unwilling to interrupt the right hon. Gentleman; I did not use the conversation which took place between the Resident Magistrate and myself as in any way an accusation against that particular Magistrate, or against Magistrates in general, but as an illustration of the disposition and attitude towards the people of many of those gentlemen.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I entirely accept the hon. Gentleman's explanation; but I confess my inability to see how that affects the argument. We are asked to condemn the Magistrate because he did not speak in a sufficiently solemn tone about escorting men to be tried for a very brutal offence before a Judge and a Jury. Surely this is sufficiently absurd. Then the hon. Gentleman went on from generalities to discuss particulars, and the particular subject which he chose for discussion was the merits of Mr. Cecil Roche. This, he said, was the worst case of Irish misgovernment. Let us examine the case. The hon. Gentleman described Mr. Cecil Roche as an itinerant agitator. He did not state, however, that Mr. Roche was appointed and twice reappointed by Lord Spencer as Sub-Commissioner under the Land Act, and we know on the authority of the right hon. Gentleman [the Member for Bridgeton (Sir G. Trevelyan)] that in selecting Sub-Commissioners, Lord Spencer had special regard to the judicial fitness. Then the hon. Member mentioned as an example of the iniquity of Mr. Cecil Roche the sentence passed upon the hon. Member for Clare (Mr. Cox). The sentence of four months was passed by two Magistrates, of whom Mr. Roche was one. The hon. Member for Clare appealed to the County Court Judge, who diminished the sentence to one month, and made him a first-class misdemeanant. This is said to be the worst case. But, amazing as it may seem, the hon. Gentleman has not taken the trouble to examine what passed at the trial before the County Court Judge. In diminishing the sentence the County Court Judge said:—

"The Magistrates, when the sentence was originally inflicted, were probably justified by the state of the country at the time in imposing the term of four months."

In view, however, of the altered state of things, he reduced the sentence. So that the County Court Judge entirely acquitted the Magistrates of having in any way exceeded the duty imposed upon them. This is one of the worst cases and one of the worst Magistrates which the researches of the hon. Gentleman have enabled him to discover. Then there is the case of the hon. Member for Kerry. I do not intend to discuss that case again, for we had a long Debate upon it on the Address, but I would remind the hon. Member of this. His accusation is that Mr. Cecil Roche exceeded his magisterial duty in passing the sentence of six months on the hon. Member for Kerry. It was an appealable sentence, and if the hon. Member had supposed that the County Court Judge would reverse the sentence of this unjust Magistrate no doubt he would have appealed. The fact that he did not is a conclusive proof that Mr. Roche was not acting upon any inspiration derived from the Castle, but that he passed a sentence which, in the opinion of the hon. Member for Kerry and his Friends, would have been upheld by the County Court Judge on appeal. The third example given by the hon. Member for York had nothing whatever to do with the judicial work of Mr. Cecil Roche, and I do not know how it is relevant to the Vote before the Committee. It appears that Mr. Roche and Colonel Turner were asked to subscribe to some races in Kerry. They declined to do so, and the reason given was that the hon. Member for Kerry (Mr. E. Harrington) was on the Committee, and in their opinion he had used, and was in the habit of using, in his newspaper language against them and the police which made it impossible for them to take an active part in supporting any institution with which the hon. Member was nearly connected. That is not a subject on which I think it my duty to pronounce any opinion, because it is not connected with the discharge of official duties. But to say that they were not to give a vote for Resident Magistrates in Ireland because Mr. Cecil Roche and Colonel Turner objected to subscribe to some races which are managed by a gentleman who in their opinion is in the habit, through his newspaper, of describing them and the police as cowards, liars, and uniformed bloodhounds I think is rather really absurd.

MR. E. HARRINGTON: I ask the right hon. Gentleman now to specify, and not shield himself behind Roche and Turner, where I ever referred to the police in the language he describes

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: What I said I have on the best authority.

MR. E. HARRINGTON: What is your best authority? [Here the hon. Member moved in a threatening manner from his seat to the Gangway in the direction of the right hon. Gentleman, but immediately afterwards returned to his place.]

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! I believe the right hon. Gentleman was reading an extract from a letter. [Cries of "He did not," and uproar.]

MR. T. M. HEALY: Get Balfour to keep quiet, or else we will make him.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The hon. Member is not entitled to use such language.

MR. T. M. HEALY: He made an insulting gesture, Sir. [Cries of "Order!" and "Name!"]

THE CHAIRMAN: It will be impossible to maintain any degree of order unless hon. Members co-operate with the Chair, and attempt to restrain the feelings which they may not unnaturally entertain. I understood the right hon. Gentleman to quote the expressions of some other persons. [Cries of "No!" and loud cries of "Order!"] If it was language of his own, then undoubtedly he ought to give his authority.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Mr. Courtney, you are quite right. With regard to what the hon. Member described as an insulting gesture, it was not in the least intended——

MR. E. HARRINGTON: Menacing gesture.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Well, menacing gesture. [Cries of "Menacing and insulting."] I assure the hon. Member for Kerry that, as far as I am concerned, I have not the slightest desire to insult him by any gesture of mine. It is not my habit to insult anyone by any gesture.

MR. T. M. HEALY: We have too much of that.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order!

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: What I stated to the House was said with the view of describing the motives which, I understood, and I know for a fact, did actuate the two gentlemen in question—namely, that they believed that the expressions which I have quoted to the House were used by the hon. Member with regard to them and the police, and I do not know that anything more can be said on the matter.

MR. E. HARRINGTON: I will ask the right hon. Gentleman, in fair play, to give his authority. I will apologise to you, Sir, for the heat I displayed. I do not think it is shameful of me to apologise; but allow me to explain that I understood the gesture of the right hon. Gentleman to be a menacing and insulting gesture, and that gesture I was on the point of resenting by bringing the right hon. Gentleman below the Bar. [Loud laughter, interruption, and cries of "Order!"] With regard to the expression "uniformed bloodhounds," if it has appeared in my newspaper those men cannot be in any uncertainty about it, for it is in print; if it appeared in a speech of mine it is in print. Where did the right hon. Gentleman see it? It is not in these gentlemen's letters, for I hold copies of those letters in my hand. I ask him, where does he get that extract?

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I told the hon. Member that I got the views of the two gentlemen I have quoted—Mr. Roche and Colonel Turner—on the best authority; but when I said the words "uniformed bloodhounds," "cowards," and "liars" were used in the journal which is associated with the hon. Gentleman's name, I do not think the statement is so intrinsically absurd that it should bring down upon me the wrath of the hon. Member, because hon. Gentlemen are aware that the epithet "murderer," which is even stronger than either of the expressions I have referred to has certainly been applied to me.

MR. E. HARRINGTON: I ask the right hon. Gentleman, if he wishes to establish his character for veracity, to specify the authority on which he states that I ever called the Irish Constabulary "uniformed bloodhounds," or that I ever called him a murderer.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I despair of making my meaning clear to hon. Members.

MR. JOHN ELLIS: Give your authority.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I never accused him of calling me a murderer. With regard to the descriptions of Mr. Cecil Roche and the police the hon. Member asks whether they had been made by him.

MR. E. HARRINGTON: What is your authority?

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: What I stated was, that that was the impression of Mr. Cecil Roche and Colonel Turner when they refused to subscribe to the Kerry Races.

MR. E. HARRINGTON: I feel sure the right hon. Gentleman must answer me when I ask him to specify the authority on which he made that statement. I think before his goes one inch further we ought to know that. I hold in my hand copies of the letters from those men, and they have no such accusations as he has stated. If that accusation is contained in any private telegrams or letters I ask him to rise in his place and say so. I claim that he shall not stand up in this House and—

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order!

MR. E. HARRINGTON: Well, Sir, I am satisfied to let the House and the country judge of his veracity in this matter.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Sir, if I have misrepresented the feelings and reasons of Mr. Cecil Roche, I have undoubtedly been guilty of a want of accuracy; but how have I wronged the hon. Member for Kerry? I have not misrepresented those feelings, and it is those feelings alone that are in question.

MR. E. HARRINGTON: The words! I claim that the right hon. Gentleman shall give his authority.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The hon. Gentleman is not at all entitled to make any such claim. The right hon. Gentleman has made a representation as to the state of opinion of these two Magistrates, Colonel Turner and Mr. Cecil Roche; to them, undoubtedly, he is responsible for that representation; but he is not responsible to the hon. Member so as to be compelled to verify his statement.

MR. SEXTON: In the interests of the order of Debate—[Loud cries of "Order!"]

MR. SEXTON (addressing Colonel Sanderson): I told you my opinion about you once before.

THE CHAIRMAN: If the right hon. Gentleman will address the Chair and complain of any specific act of disorder he will be listened to; but he must know that when he addresses an hon. Member across the House the maintenance of order is not possible. I do beg the hon. Member to address the Chair.

MR. SEXTON: When a Member who has insulted me before in this House interrupts me in a disorderly manner, it puts my patience to too severe a strain.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON: Mr. Courtney, I rise to order—

THE CHAIRMAN: Mr. Sexton.

MR. SEXTON: In the interests of the order of Debate, which appear to me to be gravely imperilled by the language of the right hon. Gentleman, to say nothing of the gesture, I humbly submit to you, Sir, that the imputation he made at the Table was this—that Colonel Turner and Mr. Roche had complained to him that in the journal conducted by my hon. Friend he described the police as "uniformed bloodhounds." I think it would be in the interests of the order of Debate, and would commend itself alike to all parties, if you were to request the right hon. Gentleman to say whether he is in possession of evidence that any such language was used by the Gentleman in question.

THE CHAIRMAN: I regret very much that such grave language should be used. [Interruption.] If hon. Members cannot restrain themselves it is impossible for me to go on. I regret that such language should be used; but it is used on the responsibility of the right hon. Gentleman, who is responsible, not to this House, but to the gentlemen to whom he attributes it in conveying his impression of these motives to the Committee.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am extremely sorry to have raised this storm; but I believe hon. Gentlemen will not doubt my word when I say that the last thing I should have expected was that indignation would have been exhibited at my remarks, since the violence of the language habitually used by hon. Gentlemen and the Nationalist Press is matter of common notoriety. Surely in the columns of United Ireland and other papers language not less violent has been freely used. Nay, in many cases language exceeding this in violence has been used, and it never occurred to me that I should be interrupting the harmony of the evening's proceedings by calling attention to it. But I pass from that to make a mild protest against the use of the word boycotting by the hon. Gentleman opposite. It is not boycotting in the Irish sense of the word to refuse a subscription of a few sovereigns to the fund of a race meeting, and, as used by the hon. Member, the phrase is misapplied, and he misleads himself and everyone who accepts his version of the facts. But I ask the Committee, in concluding a speech which has been lengthened by the interruptions to which I have been subjected, I ask the Committee, is the broad indictment brought by the hon. Member for

York sustainable? I have examined and refuted point by point the specific charges he has made, and if we survey the subject generally is there anything to sustain the hon. Member's accusation? There is a broad, simple, and conclusive test of the action of these Courts, and that is how their decisions have been treated by superior Courts. We have had every opportunity of applying this test, for there have been an enormous number of appeals. I believe in 1888 there were 201 appeals from the decisions of Resident Magistrates under the Crimes Act, and of these only 19 were reversed. In the half-year from January 1 to June 30, 1889, there were 121 appeals, and of these only 10 decisions were reversed. Therefore in 18 months from January 1, 1888, to June 30, 1889, there were 322 appeals against the decisions of the Magistrates, and in 29 cases only were the decisions altered, or only 9 per cent of the whole. I am speaking in the presence of many lawyers, and I have the Chief Baron on my side when I say that is a record that cannot be approached by any other Court of First Instance in the world. The Chief Baron has pointed out that the enormous proportion of decisions sustained by Courts testifies to an impartiality no man can doubt, and is conclusive proof that the Resident Magistrates are not open to the accusations made against them. That being so, the hon. Member for York and others were guilty of bringing forward unjust accusations against men, who, under circumstances of difficulty, imperfectly appreciated by their accusers, and of which the hon. Member with experience derived from the Sheffield Bench has no conception whatever—have carried out their duties in a manner that need make no man ashamed who has the interests of justice at heart. Technical reasons have now and then been brought up to show that the Courts ought not to have come to the decisions they did; but it has never been maintained that the defendants were not guilty of the offences with which they were charged, or that the innocent have been subjected to punishment. That being so, the House ought to reject by a large majority an Amendment which is intended to call in question the action of the Resident Magistrates in that which, after all, is the most important of their functions—namely, the pure and impartial administration of justice.

MR. LEAMY (Sligo, S.): I do not know what are the more important functions of these gentlemen, whether it is giving judicial decisions or in ordering the police to baton the people; it is not very easy to discriminate between the two functions. The right hon. Gentleman found some fault with me this evening for interrupting him while he was making a statement in respect to what was said by the hon. Member for Yorkshire (Mr. Pease) in reference to the incident that occurred on the trial of my hon. Friend the Member for Roscommon. The right hon. Gentleman was quoting from what was supposed to be a report of the trial, but he took care to read only that part which told in his own favour. Now that I do not think is a straightforward way of dealing with the House, but I suppose it is more or less characteristic of him, and his allusion to "uniformed bloodhounds" is sufficiently recent on our memories. The right hon. Gentleman said that this note-book which has been referred to was not produced because it was a privileged document, and he went on to say they are never produced. But what are the facts? On the first day of the trial the note-book was called for and the Magistrate ordered its production on the following morning. But on the following morning the book was not produced, and the reason was because in the meantime instructions had been received from Dublin Castle. Now, the Solicitor General for England, without caring to inquire into the character of this note-book, gave his assent to the statement that it was a privileged communication. But the police officer admitted that he had used the book for the purpose of refreshing his memory while giving evidence, so I maintain the counsel for the defence was justified in calling for it. I think before giving his opinion the Solicitor General might have waited till he knows what happens in an Irish Court of Justice. I do not know who is instructing the Chief Secretary now, but he appears to have a crowd of instructors legal and otherwise. But I think it will be found that my contention is a right one. At another prosecution which took place at Castle-reagh, and in which I was counsel for the defence, a policeman was ordered by the magistrate to produce a note-book under precisely similar circumstances, and the point has been raised, I believe, before Chief Baron Palles, and in his judgment a note-book of the kind was declared not to be privileged. The Chief Secretary, in referring to the speech of the hon. Member who began this discussion, complained that he had referred to private conversations which had taken place between himself and a Resident Magistrate, and the right hon. Gentleman seemed to be shocked that the hon. Member should have made use of such a conversation in the House. But what has the Chief Secretary to say in reference to a recent police circular sent round to all the police stations in the country, advising the police to seize upon innocent strangers from England and give their information of the right sort in reference to evictions? What does the right hon. Gentleman say to that? The Chief Secretary went on to say that it was quite untrue that men have ever been sent to gaol for preventing hunting over their lands. On this point I should like to refer to one instance within my own knowledge. Waterford is a great hunting county, and it used to be hunted by Lord Waterford. In the beginning of the land agitation in 1880 or 1881, the people of the county objected to allowing the hunt to go over their land, and they assembled and they did no doubt brandish sticks, and I believe some stones were thrown. Now, this was the first occasion on which the tenants asserted their right to say that no one should hunt over their land, and these men were brought up before a Magistrate charged with unlawful assembly. Of course the Magistrates were too cute to charge them with simply obstructing the hunt; they were charged with unlawful assembly, and Captain Stack, an intimate friend of Lord Waterford and other members of the hunt, sentenced the men to terms of imprisonment from two to three months. This was on Christmas Eve, and a peculiar thing in connection with this trial was that the warrants were filled up before the sentences were pronounced. The defending counsel happened to pick up one of the warrants, and when he asked for an explanation he was told—"Of course we are only having them ready." This prosecution, however, killed hunting in County Waterford. I speak as a Waterford man within the hearing of other Waterford men. I will say that if there had been a Magistrate of common sense on the Bench, and with a genuine interest in hunting and at the same time recognizing the tenants' rights, hunting might have gone on to this day in County Waterford, and Lord Waterford would be a happier, merrier man than he is to-day. The right hon. Gentleman has spoken of administration as being the most important duty incumbent upon Resident Magistrates. What has he to say of the conduct of Divisional Magistrate Cameron or Divisional Inspector, I believe he is called—I really cannot distinguish these grand titles? When the evictions took place on the Olphert Estate last January, will the House believe that one morning, about 4 o'clock, the agent found that some tenants had re-entered the house from which they had been evicted, and immediately got the aid of some 20 of the Irish Constabulary, visited the house, knocked at the door, and, not being admitted, went at once to the Magistrate and swore that the house was being forcibly held against him? Divisional Inspector Cameron then appeared on the scene and the door was opened by a woman, the house was then taken possession of by the police and used as a temporary barrack for which a shilling was paid to the agent. Is that the conduct of a Magistrate who wishes to act impartially between the people and the police? There have been other and similar cases; on one occasion the Inspector broke open a house in the early hours of the morning and found it occupied by a poor old woman, cowering over the embers of a fire, and in every case of this kind where warrants were issued by the Magistrate and executed by the police, prosecutions were afterwards instituted, but were dismissed for want of evidence. The Chief Secretary has explained why Colonel Turner and Mr. Cecil Roche refused subscriptions to the Tralee Races. The letters from these gentlemen enclosed in one envelope have been put into my hands. The letter from Colonel Turner is to the effect that while under ordinary circumstances he should have been glad to subscribe to the races, he declined to do so because upon the list of Stewards was the name of a person who was a persistent breaker of the law, and a constant traducer of the constabulary and their officers. The second letter says—

“I am in receipt of yours of this date applying for the usual subscription, but I regret to state that I do not feel justified in subscribing to the Tralee races this year, owing to the presence on the committee of an individual whom it has been my painful duty to sentence to a term of imprisonment, and who systematically insults those who are endeavouring with me to preserve law and order in this country.”

[Cheers.] I welcome the cheers uttered by hon. Gentlemen opposite, and I tell hon. Members that these letters will be read from hundreds of platforms in Ireland, and if they are not greeted with cheers like those given by hon. Members opposite, at any rate the advice which will follow the reading of the letters will be received with cheers. That advice will suggest to the people to take a leaf out of the book of the Resident Magistrate in the matter of boycotting political opponents. In Ireland people often seek for a neutral platform on which political opponents may meet, but if this is to be the course of action adopted by the Resident Magistrates, the Irish Members and those who support them will find many opportunities of seeing that their political opponents shall not have as much favour in non-political matters as has hitherto been extended to them. I, for one, believe that boycotting is a perfectly justifiable weapon. I know that last night the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary said that it had been invented by our Party. As a fact it was not invented by our Party, for it was practised against our people many years before they adopted it. Now I wish to make a few observations upon another point. The Chief Secretary has quoted a statement made by Chief Baron Palles. I wish the right hon. Gentleman would quote all the statements made by learned Judges. He has also quoted a statement by Baron Dowse, but he has only quoted the statements which tell in his favour. Now, we have the case in which the Resident Magistrate pronounced sentence on Dr. Tanner, and the Superior Court have quashed that sentence on the ground, I understand, that these two Magistrates who, according to the Lord Lieutenant, were acquainted with the law, did not know the law. We surely ought to have some explanation on this point from the Chief Secretary. It would appear that Dr. Tanner declined to recognise the jurisdiction of the Magistrate who tried him, and because he held their Court in contempt, these men who did not know the law, and who, as we now know, illegally sentenced him to a month's imprisonment, are held to be empowered to call upon the hon. Member to give securities to keep the peace, and they adopted this course because they well knew that he would prefer to remain in gaol for three months rather than give such sureties. The right hon. Gentleman opposite has been in the habit of getting up here and saying—

It being Midnight, the Chairman left the Chair to make his Report to the House.

Committee report Progress; to sit again to-morrow.

SUPPLY [7th August]—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

Resolution reported.

CLASS III.

“That a sum, not exceeding £889,371, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1890, for the expenses of the Royal Irish Constabulary.”

Resolution read a second time.

*MR. PIERCE MAHONY (Meath, N.): Owing to the application of the Closure last evening I was prevented making a few remarks on this Vote, which I had been anxious to make, and which I had risen more than once for the purpose of making. The Chief Secretary for Ireland has delivered two speeches in the course of the Debate on this subject. The first was, if I may be permitted to say so, in his best possible style—his own peculiar style. But the second was in his worst possible style. He does not shine in a conciliatory attitude at all. He was in admirable form in his first speech; indeed, his form was so admirable that when he sat down he was appealed to by his Colleagues, and especially by the right hon. Gentleman who leads this House, and who always treats his opponents with courtesy, to withdraw, and apologise at the first opportunity for the most insulting observations which he addressed to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford. He did apologise for the observations, but he did not appear particularly to like the performance. I naturally, as an Irish Member, have closely observed the Chief Secretary's conduct since I have been a Member of this House, and I am bound to say that I have never seen one single trace of that good feeling and magnanimity which is generally supposed to be characteristic of the English gentleman. I hope that the right hon. Gentleman who received the Chief Secretary's apology yesterday will, should he have occasion to visit Ireland during the Recess, exercise more than ordinary caution, because I am perfectly certain that if the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary only gets a chance he will make the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford pay dearly for that apology. The right hon. Gentleman took great credit because, as regards some particulars, over which he said he had special control, with regard to police expenditure, he had effected a reduction, and he attributed that reduction to the improved state of the country under the Coercion Act. I do not attribute it to that. I attribute the reduction to the fact that there have been fewer evictions during the past 12 months. Why have there been fewer evictions? Because there are fewer properties on which the landlord and tenants are in conflict with one another. And why are there fewer properties on which there is this conflict? Not because of the administration of the Coercion Act by the right hon. Gentleman, but because there has been a system pursued by the Nationalist Party in Ireland with the express purpose of leading to settlements between landlords and tenants. I challenge the right hon. Gentleman to dispute the fact that the Plan of Campaign has led to more settlements between landlords and tenants in Ireland than anything else. Whereas last year the Plan of Campaign was in operation on about 140 estates in Ireland, now it is only in operation on about 30. What have become of the 110 estates? Why, Sir, the fact is that the Plan of Campaign has led to a settlement on these estates, and there the landlords and tenants are no longer in conflict. But for that the right hon. Gentleman is not entitled to any credit; indeed, he has done his best to prevent settlements being brought about by the Plan of Campaign. Nor is credit due to Members who, like the hon. Member for South Hunts, have gone out of their way to prevent these settlements. Now, the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary is particularly proud of his statistics with regard to boycotted persons in Ireland. I do not attach much importance to statistics produced by the Irish Government, because I happen to know something of the way in which they are collected. If the Government want crime to rise up, up it goes. When they want it to occur, it does occur; and when they want undetected crimes to multiply, they do multiply at the mere nod of the head of the Chief Secretary. Boycotted persons in Ireland are fewer now, because there are fewer estates on which there is a conflict between landlord and tenant. The Plan of Campaign has stopped the conflict on a large number of estates, and therefore there is no longer any necessity to boycott certain persons. I said, Mr. Speaker, that when it was the desire of the Irish Government that the statistics of undetected crime should go up, that result was easily obtained. I am not in the habit of making statements without having some ground for them, and I intend to quote three cases in which the police apparently failed to make any effort whatever to detect crime, although they had every warning that it was likely to occur. There is a certain agent in the South of Ireland who made himself very unpopular. One Friday night a boycotting notice of a very violent character was posted on a gate about four miles from Listowel. This boycotting notice appears to have been the only one posted on that night, but the fact that it was posted came to the knowledge of the agent during the following day, and he immediately came to the conclusion that the notice had been posted up by mistake, and that a great body of similar notices would be posted up on the following night. He sent information to the police of what had occurred, and told them what he believed was likely to occur. Though they were cautioned to watch carefully during the Saturday night and Sunday morning, and though the Police Barrack is in the Square of Listowel, there was scarcely a house in the square which had not one of these notices posted upon it, and the person who posted them, having more than he cared to dispose of, threw the remainder of the bundle of notices into the police barrack-yard. The police, although warned, never detected the person who posted these notices. In the same district there was a farm from which the tenant had been evicted, and the agent had reason to think that, on a certain night, the crops would be removed from the farm, which was in the possession of a caretaker. He informed the police what he expected would ensue, and upon what night it was likely to be done. As a fact, on that very night the crops were removed and the police detected nobody. In the same district, during the same summer, the police were informed that an effort was to be made within the next few days to drive away and kill a number of cattle belonging to an unpopular person. The effort was made; the cattle were driven away and killed, and nobody was detected. Thus you have three cases in a small area of four or five miles, in which the police, although warned that outrage was likely to take place, failed to detect anyone committing it. And yet for these men, who so fail in their duty, this Committee is asked to pay close upon two millions a year. We have grave reason to believe that the police are at the bottom of many outrages. They know that their living depends upon the continuance of outrages, and therefore, so far from trying to prevent them, they wink at them. We shall not forget the case which occurred in the Castle Island District, in which a policeman, having by accident shot in the legs a man whom he was engaged in protecting, subsequently broke a pane of glass and tried to make out that an outrage had been committed. It was proved afterwards that he had done this and he was dismissed from the force. The Chief Secretary has said he was anxious in regard to the case of my hon. Friend the Member for North-East Cork, to so arrange his trial that he would be able to take part in this Debate. But I venture to suggest that he did not take the steps which he could have taken, in order to prevent my hon. Friend making a useless journey to Ireland. I should also like to know why he had my hon. Friend arrested at the Cork Railway Station. Why could he not have summoned him instead of arresting him? He says he prefers the system of summoning, but that he feared that the hon. Gentleman would not attend on summons, and therefore was compelled to issue the warrant. I venture to assert he had no reason whatever to believe that my hon. Friend would not attend upon summons, because on the last occasion on which he was summoned he obeyed the summons. But as he preferred the method of arrest, why did he not also arrest the Member for East Cork, who was named jointly in the same summons with the hon. Member for North-East Cork. Both hon. Members were on the railway platform when the one was arrested, and I should like to know why the Member for East Cork was not arrested until the following day. I contend the Government deliberately arrested the hon. Member for North-East Cork at a crowded railway station, and at a perfectly unnecessary time, in order to provoke a riot. We believe they wanted to provoke one, and we have every reason for believing that the police expected one, because a constable actually warned two ladies who were on the platform to get to a particular point because, he said, there they would be safe. And then again, with reference to the events at Charleville, we learnt yesterday for the first time, that the Police Inspector had received an injury to one of his arms. My hon. Friend the Member for North-East Cork, whose statement on that point I should prefer to rely upon, said that in the railway carriage he again and again after they left the station challenged the police to point out any injury which anyone had received, and the only answer that could be made was that the District Inspector pointed out to him a dent in his helmet. This was not an injury to the head, nor was it an injury to the arm; it was simply a dent in the helmet. The right hon. Gentleman was asked yesterday if an order was given to the police to fire on the crowd at the railway station. His answer was, "Yes, I believe so." Apparently, he did not take the trouble to inquire specifically as to whether the order was given. Does he consider the lives of Irishmen of so little importance that he does not think it necessary to do what I venture to say would be the first thing done in a similar case in this country—namely, to inquire as to whether the police were ordered to fire, or not? I should like to point out that the hon. Member for North-East Cork has clearly and distinctly stated that the policemen fired without orders, and without the knowledge of their officer. My hon. Friend said he told the Inspector to ask his men and he asked them all round the carriage, not knowing that they had fired, and two admitted that they had done so. Will the right hon. Gentleman still maintain that there was an order to fire? I say it is perfectly monstrous that when the police fire on the people in Ireland the right hon. Gentleman, who is really responsible for the act and who makes himself doubly responsible by the carelessness with which he treats it, will not take the trouble to inquire whether an order to fire was given or not. There is a strong case for inquiry. If this had occurred in England no Government would have dared to refuse an inquiry. In the Debate yesterday the hon. Member for Ilkeston (Sir W. Foster) referred to the manner in which he was followed by the police. The hon. Member was staying with me at that time. I did not accompany him because the property he was going to visit belonged to a gentleman with whom I had been on terms of friendship for some time, but the description brought back by the hon.

Member of the state of the property induced me to do what I had never done before, and will never do again—write to the owner and offer to go down there myself and see whether I could be of any use in bringing them to equitable terms. What were the thanks I got? In reply to my friendly letter I received a cold and formal reply, saying that my letter had been forwarded to the agent, Mr. O'Brien. A few days afterwards I received a letter from that amiable gentleman, saying he had had forwarded to him my letter, and learnt from it that two friends of mine (Sir W. Foster and Mr. Schnadhorst), notorious as disturbers of the peace, had visited the property, and, with the impertinence usual to the Saxon ignorance, had ventured to pronounce an opinion on the matter. I commend that term "Saxon ignorance" to the right hon. Gentleman. It is from one of his violent supporters. After that I took the first opportunity of visiting the property myself and of getting more Englishmen to visit it. I was fortunate in securing a good many other visitors. The result is that there is no dispute between the landlord and tenants on that property to-day. The Plan of Campaign has won a victory there. The evicted people are back in their homes and the tenants are living in peace. I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman how we stand exactly in Ireland as regards meetings. It is often represented in this country that meetings can go on anywhere in Ireland unless they are to be held in furtherance of "the conspiracy called the Plan of Campaign." A meeting was suppressed by the police at Bective Abbey in the County of Meath. There was no Plan of Campaign in operation there. When I asked a question in this House about it, the answer I received was that the meeting was held with the object of preventing farms being taken, and that the holding of it would have been an overt act in the general conspiracy now existing with that object. So that we have got on a step further. It is no longer the Plan of Campaign, but a general conspiracy all over the country for preventing people taking farms from which tenants have been unjustly evicted. That is a very serious change. Does the right hon. Gentleman mean that every man in Ireland has not a right to refuse to take land from which another man has been unjustly evicted? If so, let him say it in plain language. Let us know where we stand. I have always seen the importance of this point. The very first time I spoke to tenants in Ireland, I told them that their very strength lay in this particular, and that if they could not keep up the feeling in Ireland, that no one should take land from which another had been unjustly evicted, they would not win the battle, and would not deserve to win it. I have repeated that over and over again. If it is illegal, why has not the right hon. Gentleman prosecuted me for it? I will repeat it again, and in doing so I shall be only following up the advice that was practically given in this House by Members of the Government, when, in the autumn of 1886, we called attention to the danger of evictions, and the right hon. Gentleman, who was then Attorney General for Ireland, said there was no danger of evictions, because the Irish landlords were not fools and that it would not pay the landlords to turn their tenants out. General Buller was sent over to Ireland during that autumn, and he gave evidence before the Royal Commission. His statement was that when the landlords could not let their farms, then they were forced to consider the question of rent. Under these circumstances we are justified in treading in the footsteps of these gentlemen—one adorns the Bench, and the other graces the British Army.

*MR. SPEAKER: The remarks of the hon. Gentleman are not relevant to the Constabulary Vote.

*MR. PIERCE MAHONY: I will draw my remarks to a close, but in doing so I want to allude very briefly to the remarks with which the Chief Secretary concluded his speech yesterday. The right hon. Gentleman said that we complained that the police in Ireland were used to buttress up the property of the few, and he asked us if we considered the property of the few less sacred than the property of the many. Certainly not. But there is a dual ownership of farms in Ireland.

Mr. Pierce Mahony

The right hon. Gentleman forgot that point.

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! Dual ownership has no reference to the Constabulary Vote.

*MR. PIERCE MAHONY: The right hon. Gentleman distinctly stated that we complained that the police were used in Ireland for the purpose of buttressing up the property of the few. As regards the land in Ireland, the few have no property which is not shared by the tenants—the landlords and tenants are now joint owners; but I will not pursue the subject. The Chief Secretary concluded by alluding to what he called the absence of our Liberal friends during these Debates. I hope he notices that they have not been absent to-day. I think we may well feel our friends the Liberal Members have good excuse at this period of the Session for taking a little relaxation, and I am very much surprised, and I am also very thankful to them for attending in such large numbers. But the success of the cause in which we are working does not depend upon any party in this country. We rely on our own resources, we rely on the Irish people, we rely on a people who are not only in your very midst, in every large centre of population, but who are present in large numbers in every colony of this Empire, and who form a most important portion of the population of the greatest country the world has yet seen—the United States of America.

DR. FITZGERALD (Longford, 8.): This Vote involves a large amount of the taxpayers' money. It has been rushed through the Committee with great haste and by means of the Closure. I feel, therefore, that a few remarks from me will not be out of place. The sum set forth in the Vote are said to be necessary, but the Irish Government has shrunk from answering the grave and specific charges which we have made against individual members of the police force, and what is graver still, they have refrained from answering our charge that they themselves have stimulated the police force to those crimes against the people in Ireland of which we now complain. I consider I am singularly fortunate in rising to speak now, because I see the hon. Member for South Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell) in his place. The other night the hon. Gentleman related some very interesting historical facts—facts which we have been endeavouring to place before the people of this country for a good many years—and he did it so lucidly and well I think, that now, as it were, in the evening of his somewhat chequered and unfortunate political career, the thanks of the Irish people and their representatives are due to him. The hon. Member told us of the good old days when the predecessors of those men with whom he is now in alliance were enabled to drive from their homes the peasantry of Ireland in order to make room for Scotch adventurers, to the good offices of whom we are indebted for the lustre which the hon. Member casts upon this assembly, and for the damage which he invariably does the Party opposite, with whom he has had nothing to do, but to whom he actually belongs. I am also fortunate in seeing the Solicitor General for Ireland in his place, who, on a former occasion, when the Lord Mayor of Dublin made the specific charges I am about to repeat, proudly described himself as the spokesman of the Irish Government. On that occasion the hon. and learned Gentleman invited my right hon. Friend not to discuss the question of the assault upon the hon. Member for Monaghan (Mr. P. O'Brien), and the question of the wounding of the man at Charleville, and the question of the arrest of the hon. Member for North East Cork (Mr. F. O'Brien), because, as he said, "the Government have no official information, and you as well as ourselves will be at a great disadvantage." From where did the hon. and learned Gentleman await information? From the source from which the hon. Member for South Tyrone derives his, which information has been shown in a law court recently to be absolutely untrue—information from the bailiff, from the landlord, from the emergency men, and lastly from the policemen, who are in alliance with the

Solicitor General for Ireland and his party. But we forced the hon. and learned Gentleman to make some reply. He asserted that the railway station was a nice quiet place whereat to effect the arrest of the hon. Member for North East Cork, upon a day when the whole county and town of Cork was astir. When he made that statement I saw a bilious smile pass over the faces of his supporters. I am at one with the hon. Member for South Tyrone, because, after the lamentable event which followed the arrest of Father M'Fadden—the death of Inspector Martin, but which undoubtedly lies at the doors of the Irish Government—it is trifling with the House of Commons, and is an insult to the Constitution, for a responsible Minister of the Crown and a lawyer to make such a statement. On that occasion the hon. Member for Monaghan was assaulted. He received some injuries which have since prostrated him, and which will probably shorten his days. The hon. and learned Gentleman hinted—but afterwards withdrew the hint—that a rescue of the hon. Member for North East Cork had been attempted by the hon. Member for Monaghan. When, immediately afterwards, the Chief Secretary came into the House, and was proceeding to repeat the assertion, what was the learned Gentleman doing? Not looking over the fusty pages of the Acts of Edward III., but pulling the Chief Secretary by the coat-tail, and trying to prevent him making the ridiculous assertion which he himself had just partly withdrawn. The hon. Member for Monaghan was assaulted by the police force, of whose conduct I now complain. We heard the other night the Chief Secretary parading before the House, and really before the country, the amicable relations which exist between the police and the people of Ireland. I knew what was in the right hon. Gentleman's mind. I knew by the corner of his eye what he had ringing in his ears. He was replying to the speeches of the noble Lord the Member for Paddington (Lord R. Churchill) and the hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Hanbury), which speeches showed that Englishmen can belong to a Party and still maintain their spirit of justice and fair play. The fact is the police force of Ireland is not a police

£120, and who now receive £250, and, with their total allowance, nearly £1 a day. This, I think, is a monstrous charge. When the pay was £120, the appointments did not go begging at all, and I think the officers were a better class of men than they are now when we give them pay equal to that we give a man who commands a regiment in its full strength and has to face enemies and take all the chances of loss of life, while these constabulary officers have little to do but hunt down Members of Parliament. When we consider the cost of living in Ireland and the average wages among the people, we must consider that all grades are overpaid, and especially when we compare the scale with that of the police in the Metropolis, where living is so expensive. Where a constable used to get £60, he now gets in pay and allowances nearly double that amount, with a chance, too, of getting a share in the large amount voted for extra pay and travelling allowances. The other day I drew the attention of the Chief Secretary to a police outrage committed in my County (Armagh), and I mentioned the circumstances in which certain constables wantonly fired at and made bullet holes in fishermen's boots, and I desire to ask again are these men to be prosecuted? The Chief Secretary said that I did not furnish him with the names, but I may say that the men to whom the boots belonged were Joseph and John Robinson, and another man whose name I think is Fox. But even when we give the fullest details we do not get any satisfaction. I hold that such offenders should be prosecuted with more severity than ordinary civilians, for they are the men who should show example of obedience to the law. The Constabulary Code says that arms are to be entrusted to the Constabulary to be used with prudence and humanity, but what prudence or humanity is there in the conduct of these policemen, which I described in Committee? The duty of the Government is to prosecute, not to defend, in such cases. But this can be said, that no matter whether we have a Tory or a Liberal Government, we have the same class of men in Dublin Castle where the headquarters of the police are situated. I ask the right hon. Gentleman now to give facilities for justice to be done in the cases which have been referred to.

MR. COX (Clare, E.) opposed the Vote.

MR. CONWAY (Leitrim, N.): It is much to be regretted that we have not had a Local Government Bill for Ireland, similar to the one which has been passed for Scotland, for I believe that, had such a Bill been passed, the cost of the Irish police would have been very materially reduced. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary has drawn a comparison between the cost of the Metropolitan Police and the cost of the Irish Police; but he failed to take into the comparison the cost of the police in the remainder of England, and therefore I venture to suggest that the contrast he drew was not a fair one. There is no other nation in the world which presents such a picture of Government as is presented in Ireland. What are the police of Ireland? The Chief Secretary bragged about them being the best possible force, physically and militarily speaking. But did he not consider it was a degradation to his own nation, when he enunciated such a proposition? You brag about your freedom and your flag which sustains liberty and gives relief to the slave, and yet, in Ireland, you are holding down your people by the help of the police. The details which we have had during the last two or three days of police administration in Ireland ought to induce the right hon. Gentleman to take the helm of reform instead of lolling on the Front Bench in an attitude which is a disgrace to any Minister.

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Gentleman must not make personal remarks of that kind.

MR. CONWAY: When one is addressing the House he naturally expects to meet with some attention; but when I am met with sneers and guffaws, such as the right hon. Gentleman indulges in, of course I do resent it. I say this Vote requires further explanation. The right hon. Gentleman stands in his place and contrasts the Metropolitan Police with the Irish Police; it is side of Adjournment. This Rule was intended to prevent an expression of individual objection staying proceedings when there was a desire to go on. I must say that with the prospect of a Saturday Sitting in view I have little inclination to go on with the Debate now. But I think before we proceed any further the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary may give us that information we have sought so long in vain, and tell us out of what fund the charge for the battering-ram has been defrayed.

*MR. SPEAKER: It is out of order on a Motion for Adjournment.

MR. SEXTON: I only wish to suggest that the Chief Secretary should make the Debate on the Vote artistically complete by giving us an answer to this question.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am afraid I shall not be in order in entering at length into this matter, but perhaps I may just mention, as a matter of personal explanation, that as the cost of the battering-ram is defrayed out of no public fund at all, the matter is entirely out of my control, I cannot give the right hon. Gentleman the information he desires.

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

MR. O'DOHERTY (Donegal, N.): It has come to my knowledge, examining these accounts, that under the head of Law and Justice there is expenditure which really should stand in the accounts of the Royal Irish Constabulary to the extent of £10,000 in the present year.

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! That is a question that may be raised afterwards; it cannot be raised in the question of adjournment.

MR. O'DOHERTY: Then, Sir, I only desire now to support the Motion for adjournment.

MR. SEXTON: Perhaps my hon. friend will allow us to proceed with the point desired to be raised, and will withdraw his Motion for adjournment.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question again proposed.

MR. O'DOHERTY: I may allude more fully to the point I mentioned just

now. In a discussion of this kind all the details of the accounts should be put before us that we may fairly estimate the increase or the decrease of expenditure and know the reasons for the one or the other. But there is a sum of £10,000 included in the Vote under the head of Law and Justice on account of travelling expenses, which really should come under the Vote for Constabulary. I think it is only right to call attention to this, and I have a strong objection to the system by which a Vote granted by the House for one purpose can be diverted to another. I think that the Auditor General's notes should be followed up in some way. I know this is a matter of detail, but I really think it is of little use our attempting to discuss these accounts if it is possible that an amount can be smuggled into one Vote when the expenditure is really under another head. I will not enter into the matter now, but it is a financial point that I think ought to be raised. I am satisfied that if we go carefully through the Law and Justice accounts, there is an amount of £10,000 in them that should be in the Constabulary Vote.

MR. BLANE (Armagh, S.): I ventured to say when the House was in Committee on this Vote that the Chief Secretary ought to give some explanation of the demand made for such an immense amount of money under this head. In the time of Sir Robert Peel the total amount of the Constabulary Vote was £437,000. In the year 1860-1 we find the Vote was £653,000, and now it has risen to the sum total of £1,439,371, and, possibly, if the system to which my hon. Friend has just referred is carried out to any extent, to a million and a half. There are a number of items in these accounts that require to be proved, money provided for half-pay troopers and a class of mud-stranded Admirals, men who, unfitted for the services for which they were trained, are by this means enabled to earn further sums by dragooning the people. We see how the Vote is swelled by the increase in the pay of District Inspectors, who, some years ago, were well paid at ditions the Saturday sitting will be held? I think it is most inconvenient that we should have to sit on Saturday.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I cannot definitely answer the hon. Member's question in the absence of my right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Treasury. Saturday sittings may be avoided if satisfactory progress in business is made during the week.

MR. SEXTON: The First Lord of the Treasury hinted for the first time to-night that there would probably be a Saturday sitting. I think the business of the Session could easily be wound up without the necessity of Saturday sittings if reasonable conciliation were employed towards hon. Members from Ireland. At any rate, the Government may very well postpone the question of Saturday sittings until next week.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: If the right hon. Gentleman will allow the matter to stand over till to-morrow, when the Leader of the House will be in his place, I will undertake to place the views of hon. Members before him.

Second Reading deferred to this day.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Friday, 9th August, 1889.

SUCK DRAINAGE BILL. [PRIVATE BILL.]

Brought from the Commons; read 1<sup>a</sup>, and referred to the Examiners.

ZULULAND—NATIVE CHIEFS.

QUESTIONS.—OBSERVATIONS.

LORD HERSCHELL: On behalf of my noble Friend the Earl of Aberdeen I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the evidence in the case of Dinizulu and other Zulu Chiefs recently tried by a Special Commission has been received by Her Majesty's Government?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Lord KNUTSFORD): The evidence in the cases of Dinuzulu, Undabuko, and Tshingana, has only just reached this country. It is now in course of revision, and will be sent to the printer as soon as possible; but some time must elapse before the printing can be completed, as the evidence is very voluminous. The evidence in the cases of Somhlolo and other Zulu Chiefs has already been placed in the Libraries of both Houses of Parliament. I need hardly add that when this evidence has been printed it will receive the very careful consideration of Her Majesty's Government.

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACTS AMENDMENT BILL. (No. 191.)

House in Committee (on Re-commitment) (according to Order): Bill reported without Amendment; and to be read 3<sup>a</sup> on Monday next.

FACTORS BILL. (No. 122 )

Commons Amendments considered, and agreed to, with Amendments; and Bill, with the Amendments, returned to the Commons.

JUDICIAL FACTORS (SCOTLAND) BILL. (No. 202.)

Amendments reported (according to order).

THE MARQUESS OF LOTHIAN: With reference to what fell last night from two noble Lords who sit on the opposite side of the House, who are not present this afternoon, as to the position of the Provost of Dundee on the University Court, I may say that I have gone into the matter as I promised I would, and have come to the conclusion that I should adhere to the position which I have all along taken. It is exceedingly desirable that the University College of Dundee should be affiliated to the University of St. Andrews at the earliest possible moment, and the effect of the Provost of Dundee, the Chief Magistrate unpopular. One Friday night a boycotting notice of a very violent character was posted on a gate about four miles from Listowel. This boycotting notice appears to have been the only one posted on that night, but the fact that it was posted came to the knowledge of the agent during the following day, and he immediately came to the conclusion that the notice had been posted up by mistake, and that a great body of similar notices would be posted up on the following night. He sent information to the police of what had occurred, and told them what he believed was likely to occur. Though they were cautioned to watch carefully during the Saturday night and Sunday morning, and though the Police Barrack is in the Square of Listowel, there was scarcely a house in the square which had not one of these notices posted upon it, and the person who posted them, having more than he cared to dispose of, threw the remainder of the bundle of notices into the police barrack-yard. The police, although warned, never detected the person who posted these notices. In the same district there was a farm from which the tenant had been evicted, and the agent had reason to think that, on a certain night, the crops would be removed from the farm, which was in the possession of a caretaker. He informed the police what he expected would ensue, and upon what night it was likely to be done. As a fact, on that very night the crops were removed and the police detected nobody. In the same district, during the same summer, the police were informed that an effort was to be made within the next few days to drive away and kill a number of cattle belonging to an unpopular person. The effort was made; the cattle were driven away and killed, and nobody was detected. Thus you have three cases in a small area of four or five miles, in which the police, although warned that outrage was likely to take place, failed to detect anyone committing it. And yet for these men, who so fail in their duty, this Committee is asked to pay close upon two millions a year. We have grave reason to believe that the police are at the bottom of many outrages. They know that their living depends upon the continuance of outrages, and therefore, so far from trying to prevent them, they wink at them. We shall not forget the case which occurred in the Castle Island District, in which a policeman, having by accident shot in the legs a man whom he was engaged in protecting, subsequently broke a pane of glass and tried to make out that an outrage had been committed. It was proved afterwards that he had done this and he was dismissed from the force. The Chief Secretary has said he was anxious in regard to the case of my hon. Friend the Member for North-East Cork, to so arrange his trial that he would be able to take part in this Debate. But I venture to suggest that he did not take the steps which he could have taken, in order to prevent my hon. Friend making a useless journey to Ireland. I should also like to know why he had my hon. Friend arrested at the Cork Railway Station. Why could he not have summoned him instead of arresting him? He says he prefers the system of summoning, but that he feared that the hon. Gentleman would not attend on summons, and therefore was compelled to issue the warrant. I venture to assert he had no reason whatever to believe that my hon. Friend would not attend upon summons, because on the last occasion on which he was summoned he obeyed the summons. But as he preferred the method of arrest, why did he not also arrest the Member for East Cork, who was named jointly in the same summons with the hon. Member for North-East Cork. Both hon. Members were on the railway platform when the one was arrested, and I should like to know why the Member for East Cork was not arrested until the following day. I contend the Government deliberately arrested the hon. Member for North-East Cork at a crowded railway station, and at a perfectly unnecessary time, in order to provoke a riot. We believe they wanted to provoke one, and we have every reason for believing that the police expected one, because a constable actually warned two ladies who were on the platform to get to a particular point, because, he said, there they would be safe. And then again, with reference to the events at Charleville, we learnt yesterday for the first time, that the Police Inspector had received an injury to one of his arms. My hon. Friend the Member for North-East Cork, whose statement on that point I should prefer to rely upon, said that in the railway carriage he again and again after they left the station challenged the police to point out any injury which anyone had received, and the only answer that could be made was that the District Inspector pointed out to him a dent in his helmet. This was not an injury to the head, nor was it an injury to the arm; it was simply a dent in the helmet. The right hon. Gentleman was asked yesterday if an order was given to the police to fire on the crowd at the railway station. His answer was, "Yes, I believe so." Apparently, he did not take the trouble to inquire specifically as to whether the order was given. Does he consider the lives of Irishmen of so little importance that he does not think it necessary to do what I venture to say would be the first thing done in a similar case in this country—namely, to inquire as to whether the police were ordered to fire, or not? I should like to point out that the hon. Member for North-East Cork has clearly and distinctly stated that the policemen fired without orders, and without the knowledge of their officer. My hon. Friend said he told the Inspector to ask his men and he asked them all round the carriage, not knowing that they had fired, and two admitted that they had done so. Will the right hon. Gentleman still maintain that there was an order to fire? I say it is perfectly monstrous that when the police fire on the people in Ireland the right hon. Gentleman, who is really responsible for the act and who makes himself doubly responsible by the carelessness with which he treats it, will not take the trouble to inquire whether an order to fire was given or not. There is a strong case for inquiry. If this had occurred in England no Government would have dared to refuse an inquiry. In the Debate yesterday the hon. Member for Ilkeston (Sir W. Foster) referred to the manner in which he was followed by the police. The hon. Member was staying with me at that time. I did not accompany him because the property he was going to visit belonged to a gentleman with whom I had been on terms of friendship for some time, but the description brought back by the hon.

Member of the state of the property induced me to do what I had never done before, and will never do again—write to the owner and offer to go down there myself and see whether I could be of any use in bringing them to equitable terms. What were the thanks I got? In reply to my friendly letter I received a cold and formal reply, saying that my letter had been forwarded to the agent, Mr. O'Brien. A few days afterwards I received a letter from that amiable gentleman, saying he had had forwarded to him my letter, and learnt from it that two friends of mine (Sir W. Foster and Mr. Schnadhorst), notorious as disturbers of the peace, had visited the property, and, with the impertinence usual to the Saxon ignorance, had ventured to pronounce an opinion on the matter. I commend that term "Saxon ignorance" to the right hon. Gentleman. It is from one of his violent supporters. After that I took the first opportunity of visiting the property myself and of getting more Englishmen to visit it. I was fortunate in securing a good many other visitors. The result is that there is no dispute between the landlord and tenants on that property to-day. The Plan of Campaign has won a victory there. The evicted people are back in their homes and the tenants are living in peace. I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman how we stand exactly in Ireland as regards meetings. It is often represented in this country that meetings can go on anywhere in Ireland unless they are to be held in furtherance of "the conspiracy called the Plan of Campaign." A meeting was suppressed by the police at Bective Abbey in the County of Meath. There was no Plan of Campaign in operation there. When I asked a question in this House about it, the answer I received was that the meeting was held with the object of preventing farms being taken, and that the holding of it would have been an overt act in the general conspiracy now existing with that object. So that we have got on a step further. It is no longer the Plan of Campaign, but a general conspiracy all over the country for preventing people taking farms from which tenants have been unjustly evicted. That is a very serious change. Does the right hon. Gentleman mean that every man in Ireland has not a right to refuse to take land from which another man has been unjustly evicted? If so, let him say it in plain language. Let us know where we stand. I have always seen the importance of this point. The very first time I spoke to tenants in Ireland, I told them that their very strength lay in this particular, and that if they could not keep up the feeling in Ireland, that no one should take land from which another had been unjustly evicted, they would not win the battle, and would not deserve to win it. I have repeated that over and over again. If it is illegal, why has not the right hon. Gentleman prosecuted me for it? I will repeat it again, and in doing so I shall be only following up the advice that was practically given in this House by Members of the Government, when, in the autumn of 1886, we called attention to the danger of evictions, and the right hon. Gentleman, who was then Attorney General for Ireland, said there was no danger of evictions, because the Irish landlords were not fools and that it would not pay the landlords to turn their tenants out. General Buller was sent over to Ireland during that autumn, and he gave evidence before the Royal Commission. His statement was that when the landlords could not let their farms, then they were forced to consider the question of rent. Under these circumstances we are justified in treading in the footsteps of these gentlemen—one adorns the Bench, and the other graces the British Army.

*MR. SPEAKER: The remarks of the hon. Gentleman are not relevant to the Constabulary Vote.

*MR. PIERCE MAHONY: I will draw my remarks to a close, but in doing so I want to allude very briefly to the remarks with which the Chief Secretary concluded his speech yesterday. The right hon. Gentleman said that we complained that the police in Ireland were used to buttress up the property of the few, and he asked us if we considered the property of the few less sacred than the property of the many. Certainly not. But there is a dual ownership of farms in Ireland.

Mr. Pierce Mahony

The right hon. Gentleman forgot that point.

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! Dual ownership has no reference to the Constabulary Vote.

*MR. PIERCE MAHONY: The right hon. Gentleman distinctly stated that we complained that the police were used in Ireland for the purpose of buttressing up the property of the few. As regards the land in Ireland, the few have no property which is not shared by the tenants—the landlords and tenants are now joint owners; but I will not pursue the subject. The Chief Secretary concluded by alluding to what he called the absence of our Liberal friends during these Debates. I hope he notices that they have not been absent to-day. I think we may well feel our friends the Liberal Members have good excuse at this period of the Session for taking a little relaxation, and I am very much surprised, and I am also very thankful to them for attending in such large numbers. But the success of the cause in which we are working does not depend upon any party in this country. We rely on our own resources, we rely on the Irish people, we rely on a people who are not only in your very midst, in every large centre of population, but who are present in large numbers in every colony of this Empire, and who form a most important portion of the population of the greatest country the world has yet seen—the United States of America.

DR. FITZGERALD (Longford, S.): This Vote involves a large amount of the taxpayers' money. It has been rushed through the Committee with great haste and by means of the Closure. I feel, therefore, that a few remarks from me will not be out of place. The sums set forth in the Vote are said to be necessary, but the Irish Government have shrunk from answering the grave and specific charges which we have made against individual members of the police force, and what is graver still, they have refrained from answering our charge that they themselves have stimulated the police force to those crimes against the people in Ireland of which we now complain. I consider I am singularly fortunate in rising to speak now, because I see the hon. Member for South Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell) in his place. The other night the hon. Gentleman related some very interesting historical facts—facts which we have been endeavouring to place before the people of this country for a good many years—and he did it so lucidly and well I think, that now, as it were, in the evening of his somewhat chequered and unfortunate political career, the thanks of the Irish people and their representatives are due to him. The hon. Member told us of the good old days when the predecessors of those men with whom he is now in alliance were enabled to drive from their homes the peasantry of Ireland in order to make room for Scotch adventurers, to the good offices of whom we are indebted for the lustre which the hon. Member casts upon this assembly, and for the damage which he invariably does the Party opposite, with whom he has had nothing to do, but to whom he actually belongs. I am also fortunate in seeing the Solicitor General for Ireland in his place, who, on a former occasion, when the Lord Mayor of Dublin made the specific charges I am about to repeat, proudly described himself as the spokesman of the Irish Government. On that occasion the hon. and learned Gentleman invited my right hon. Friend not to discuss the question of the assault upon the hon. Member for Monaghan (Mr. P. O'Brien), and the question of the wounding of the man at Charleville, and the question of the arrest of the hon. Member for North East Cork (Mr. W. O'Brien), because, as he said, "the Government have no official information, and you as well as ourselves will be at a great disadvantage." From where did the hon. and learned Gentleman await information? From the source from which the hon. Member for South Tyrone derives his, which information has been shown in a law court recently to be absolutely untrue—information from the bailiff, from the landlord, from the emergency men, and lastly from the policemen, who are in alliance with the

Solicitor General for Ireland and his party. But we forced the hon. and learned Gentleman to make some reply. He asserted that the railway station was a nice quiet place whereat to effect the arrest of the hon. Member for North East Cork, upon a day when the whole county and town of Cork was astir. When he made that statement I saw a bilious smile pass over the faces of his supporters. I am at one with the hon. Member for South Tyrone, because, after the lamentable event which followed the arrest of Father M'Fadden—the death of Inspector Martin, but which undoubtedly lies at the doors of the Irish Government—it is trifling with the House of Commons, and is an insult to the Constitution, for a responsible Minister of the Crown and a lawyer to make such a statement. On that occasion the hon. Member for Monaghan was assaulted. He received some injuries which have since prostrated him, and which will probably shorten his days. The hon. and learned Gentleman hinted—but afterwards withdrew the hint—that a rescue of the hon. Member for North East Cork had been attempted by the hon. Member for Monaghan. When, immediately afterwards, the Chief Secretary came into the House, and was proceeding to repeat the assertion, what was the learned Gentleman doing? Not looking over the fusty pages of the Acts of Edward III., but pulling the Chief Secretary by the coat-tail, and trying to prevent him making the ridiculous assertion which he himself had just partly withdrawn. The hon. Member for Monaghan was assaulted by the police force, of whose conduct I now complain. We heard the other night the Chief Secretary parading before the House, and really before the country, the amicable relations which exist between the police and the people of Ireland. I knew what was in the right hon. Gentleman's mind. I knew by the corner of his eye what he had ringing in his ears. He was replying to the speeches of the noble Lord the Member for Paddington (Lord R. Churchill) and the hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Hanbury), which speeches showed that Englishmen can belong to a Party and still maintain their spirit of justice and fair play. The fact is the police force of Ireland is not a police force; it is a band of armed men who are under the control of an unfortunate clique of pauper landlords, who in turn control the action of the Irish Government. The first blight has fallen upon their cornfield in the shape of the speech of the noble Lord the Member for Paddington. A regular famine will undertake them before long. The people of this country will cut them adrift from their pauper landlords. Then, Sir, we will have the police in our hands, to use them, not as you have used them, for the purpose of crime and outrage against the people, but with that forbearance and moderation which is becoming honest and honourable men.

*MR. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe): I rise, Sir, to move the Adjournment of the Debate. We have now carried on this discussion for an hour past midnight, and it really amounts to a prolongation of the Debate we had last night on the Vote for the Constabulary, which was brought to an untimely and, I think, unprecedented end last night. I will not stray into matters that would be out of order, but I think I may go so far as to say the discussion was brought to a close in an unprecedented manner. But with reference to my Motion for Adjournment. I wish to call the attention of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who, I presume, is in charge of the House for the Government, to the Resolution under which we are now proceeding, and which was passed on April 30 last. Now, when that Resolution was passed, I think it was thoroughly understood, and I think pledges to the effect were given by the right hon. Gentleman who moved it and the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who supported it, that in exempting Report of Supply from the 12 o'clock Rule, the Report should only be taken after 12 o'clock on exceptional occasions, and when there was any desire on the part of any section of hon. Members to discuss any question on the Report, then the exemption should not be put in operation. It was emphatically stated then, on behalf of the Government, that the only object in passing the Resolution was to prevent the use of the individual "I object" after 12 o'clock. I think, seeing the desire of hon. Members below the Gangway to continue the discussion, we may fairly claim the fulfilment of this pledge, and that the Adjournment should be agreed to. I make this appeal to the First Lord, who, I see, is just now entering the House, and I hope he will not resist my Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the Debate be now adjourned."
—(Mr. John Ellis.)

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): I am exceedingly reluctant to oppose this Motion; but I think it must be allowed that, after two nights' discussion, continued, as it has been this evening, the matter might now fairly be disposed of. Some regard must be had to the necessary progress of business, and at this period of the Session I do not think it desirable that we should adjourn this discussion over another day. I think I may in reason ask the House to come to a decision on the Vote. [Cries of "No!" and "Certainly not!"] It is really necessary that the money should be voted.

MR. HALLEY STEWART (Lincolnshire, Spalding): There are many of us who have been engaged on Select Committees, and who have been at work for 13 hours, and surely, under the circumstances, having the prospect of a Saturday Sitting in view, we may, on the ground of fatigue, fairly claim an Adjournment of the Debate now.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I would be well, when the right hon. Gentleman makes what he considers a conciliatory proposal, that his followers on the other side should assist him by abstaining from interruptions which caused imitation on this side, feeling that have already been more than sufficiently strained this evening. As the Member for Nottingham has said, Parliamentary tradition is entirely on the side of Adjournment. This Rule was intended to prevent an expression of individual objection staying proceedings when there was a desire to go on. I must say that with the prospect of a Saturday Sitting in view I have little inclination to go on with the Debate now. But I think before we proceed any further the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary may give us that information we have sought so long in vain, and tell us out of what fund the charge for the battering-ram has been defrayed.

*MR. SPEAKER: It is out of order on a Motion for Adjournment.

MR. SEXTON: I only wish to suggest that the Chief Secretary should make the Debate on the Vote artistically complete by giving us an answer to this question.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am afraid I shall not be in order in entering at length into this matter, but perhaps I may just mention, as a matter of personal explanation, that as the cost of the battering-ram is defrayed out of no public fund at all, the matter is entirely out of my control, I cannot give the right hon. Gentleman the information he desires.

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

MR. O'DOHERTY (Donegal, N.): It has come to my knowledge, examining these accounts, that under the head of Law and Justice there is expenditure which really should stand in the accounts of the Royal Irish Constabulary to the extent of £10,000 in the present year.

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! That is a question that may be raised afterwards; it cannot be raised in the question of adjournment.

MR. O'DOHERTY: Then, Sir, I only desire now to support the Motion for adjournment.

MR. SEXTON: Perhaps my hon. Friend will allow us to proceed with the point desired to be raised, and will withdraw his Motion for adjournment.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question again proposed.

MR. O'DOHERTY: I may allude more fully to the point I mentioned just

now. In a discussion of this kind all the details of the accounts should be put before us that we may fairly estimate the increase or the decrease of expenditure and know the reasons for the one or the other. But there is a sum of £10,000 included in the Vote under the head of Law and Justice on account of travelling expenses, which really should come under the Vote for Constabulary. I think it is only right to call attention to this, and I have a strong objection to the system by which a Vote granted by the House for one purpose can be diverted to another. I think that the Auditor General's notes should be followed up in some way. I know this is a matter of detail, but I really think it is of little use our attempting to discuss these accounts if it is possible that an amount can be smuggled into one Vote when the expenditure is really under another head. I will not enter into the matter now, but it is a financial point that I think ought to be raised. I am satisfied that if we go carefully through the Law and Justice accounts, there is an amount of £10,000 in them that should be in the Constabulary Vote.

MR. BLANE (Armagh, S.): I ventured to say when the House was in Committee on this Vote that the Chief Secretary ought to give some explanation of the demand made for such an immense amount of money under this head. In the time of Sir Robert Peel the total amount of the Constabulary Vote was £437,000. In the year 1860-1 we find the Vote was £653,000, and now it has risen to the sum total of £1,439,371, and, possibly, if the system to which my hon. Friend has just referred is carried out to any extent, to a million and a half. There are a number of items in these accounts that require to be proved, money provided for half-pay troopers and a class of mud-stranded Admirals, men who, unfitted for the services for which they were trained, are by this means enabled to earn further sums by dragooning the people. We see how the Vote is swelled by the increase in the pay of District Inspectors, who, some years ago, were well paid at £120, and who now receive £250, and, with their total allowance, nearly £1 a day. This, I think, is a monstrous charge. When the pay was £120, the appointments did not go begging at all, and I think the officers were a better class of men than they are now when we give them pay equal to that we give a man who commands a regiment in its full strength and has to face enemies and take all the chances of loss of life, while these constabulary officers have little to do but hunt down Members of Parliament. When we consider the cost of living in Ireland and the average wages among the people, we must consider that all grades are overpaid, and especially when we compare the scale with that of the police in the Metropolis, where living is so expensive. Where a constable used to get £60, he now gets in pay and allowances nearly double that amount, with a chance, too, of getting a share in the large amount voted for extra pay and travelling allowances. The other day I drew the attention of the Chief Secretary to a police outrage committed in my County (Armagh), and I mentioned the circumstances in which certain constables wantonly fired at and made bullet holes in fishermen's boots, and I desire to ask again are these men to be prosecuted? The Chief Secretary said that I did not furnish him with the names, but I may say that the men to whom the boots belonged were Joseph and John Robinson, and another man whose name I think is Fox. But even when we give the fullest details we do not get any satisfaction. I hold that such offenders should be prosecuted with more severity than ordinary civilians, for they are the men who should show example of obedience to the law. The Constabulary Code says that arms are to be entrusted to the Constabulary to be used with prudence and humanity, but what prudence or humanity is there in the conduct of these policemen, which I described in Committee? The duty of the Government is to prosecute, not to defend, in such cases. But this can be said, that no matter whether we have a Tory or a Liberal Government, we have the same class of men in Dublin Castle where the headquarters of the police are situated. I ask the right hon. Gentleman now to give facilities for justice to be done in the cases which have been referred to.

MR. COX (Clare, E.) opposed the Vote.

MR. CONWAY (Leitrim, N.): It is much to be regretted that we have not had a Local Government Bill for Ireland, similar to the one which has been passed for Scotland, for I believe that, had such a Bill been passed, the cost of the Irish police would have been very materially reduced. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary has drawn a comparison between the cost of the Metropolitan Police and the cost of the Irish Police; but he failed to take into the comparison the cost of the police in the remainder of England, and therefore I venture to suggest that the contrast he drew was not a fair one. There is no other nation in the world which presents such a picture of Government as is presented in Ireland. What are the police of Ireland? The Chief Secretary bragged about them being the best possible force, physically and militarily speaking. But did he not consider it was a degradation to his own nation, when he enunciated such a proposition? You brag about your freedom and your flag which sustains liberty and gives relief to the slave, and yet, in Ireland, you are holding down your people by the help of the police. The details which we have had during the last two or three days of police administration in Ireland ought to induce the right hon. Gentleman to take the helm of reform instead of lolling on the Front Bench in an attitude which is a disgrace to any Minister.

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Gentleman must not make personal remarks of that kind.

MR. CONWAY: When one is addressing the House he naturally expects to meet with some attention; but when I am met with sneers and guffaws, such as the right hon. Gentleman indulges in, of course I do resent it. I say this Vote requires further explanation. The right hon. Gentleman stands in his place and contrasts the Metropolitan Police with the Irish Police; it is not a fair contrast, for he ignores the police of the rest of England, and, therefore, I say the Chief Secretary is simply sitting at ease and blowing bubbles in the air. Our time is not wasted even at this hour of the morning in impressing facts about the police on the minds of the English people. When we see a million and a half of money spent upon a Police Force which is not used for police purposes, I say we have great reason to complain. The sooner we can get rid of the present police system, and bring it within the scope of Local Government, the better it will be both for the English and the Irish people.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I wish to have further particulars as to the eviction of Mr. Molony at the instance of a Reverend gentleman living at Windsor, in England. The legal question raised in this case has been determined, but I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman by what power or authority he gave the Sheriff of the County of Limerick the use of a force of 60 men to put this Mr. Molony out of the holding the rent of which he had paid? This case affords an illustration of the manner in which the Sheriffs and landlords in Ireland have the forces of the Crown placed at their disposal. I again demand to know by what authority the police were used for this work? Six months ago I brought this matter before the House, and I was refused an answer as the case was then sub judice. Since then we have cast the landlord in damages, and, therefore, I again ask the Chief Secretary by what right sub-Sheriff Hobson used 60 policemen in order to turn this man out of the house for which he had paid the rent? Why do our Sheriffs and our landlords get police protection when they are doing an illegal act? How can you expect the people of Ireland will respect your Government if you allow your armed forces to engage in this work?

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I think I am entitled to ask for information as to whether a prosecution is to be instituted in the case of the four constables who, according to the testimony of my hon. Friend the Member for North

Armagh, committed a most inexplicable outrage in that county, and destroyed a boat, by means of which a number of poor men earned their living? Also, I hope the right hon. Gentleman will tell us why a force of 10 men took up a post near the residence of my hon. Friend the Member for East Clare and acted as an army of occupation there?

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: With regard to the last question asked by the right hon. Gentlemen opposite I have not the facts before me at present and cannot answer it. As to the hon. Member for East Clare the hon. Gentleman had been guilty of several illegal actions, and accordingly the police were interested in his motions. But I should think it improbable that they camped out in his garden. With regard to the case instanced by the hon. Member for Longford, it is the business of the police to provide protection for the Sheriff if he applies for it. The police cannot inquire into the merits of every case before acting, because that would convert them into a judicial body. As to the question put by the Lord Mayor of Dublin, a warrant has been issued against one of the men referred to; and no exception will be made in favour of policemen any more than other members of the community.

MR. COX: With regard to Police-constable Robinson who gave evidence against the hon. Member for Louth and myself, is he to escape with impunity? Is it not a fact, indeed, that he is on the list for promotion?

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No.

MR. COX: I am assured for a fact that that is so.

Question put, and agreed to.

INTERPRETATION BILL [LORDS.]

(No. 364.)

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. T. M. HEALY: I should like—as I understand this Bill is to be put down for Saturday—to know what business it is intended to take on that day. Also, under what conditions the Saturday sitting will be held? I think it is most inconvenient that we should have to sit on Saturday.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I cannot definitely answer the hon. Member's question in the absence of my right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Treasury. Saturday sittings may be avoided if satisfactory progress in business is made during the week.

MR. SEXTON: The First Lord of the Treasury hinted for the first time to-night that there would probably be a Saturday sitting. I think the business of the Session could easily be wound up without the necessity of Saturday sittings if reasonable conciliation were employed towards hon. Members from Ireland. At any rate, the Government may very well postpone the question of Saturday sittings until next week.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: If the right hon. Gentleman will allow the matter to stand over till to-morrow, when the Leader of the House will be in his place, I will undertake to place the views of hon. Members before him.

Second Reading deferred to this day.

ZULULAND—NATIVE CHIEFS.

QUESTIONS.—OBSERVATIONS.

LORD HERSCHELL: On behalf of my noble Friend the Earl of Aberdeen I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the evidence in the case of Dinizulu and other Zulu Chiefs recently tried by a Special Commission has been received by Her Majesty's Government?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Lord KNUTSFORD): The evidence in the cases of Dinuzulu, Undabuko, and Tshingana, has only just reached this country. It is now in course of revision, and will be sent to the printer as soon as possible; but some time must elapse before the printing can be completed, as the evidence is very voluminous. The evidence in the cases of Somhlolo and other Zulu Chiefs has already been placed in the Libraries of both Houses of Parliament. I need hardly add that when this evidence has been printed it will receive the very careful consideration of Her Majesty's Government.

THE MARQUESS OF LOTHIAN: With reference to what fell last night from two noble Lords who sit on the opposite side of the House, who are not present this afternoon, as to the position of the Provost of Dundee on the University Court, I may say that I have gone into the matter as I promised I would, and have come to the conclusion that I should adhere to the position which I have all along taken. It is exceedingly desirable that the University College of Dundee should be affiliated to the University of St. Andrews at the earliest possible moment, and the effect of the

of that town, being on the University Court of that University, would be very beneficial in leading to that result. I only make this statement because I stated last night that I would consider the matter before Report. Then, it will be remembered that the noble Lord (Lord Camperdown) moved an Amendment last night, which I also said I would consider. The noble Lord is not now present, but I am glad to be able to accept the Amendment which he proposed.

Amendment proposed, in Clause 8, page 8, line 21, to leave out the words "University Court," and insert the word "Commissioner" instead thereof. Agreed to.

Other Amendments made; Bill to be read 3<sup>a</sup> on Monday next.

PREVENTION OF CRUELTY TO AND PROTECTION OF CHILDREN BILL,
formerly CRUELTY TO CHILDREN PRE-VENTION BILL. (No. 160.)

Read 3<sup>a</sup> (according to order).

LORD HERSCHELL: On Clause 3 I have to move an Amendment which I mentioned yesterday, which I think will be an improvement in the licensing provision. At present that provision enables the Court to order that the child be permitted to be employed at an entertainment, or series of entertainments. I propose that instead of its being done in that form, it should be done by a license, and that that license may be granted for such time and during such hours of the day and subject to such restrictions and conditions as the Court may think fit. It does not compel the Court to impose any conditions whatever. They may give the license without any conditions. I think it advantageous that they should have power to impose conditions if they so think fit. I am led to think so by the course which has been pursued at Glasgow, which, I believe, has been extremely successful.

Amendment moved, in line 42, to leave out "order that," and insert "grant a license for such time and during such hours of the day and subject to such restrictions and conditions as it may think fit for."—Agreed to.

Consequential Amendments agreed to.

LORD HERSCHELL: The next Amendment I have to propose is to enable an Inspector under the Factory and Workshop Act to deal with these licenses in the way in which he deals with cases under that Act. In cases under the Factory Act the Inspector has power to see that the license is complied with and that the conditions are fulfilled. and I propose that the Secretary of State may assign to any Inspector appointed under the Factory Act the duty of seeing that the conditions of licenses under this Bill are complied with, and may also give the Inspector power to inspect premises and so forth.

Amendment moved, at end of Clause 3, to add—

"A Secretary of State may assign to any Inspector appointed, or to be appointed under Section 67 of the Factory and Workshops Act, 1878, specially and in addition to any other usual duties, the duty of seeing whether the restrictions and conditions of any license under the last preceding section are duly complied with, and any such Inspector shall have the same power to enter, inspect, and examine any place of public entertainment at which the employment of a child under the provisions of such clause is licensed for the time being, as an Inspector has to enter, inspect, and examine a factory or workshop under Section 68 of the same Act."—(The Lord Herschell.)

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Viscount Cross): I may mention that this Amendment entirely carries out the views of the Grand Committee which sat upon this Bill, and also the recommendations of the Royal Commission on Education which were especially directed to this point.

Amendment agreed to.

LORD HERSCHELL: Under the Elementary Education Act of 1876, and the Education (Scotland) Act of 1878, a child under 10 is not allowed to be employed except under certain conditions and restrictions. It might possibly be open to contention that a license under this Act exempted from the necessity of complying with these conditions as well as fulfilling the conditions of this particular enactment. Of course that is not intended, and in order to avoid any such point I have put on the Paper this Amendment.

Amendment moved, after the foregoing Amendment, to add the words—

"Nothing in this section contained shall affect the provisions of the Education (England) Act, 1876, or the Education (Scotland) Act, 1878."—(The Lord Herschell.)

Amendment agreed to.

LORD HERSCHELL: My next Amendment I move in fulfilment of the promise that I gave when this Proviso as to the employment of children under 10 was considered in Committee—namely, that a short time should be allowed before that part of the Act came into operation.

Amendment moved, after the foregoing Amendment, to insert the words—

"So much of Sub-section (c) of this section as makes it an offence to cause or procure a child to be in premises licensed according to law for public entertainment, or in any circus or other place of public amusement for the purpose of singing, playing, or performing for profit, shall not come into operation until the 1st day of November, 1889."—(The Lord Herschell.)

Amendment agreed to.

Bill passed, and sent to the Commons, to be printed as amended (No. 223.)

House adjourned at a quarter before Five o'clock, to Monday next, Three o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, 9th August, 1889.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

TAFF VALE RAILWAY BILL [LORDS].
(By Order.)

Order for Consideration read.

*THE CHAIRMAN OF WAYS AND MEANS (Mr. COURTNEY, Cornwall, Bodmin): This is a Bill upon which it is necessary that I should make some remarks. The House is aware that many Railway Companies who have built up their enterprise by Acts of Parliament containing varying powers have, of late, simplified their capital account by converting their Preference and Debenture stock into a unified stock. That has been done by several of the great Railway Companies to the simplification of their accounts and the advantage of the stock holders, nor is there any question of public interest involved in such conversion of their Preference and Debenture stock. They are irredeemable, and when we speak of £100,000 Preference stock at 5 per cent, and of £100,000 Preference stock at 4 per cent we ought more strictly to speak of the sums of £5,000 and £4,000 which are annually payable upon them. This Bill deals with the Debenture and Preference stock of the Taff Vale Railway Company, who propose to follow the precedent of other Companies, and if it had been confined to this object I should not have felt it necessary to trouble the House. But the Bill does more. The House is probably aware that many things have been attempted, and that some things have been done, with respect to the ordinary stock of Railway Companies—such, for instance, as dividing the ordinary stock into Deferred and Preferred stock, and increasing the nominal amount of stock. Many schemes have been proposed for producing the same simplicity in regard to ordinary stock as that which has been secured in regard to Preference and Deferred stock. The Bill now before the House, as it originally appeared in another place, proposed to enable this company, with the approval of the shareholders, to prepare and carry out a scheme of unification and simplification of its ordinary stock. The provisions of this Bill, and of other Bills with similar objects, have occupied the attention of my noble Friend the Chairman of Committees in another place and myself; but most of the measures which have been introduced have proved abortive and have been abandoned. But I think that on the present occasion a solution has been arrived at which may recommend itself to the House not only as good in itself, but as one which establishes a precedent, although it need not be followed unless it is approved by the general sense and wisdom of Parliament. This Taff Vale Railway is not a passenger railway under Lord Dalhousie's Act, which prescribes the terms under which passenger railways may be purchased. It is a mineral railway, and the average dividend which it has been paying for some years is 15 per cent. The company seek to convert their ordinary stock into one uniform stock of £250, that being about the market value of the stock with the high dividend now enjoyed by the Company. It is desired by the shareholders to increase the amount of the stock and thereby to make the price of it more nearly approximate its nominal value. Although, apparently, a merely domestic matter, my noble Friend and myself, together with other authorities who have had the subject under consideration, are of opinion that such a conversion could not be recommended to the approval of Parliament, but it has been suggested that it might be convenient to convert the old stock into a new stock of larger amount, provided a limit of dividend might be fixed. This railway company have complied with that suggestion, and have embodied in this Bill provisions by which every £100 of ordinary stock is converted into £250 ordinary Stock carrying in future a maximum dividend of 6 per cent. It is further provided that if the profits of the company should hereafter enable it to pay more than 6 per cent, any surplus in excess of 6 per cent shall be applied to the reduction of the tolls, rates, and charges leviable by the company, or in such other manner, in the interests of the public, as Parliament may from time to time suggest. It is further provided that the accounts shall be rendered under the ordinary Companies' Act, but so rendered that if, hereafter, any action could be taken under Lord Dalhousies' Act for the purchase of the railway the conditions and information necessary to enable that Act to be carried out shall always be in the hands of the Board of Trade. The Bill is of a simple character. It consolidates the Preference Stock according to the principles followed by all the Railway Companies of the country, and it also increases the amount of the ordinary Stock, accompanying that increase with the limitation that the dividend is not to exceed 6 per cent, and that if there is any increase of profit it shall go to the benefit of the public in the reduction of charges, tolls, and rates. I think that, under these circumstances, the Bill may safely receive the assent of Parliament. I may, however, remind the House that there is another stage, the Third Reading, yet to follow, so that the House does not lose command of the Bill by assenting to the present stage.

Mr. Courtney

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): My attention has been called to this matter during the progress of the Bill through both Houses. I wish to say, in addition to what has fallen from the right hon. Gentleman, that I think the House is very much indebted to him and to the Chairman of Committees in the other House for the care with which they have watched the interests of the public in this matter. The question of the increase of the Stock of Railway Companies by the process known as "watering" is, of course, one of great importance. For reasons which seemed to them sufficient, and in regard to which they appear to be quite unanimous, the shareholders of the Taff Vale Company desire to effect this change in their ordinary Stock. The right hon. Gentleman and his noble Colleague in the other House, as a condition of assenting to the proposal of the company, have insisted on the insertion of clauses in the Bill which, I think, are largely in the public interests, and which, if adopted as a precedent, will certainly secure the public advantage. All I would suggest is, that if this Bill should be followed next Session by other applications to Parliament for the same powers, that Parliament might usefully consider whether a strong Committee ought not to be appointed—probably a Joint Committee of both Houses—to look into the whole question, and report to Parliament as to the way in which the matter can best be dealt with.

Bill, as amended, considered, and ordered to be read a third time.

BURY CORPORATION BILL [LORDS.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [8th August], "That in the case of the Bury Corporation Bill [Lords]. Standing Order 243 be suspended, and that the Bill be now read a third time."—(Sir Henry James.)

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

*MR. COURTNEY: I beg to move—

"That the Bill be re-committed to the former Committee in respect of Sections 28 and 29.

That it be an Instruction to the Committee, that it is against the spirit and intent of Standing Order 173a to extend beyond sixty years the term of repayment of an existing debt contracted by a municipal corporation or local authority under a previous Act or Acts."

This Bill is promoted by the Corporation of Bury to authorise them to make certain waterworks. If it had been confined to that, there would be no occasion for me to trouble the House with any remarks; but there are two clauses in the Bill which are totally apart from all the rest of its structure and constituting, in fact, a separate Bill. It is to these clauses that I desire to direct the attention of the House. The Bury Corporation acquired the waterworks under an Act passed in 1872, and upon the works so acquired, there is a considerable debt. The Act of 1872 prescribed the conditions under which that debt should be repaid—conditions which, apparently, were not well understood by the Corporation of Bury at the time the Act was passed. The Corporation came again to Parliament in 1885, and the conditions of the repayment of debt contracted under the Act of 1872 came under the consideration of the Committee to whom the Bill of 1885 was referred. The Committee laid down very strict provisions as to the repayment of the debt, and, in fact, limited the repayment of the amount owing at that period to a period of 43 years. The Bury Corporation now come before Parliament with what is practically an Omnibus Bill, into which they introduce two clauses dealing with the existing debt and the conditions of repayment which were prescribed by the Acts of 1872 and 1885. In these two clauses the Corporation desire to extend the period of repayment of the still existing debt from a period of 43 years to 80 years. But Parliament has passed a Standing Order restricting the period for the redemption of debt under such circumstances to a period of 60 years. That is the Standing Order of Parliament in regard to applications for power to construct works and to contract loans in connection with them. Now, it is obvious that the clauses to which I have called attention, inasmuch as they do not refer to any works which are authorised by the Bill, but which were authorised by a previous Bill, do not in so many words come within the scope of this Standing Order No. 173a, but it must be apparent to the House that they come within the meaning and intent of the Standing Order, because otherwise the Standing Order would be reduced to a nullity. Or this process would be possible: a Bill might be introduced this Session authorising works to be made in conformity with the Standing Order which prescribes 60 years as the term within which the money borrowed for the construction of the works must be repaid, and next Session another Bill might be introduced extending the term from 60 to 80 years. It might then be said that the second Bill did not come within the Standing Order because it did not authorise money to be raised for the construction of the works. Therefore, the Standing Order is capable of being reduced to a nullity. You conform to it one year by bringing in a Bill for works, and prescribing a period of 60 years for the repayment of borrowed money, and then you apply for an extension of time, and the Committee are able to say that, inasmuch as the Bill does not authorise a loan to be granted in order to meet the cost of the works, it does not come within the scope of the Standing Order. It is quite clear that that is a contention which must be at once met and reprobated. The Standing Order would, in the event of such a construction being put upon it by the Committee, at once disappear. I have, therefore, felt it necessary to put upon the Paper this Motion for the recommitment of the Bill to the former Committee, with an Instruction in reference to the two clauses to which I have referred. If the House agree to that Instruction and re-commit the Bill, I presume that the Committee will be obliged to carry out the intention of the Standing Order by reducing the term so that it shall not exceed a period of 60 years. I think that the Committee have gone grievously wrong in supposing that the question of extending the period for the repayment of the existing debt does not come within the Standing Order. I am bound to pay some respect to the circumstances which they report in respect of this particular Corporation — circumstances which rather amount to an ad misericordiam appeal rather than to anything substantial. They say that when the Corporation of Bury got their Act in 1872 they thought they were allowed 100 years for the repayment of the debt; that they were obliged to put by a Sinking Fund for the payment of the debt, and to allow it to accumulate every year, which is a very different thing from the repayment of debt. They pray for leniency, and they point out that they are burdened with costly works and with a Sinking Fund, which tells very heavily upon them. The Committee say that the terms are onerous and ought to be relaxed, but in that case the Corporation ought to come to Parliament and ask for its sanction, notwithstanding the Standing Order. They have, however, assumed that they have a right to do what they have done, and that assumption ought not to be allowed to pass without notice. Under these circumstances, I think the House might so far assent to the view taken by the Committee as not to insist on the term of 60 years in this case, but might make a compromise fixing it at 70 years, a sort of half-way house between what the Corporation ask for and the Committee good-naturedly assented to, and that which the House has laid down as the proper period of repayment. If that suggestion recommends itself to the House, it will be easy to add words to the Instruction to the Committee to amend the Bill by inserting 70 instead of 80. I throw out that suggestion with some reluctance, because I recollect that only two years ago another Committee—upon a Sheffield Bill—went wrong in a similar way, they then condoned the error, and we are now asked to condone the same error a second time. My view is that, as the error has been pointed out once, it ought not to have been repeated. At present I will content myself by moving the Instruction which appears on the Paper, but I shall not be averse to consider the compromise which I have suggested.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "[Lords]," to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "the Bill be re-committed to the former Committee in respect of sections 28 and 29:—that it be an Instruction to the Committee, that it is against the spirit and intent of Standing Order 173A to extend beyond sixty years the term of repayment of an existing debt contracted by a Municipal Corporation or Local Authority under a previous Act or Acts."—(The Chairman of Ways and Means.)

Mr. Courtney

*SIR H. JAMES (Bury): I am well aware of the value of the public time at this period of the Session, and therefore I will not occupy the attention of the House at the time of private business at an unnecessary length; the question, however, is of such vast importance to my constituents, that I make no apology to the House for asking to occupy its attention while I state the peculiar circumstances under which my constituents seek relief. I am not going to follow the right hon. Gentleman in the construction he has put upon the Standing Order; but I think that when I have related the whole of the circumstances to the House, it will be considered that the ratepayers of Bury are entitled to the relief they seek. I am not going to ask for the repeal or alteration of the Standing Order, nor have the promoters of the Bill asked for any relief from it. In the year 1872 the Corporation of Bury found it necessary to become the owners of the water works so that they might supply the town of Bury with water. They took upon themselves a burden of £590,000, and they found themselves required not only to find water for the town of Bury, but for the outlying districts, which are greater than Bury itself. The whole burden of the expenditure fell upon Bury ratepayers alone. They were under the impression that the debt they contracted was to be paid off in 100 years; they would not, and could not, have under, taken to pay it off in less. The Standing Order did not come into existence until 1882, and it must be borne in mind that before 1882 100 years was not an unusual period to fix for the payment of money borrowed for water purposes. My constituents accepted the burden, and went on performing what they believed to be their duty. In 1885 they came to Parliament for another Bill, and the penalty was imposed upon them that within 44 years of that time they should pay off the debt. What has been the result? The inhabitants of Bury are now paying the enormous sum of 11d. in the £1 for this sinking fund alone, and, with one exception, I believe there is no town in the kingdom which pays more than 2½d. In Birmingham, the figure is only ½d., but the average is, I believe, 1½d. Yet Bury is paying 11d., and is paying it for a supply of water, four-sevenths of which is supplied outside the borough to non-ratepayers. The outlying districts pay nothing towards the sinking fund, but the people of Bury are compelled to pay the whole. The Chairman of Ways and Means says that the Bill contains two clauses, which have nothing to do with the rest of the Bill. He is entirely in error. Bury is compelled to provide an additional supply of water for manufacturing as well as household purposes, and it was only when they found themselves compelled to borrow a sum of £130,000 that they came to this House to ask for relief. When they borrowed in 1872 they did not know that they would be compelled to pay the money in less than 100 years, and if the right hon. Gentleman the Chairman of Committees succeeds in carrying his proposition, the result will be that either the manufacturers or the poor people will be deprived of the supply of water which they absolutely require. No other town in England approaches Bury in the heavy burden it has to bear for its water supply. Two years ago the town of Sheffield came to this House and obtained the concession for which Bury now asks, yet the case of Sheffield was not one half as strong; the concession was granted because Sheffield was maintaining works greater than the requirements of the town demanded. Sheffield asked for 90 years. We are only asking for 80—62 years from the present time. The Chairman of Ways and Means made a protest in the case of Sheffield; but he did not ask the Committee to reject the conclusion the Committee had arrived at. Yet he asks the House to reject the conclusion which the Committee have come to in the case of Bury. I appeal to the right hon. Gentleman to take the same course as that which he took in 1887, and to support the Report of the Committee, in consequence of the special circumstances of the case. I presume that the Standing Order represents a principle, but there are exceptional circumstances in this case to which the Standing Order ought not to apply. If this Bill is not passed, it will be impossible to continue the sanitary arrangements which are essential for the well-being of the town. I therefore earnestly entreat the House to allow this concession to be made to the town of Bury.

SIR J. PULESTON (Devonport): As Chairman of the Committee by whom this Bill was considered, I wish to say that the peculiar circumstances of the measure have been succinctly stated by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bury (Sir H. James). The Chairman of Ways and Means has to some extent disavowed his action in connection with the Corporation of Sheffield.

MR. COURTNEY: No.

SIR J. PULESTON: At any rate he has asserted that it ought not to be a precedent; but the Committee could not ignore what had taken place in reference to Sheffield. We discussed the question of Bury strictly on its own merits, and if the Chairman of Ways and Means had sat upon the Committee and heard the whole of the evidence, I am sure he would have concurred in what was, in fact, the unanimous view of the Committee. The right hon. Gentleman has repudiated the idea of interpreting the Standing Order as applying to existing debts, but the President of the Local Government Board distinctly stated that the Standing Order of 1882 did not apply to pre-existing debts. We also took into consideration the very important fact that the Bury Corporation came to Parliament for other powers quite distinct from the original powers of the Bury Improvement Act, which have resulted in the onerous charge of an elevenpenny rate. Such a water rate as that is unknown, I believe, in any other community. If this Bill passes, the inhabitants of Bury will have to pay a rate of 2½d., which was, I believe, the sum against which the people of Sheffield protested. The Committee passed the Bill without the least hesitation, and they carefully considered the exact meaning of the Standing Order. I do not agree with the Chairman of Ways and Means in the interpretation he has placed upon the Standing Order, but I agree in the view of the President of the Local Government Board, that loans contracted before the Standing Order came into existence in 1882 do not come within the Standing Order. The Standing Order refers to loans under the Bill, but this is not in any sense a loan under the Bill. The Chairman of Ways and Means says that we ought to have come to the House and asked for permission to disobey the Standing Order, but we did not consider

£120, and who now receive £250, and, with their total allowance, nearly £1 a day. This, I think, is a monstrous charge. When the pay was £120, the appointments did not go begging at all, and I think the officers were a better class of men than they are now when we give them pay equal to that we give a man who commands a regiment in its full strength and has to face enemies and take all the chances of loss of life, while these constabulary officers have little to do but hunt down Members of Parliament. When we consider the cost of living in Ireland and the average wages among the people, we must consider that all grades are overpaid, and especially when we compare the scale with that of the police in the Metropolis, where living is so expensive. Where a constable used to get £60, he now gets in pay and allowances nearly double that amount, with a chance, too, of getting a share in the large amount voted for extra pay and travelling allowances. The other day I drew the attention of the Chief Secretary to a police outrage committed in my County (Armagh), and I mentioned the circumstances in which certain constables wantonly fired at and made bullet holes in fishermen's boots, and I desire to ask again are these men to be prosecuted? The Chief Secretary said that I did not furnish him with the names, but I may say that the men to whom the boots belonged were Joseph and John Robinson, and another man whose name I think is Fox. But even when we give the fullest details we do not get any satisfaction. I hold that such offenders should be prosecuted with more severity than ordinary civilians, for they are the men who should show example of obedience to the law. The Constabulary Code says that arms are to be entrusted to the Constabulary to be used with prudence and humanity, but what prudence or humanity is there in the conduct of these policemen, which I described in Committee? The duty of the Government is to prosecute, not to defend, in such cases. But this can be said, that no matter whether we have a Tory or a Liberal Government, we have the same class of men in Dublin Castle where the headquarters of the police are situated. I ask the right hon. Gentleman now to give facilities for justice to be done in the cases which have been referred to.

MR. COX (Clare, E.) opposed the Vote.

MR. CONWAY (Leitrim, N.): It is much to be regretted that we have not had a Local Government Bill for Ireland, similar to the one which has been passed for Scotland, for I believe that, had such a Bill been passed, the cost of the Irish police would have been very materially reduced. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary has drawn a comparison between the cost of the Metropolitan Police and the cost of the Irish Police; but he failed to take into the comparison the cost of the police in the remainder of England, and therefore I venture to suggest that the contrast he drew was not a fair one. There is no other nation in the world which presents such a picture of Government as is presented in Ireland. What are the police of Ireland? The Chief Secretary bragged about them being the best possible force physically and militarily speaking. But did he not consider it was a degradation to his own nation, when he enunciated such a proposition? You brag about your freedom and your flag which sustains liberty and gives relief to the slave, and yet, in Ireland, you are holding down your people by the help of the police. The details which we have had during the last two or three days of police administration in Ireland ought to induce the right hon. Gentleman to take the helm of reform instead of lolling on the Front Bench in an attitude which is a disgrace to any Minister.

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Gentleman must not make personal remarks of that kind.

MR. CONWAY: When one is addressing the House he naturally expects to meet with some attention; but when I am met with sneers and guffaws, such as the right hon. Gentleman indulges in, of course I do resent it. I say this Vote requires further explanation. The right hon. Gentleman stands in his place and contrasts the Metropolitan Police with the Irish Police; it is not fair contrast, for he ignores the police of the rest of England, and, therefore, I say the Chief Secretary is simply sitting at ease and blowing bubbles in the air. Our time is not wasted even at this hour of the morning in impressing facts about the police on the minds of the English people. When we see a million and a half of money spent upon a Police Force which is not used for police purposes, I say we have great reason to complain. The sooner we can get rid of the present police system, and bring it within the scope of Local Government, the better it will be both for the English and the Irish people.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I wish to have further particulars as to the eviction of Mr. Molony at the instance of a Reverend gentleman living at Windsor, in England. The legal question raised in this case has been determined, but I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman by what power or authority he gave the Sheriff of the County of Limerick the use of a force of 60 men to put this Mr. Molony out of the holding the rent of which he had paid? This case affords an illustration of the manner in which the Sheriffs and landlords in Ireland have the forces of the Crown placed at their disposal. I again demand to know by what authority the police were used for this work? Six months ago I brought this matter before the House, and I was refused an answer as the case was then sub judice. Since then we have cast the landlord in damages, and, therefore, I again ask the Chief Secretary by what right sub-Sheriff Hobson used 60 policemen in order to turn this man out of the house for which he had paid the rent? Why do our Sheriffs and our landlords get police protection when they are doing an illegal act? How can you expect the people of Ireland will respect your Government if you allow your armed forces to engage in this work?

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I think I am entitled to ask for information as to whether a prosecution is to be instituted in the case of the four constables who, according to the testimony of my hon. Friend the Member for North

Armagh, committed a most inexplicable outrage in that county, and destroyed a boat, by means of which a number of poor men earned their living? Also, I hope the right hon. Gentleman will tell us why a force of 10 men took up a post near the residence of my hon. Friend the Member for East Clare and acted as an army of occupation there?

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: With regard to the last question asked by the right hon. Gentlemen opposite I have not the facts before me at present and cannot answer it. As to the hon. Member for East Clare the hon. Gentleman had been guilty of several illegal actions, and accordingly the police were interested in his motions. But I should think it improbable that they camped out in his garden. With regard to the case instanced by the hon. Member for Longford, it is the business of the police to provide protection for the Sheriff if he applies for it. The police cannot inquire into the merits of every case before acting, because that would convert them into a judicial body. As to the question put by the Lord Mayor of Dublin, a warrant has been issued against one of the men referred to; and no exception will be made in favour of policemen any more than other members of the community.

MR. COX: With regard to Police-constable Robinson who gave evidence against the hon. Member for Louth and myself, is he to escape with impunity? Is it not a fact, indeed, that he is on the list for promotion?

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No.

MR. COX: I am assured for a fact that that is so.

Question put, and agreed to.

INTERPRETATION BILL [LORDS.]

(No. 364.)

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. T. M. HEALY: I should like—as I understand this Bill is to be put down for Saturday—to know what business it is intended to take on that day. Also, under what conditions the Saturday sitting will be held? I think it is most inconvenient that we should have to sit on Saturday.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I cannot definitely answer the hon. Member's question in the absence of my right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Treasury. Saturday sittings may be avoided if satisfactory progress in business is made during the week.

MR. SEXTON: The First Lord of the Treasury hinted for the first time to-night that there would probably be a Saturday sitting. I think the business of the Session could easily be wound up without the necessity of Saturday sittings if reasonable conciliation were employed towards hon. Members from Ireland. At any rate, the Government may very well postpone the question of Saturday sittings until next week.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: If the right hon. Gentleman will allow the matter to stand over till to-morrow, when the Leader of the House will be in his place, I will undertake to place the views of hon. Members before him.

Second Reading deferred to this day.

SUCK DRAINAGE BILL. [PRIVATE BILL.]

Brought from the Commons; read 1st, and referred to the Examiners.

ZULULAND—NATIVE CHIEFS.

QUESTIONS.—OBSERVATIONS.

LORD HERSCHELL: On behalf of my noble Friend the Earl of Aberdeen I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the evidence in the case of Dinizulu and other Zulu Chiefs recently tried by a Special Commission has been received by Her Majesty's Government?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Lord KNUTSFORD): The evidence in the cases of Dinuzulu, Undabuko, and Tshingana, has only just reached this country. It is now in course of revision, and will be sent to the printer as soon as possible; but some time must elapse before the printing can be completed, as the evidence is very voluminous. The evidence in the cases of Somhlolo and other Zulu Chiefs has already been placed in the Libraries of both Houses of Parliament. I need hardly add that when this evidence has been printed it will receive the very careful consideration of Her Majesty's Government.

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACTS AMENDMENT BILL. (No. 191.)

Amendments reported (according to order).

THE MARQUESS OF LOTHIAN: With reference to what fell last night from two noble Lords who sit on the opposite side of the House, who are not present this afternoon, as to the position of the Provost of Dundee on the University Court, I may say that I have gone into the matter as I promised I would, and have come to the conclusion that I should adhere to the position which I have all along taken. It is exceedingly desirable that the University College of Dundee should be affiliated to the University of St. Andrews at the earliest possible moment, and the effect of the Provost of Dundee, the Chief Magistrate of that town, being on the University Court of that University, would be very beneficial in leading to that result. I only make this statement because I stated last night that I would consider the matter before Report. Then, it will be remembered that the noble Lord (Lord Camperdown) moved an Amendment last night, which I also said I would consider. The noble Lord is not now present, but I am glad to be able to accept the Amendment which he proposed.

Amendment proposed, in Clause 8, page 8, line 21, to leave out the words "University Court," and insert the word "Commissioner" instead thereof. Agreed to.

Other Amendments made; Bill to be read 3<sup>a</sup> on Monday next.

PRINCE OF WALES'S CHILDREN BILL.

PREVENTION OF CRUELTY TO AND PROTECTION OF CHILDREN BILL,

Read 3<sup>a</sup> (according to order).

LORD HERSCHELL: On Clause 3 I have to move an Amendment which I mentioned yesterday, which I think will be an improvement in the licensing provision. At present that provision enables the Court to order that the child be permitted to be employed at an entertainment, or series of entertainments. I propose that instead of its being done in that form, it should be done by a license, and that that license may be granted for such time and during such hours of the day and subject to such restrictions and conditions as the Court may think fit. It does not compel the Court to impose any conditions whatever. They may give the license without any conditions. I think it advantageous that they should have power to impose conditions if they so think fit. I am led to think so by the course which has been pursued at Glasgow, which, I believe, has been extremely successful.

Amendment moved, in line 42, to leave out "order that," and insert "grant a license for such time and during such hours of the day and subject to such restrictions and conditions as it may think fit for."—Agreed to.

Consequential Amendments agreed to.

LORD HERSCHELL: The next Amendment I have to propose is to enable an Inspector under the Factory and Workshop Act to deal with these licenses in the way in which he deals with cases under that Act. In cases under the Factory Act the Inspector has power to see that the license is complied with and that the conditions are fulfilled, and I propose that the Secretary of State may assign to any Inspector appointed under the Factory Act the duty of seeing that the conditions of licenses under this Bill are complied with, and may also give the Inspector power to inspect premises and so forth.

Amendment moved, at end of Clause 3, to add—

"A Secretary of State may assign to any Inspector appointed, or to be appointed under Section 67 of the Factory and Workshops Act, 1878, specially and in addition to any other usual duties, the duty of seeing whether the restrictions and conditions of any license under the last preceding section are duly complied with, and any such Inspector shall have the same power to enter, inspect, and examine any place of public entertainment at which the employment of a child under the provisions of such clause is licensed for the time being, as an Inspector has to enter, inspect, and examine a factory or workshop under Section 68 of the same Act."—(The Lord Herschell.)

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Viscount Cross): I may mention that this Amendment entirely carries out the views of the Grand Committee which sat upon this Bill, and also the recommendations of the Royal Commission on Education which were especially directed to this point.

Amendment agreed to.

LORD HERSCHELL: Under the Elementary Education Act of 1876, and the Education (Scotland) Act of 1878, a child under 10 is not allowed to be employed except under certain conditions and restrictions. It might possibly be open to contention that a license under this Act exempted from the necessity of complying with those conditions as well as fulfilling the conditions of this particular enactment. Of course that is not intended, and in order to avoid any such point I have put on the Paper this Amendment.

Amendment moved, after the foregoing Amendment, to add the words—

"Nothing in this section contained shall affect the provisions of the Education (England) Act, 1876, or the Education (Scotland) Act, 1878."—(The Lord Herschell.)

Amendment agreed to.

LORD HERSCHELL: My next Amendment I move in fulfilment of the promise that I gave when this Proviso as to the employment of children under 10 was considered in Committee—namely, that a short time should be allowed before that part of the Act came into operation.

Amendment moved, after the foregoing Amendment, to insert the words—

"So much of Sub-section (c) of this section as makes it an offence to cause or procure a child to be in premises licensed according to law for public entertainment, or in any circus or other place of public amusement for the purpose of singing, playing, or performing for profit, shall not come into operation until the 1st day of November, 1889."—(The Lord Herschell.)

Amendment agreed to.

Bill passed, and sent to the Commons, to be printed as amended (No. 223.)

House adjourned at a quarter before
Five o'clock, to Monday next,
Three o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

—o—

TAFF VALE RAILWAY BILL [LORDS].
(By Order.)

Order for Consideration read.

*THE CHAIRMAN OF WAYS AND MEANS (Mr. COURTNEY, Cornwall, Bodmin): This is a Bill upon which it is necessary that I should make some remarks. The House is aware that many Railway Companies who have built up their enterprise by Acts of Parliament containing varying powers have, of late, simplified their capital account by converting their Preference and Debenture stock into a unified stock. That has been done by several of the great Railway Companies to the simplification of their accounts and the advantage of the stock holders, nor is there any question of public interest involved in such conversion of their Preference and Debenture stock. They are irredeemable, and when we speak of £100,000 Preference stock at 5 per cent, and of £100,000 Preference stock at 4 per cent we ought more strictly to speak of the sums of £5,000 and £4,000 which are annually payable upon them. This Bill deals with the Debenture and Preference stock of the Taff Vale Railway Company, who propose to follow the precedent of other Companies, and if it had been confined to this object I should not have felt it necessary to trouble the House. But the Bill does more. The House is probably aware that many things have been attempted, and that some things have been done, with respect to the ordinary stock of Railway Companies—such, for instance, as dividing the ordinary stock into Deferred and Preferred stock, and increasing the nominal amount of stock. Many schemes have been proposed for producing the same simplicity in regard to ordinary stock as that which has been secured in regard to Preference and Deferred stock. The Bill now before the House, as it originally appeared in another place, proposed to enable this company, with the approval of the shareholders, to prepare and carry out a scheme of unification and simplification of its ordinary stock. The provisions of this Bill, and of other Bills with similar objects, have occupied the attention of my noble Friend the Chairman of Committees in another place and myself; but most of the measures which have been introduced have proved abortive and have been abandoned. But I think that on the present occasion a solution has been arrived at which may recommend itself to the House not only as good in itself, but as one which establishes a precedent, although it need not be followed unless it is approved by the general sense and wisdom of Parliament. This Taff Vale Railway is not a passenger railway under Lord Dalhousie's Act, which prescribes the terms under which passenger railways may be purchased. It is a mineral railway, and the average dividend which it has been paying for some years is 15 per cent. The company seek to convert their ordinary stock into one uniform stock of £250, that being about the market value of the stock with the high dividend now enjoyed by the Company. It is desired by the shareholders to increase the amount of the stock and thereby to make the price of it more nearly approximate its nominal value. Although, apparently, a merely domestic matter, my noble Friend and myself, together with other authorities who have had the subject under consideration, are of opinion that such a conversion could not be recommended to the approval of Parliament, but it has been suggested that it might be convenient to convert the old stock into a new stock of larger amount, provided a limit of dividend might be fixed. This railway company have complied with that suggestion, and have embodied in this Bill provisions by which every £100 of ordinary stock is converted into £250 ordinary Stock carrying in future a maximum dividend of 6 per cent. It is further provided that if the profits of the company should hereafter enable it to pay more than 6 per cent, any surplus in excess of 6 per cent shall be applied to the reduction of the tolls, rates, and charges leviable by the company, or in such other manner, in the interests of the public, as Parliament may from time to time suggest. It is further provided that the accounts shall be rendered under the ordinary Companies' Act, but so rendered that if, hereafter, any action could be taken under Lord Dalhousies' Act for the purchase of the railway the conditions and information necessary to enable that Act to be carried out shall always be in the hands of the Board of Trade. The Bill is of a simple character. It consolidates the Preference Stock according to the principles followed by all the Railway Companies of the country, and it also increases the amount of the ordinary Stock, accompanying that increase with the limitation that the dividend is not to exceed 6 per cent, and that if there is any increase of profit it shall go to the benefit of the public in the reduction of charges, tolls, and rates. I think that, under these circumstances, the Bill may safely receive the assent of Parliament. I may, however, remind the House that there is another stage, the Third Reading, yet to follow, so that the House does not lose command of the Bill by assenting to the present stage.

Mr. Courtney

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): My attention has been called to this matter during the progress of the Bill through both Houses. I wish to say, in addition to what has fallen from the right hon. Gentleman, that I think the House is very much indebted to him and to the Chairman of Committees in the other House for the care with which they have watched the interests of the public in this matter. The question of the increase of the Stock of Railway Companies by the process known as "watering" is, of course, one of great importance. For reasons which seemed to them sufficient, and in regard to which they appear to be quite unanimous, the shareholders of the Taff Vale Company desire to effect this change in their ordinary Stock. The right hon. Gentleman and his noble Colleague in the other House, as a condition of assenting to the proposal of the company, have insisted on the insertion of clauses in the Bill which, I think, are largely in the public interests, and which, if adopted as a precedent, will certainly secure the public advantage. All I would suggest is, that if this Bill should be followed next Session by other applications to Parliament for the same powers, that Parliament might usefully consider whether a strong Committee ought not to be appointed—probably a Joint Committee of both Houses—to look into the whole question, and report to Parliament as to the way in which the matter can best be dealt with.

Bill, as amended, considered, and ordered to be read a third time.

BURY CORPORATION BILL [LORDS.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [8th August], "That in the case of the Bury Corporation Bill [Lords]. Standing Order 243 be suspended, and that the Bill be now read a third time."—(Sir Henry James.)

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

*MR. COURTNEY: I beg to move—

"That the Bill be re-committed to the former Committee in respect of Sections 28 and 29.

That it be an Instruction to the Committee that it is against the spirit and intent of Standing Order 173a to extend beyond sixty years the term of repayment of an existing debt contracted by a municipal corporation or local authority under a previous Act or Acts."

This Bill is promoted by the Corporation of Bury to authorise them to make certain waterworks. If it had been confined to that, there would be no occasion for me to trouble the House with any remarks; but there are two clauses in the Bill which are totally apart from all the rest of its structure and constituting, in fact, a separate Bill. It is to these clauses that I desire to direct the attention of the House. The Bury Corporation acquired the waterworks under an Act passed in 1872, and upon the works so acquired, there is a considerable debt. The Act of 1872 prescribed the conditions under which that debt should be repaid—conditions which, apparently, were not well understood by the Corporation of Bury at the time the Act was passed. The Corporation came again to Parliament in 1885, and the conditions of the repayment of debt contracted under the Act of 1872 came under the consideration of the Committee to whom the Bill of 1885 was referred. The Committee laid down very strict provisions as to the repayment of the debt, and, in fact, limited the repayment of the amount owing at that period to a period of 43 years. The Bury Corporation now come before Parliament with what is practically an Omnibus Bill, into which they introduce two clauses dealing with the existing debt and the conditions of repayment which were prescribed by the Acts of 1872 and 1885. In these two clauses the Corporation desire to extend the period of repayment of the still existing debt from a period of 43 years to 80 years. But Parliament has passed a Standing Order restricting the period for the redemption of debt under such circumstances to a period of 60 years. That is the Standing Order of Parliament in regard to applications for power to construct works and to contract loans in connection with them. Now, it is obvious that the clauses to which I have called attention, inasmuch as they do not refer to any works which are authorised by the Bill, but which were authorised by a previous Bill, do not in so many words come within the scope of this Standing Order No. 173a, but it must be apparent to the House that they come within the meaning and intent of the Standing Order, because otherwise the Standing Order would be reduced to a nullity. Or this process would be possible: a Bill might be introduced this Session authorising works to be made in conformity with the Standing Order which prescribes 60 years as the term within which the money borrowed for the construction of the works must be repaid, and next Session another Bill might be introduced extending the term from 60 to 80 years. It might then be said that the second Bill did not come within the Standing Order because it did not authorise money to be raised for the construction of the works. Therefore, the Standing Order is capable of being reduced to a nullity. You conform to it one year by bringing in a Bill for works, and prescribing a period of 60 years for the repayment of borrowed money, and then you apply for an extension of time, and the Committee are able to say that, inasmuch as the Bill does not authorise a loan to be granted in order to meet the cost of the works, it does not come within the scope of the Standing Order. It is quite clear that that is a contention which must be at once met and reprobated. The Standing Order would, in the event of such a construction being put upon it by the Committee, at once disappear. I have, therefore, felt it necessary to put upon the Paper this Motion for the recommittal of the Bill to the former Committee, with an Instruction in reference to the two clauses to which I have referred. If the House agree to that Instruction and re-commit the Bill, I presume that the Committee will be obliged to carry out the intention of the Standing Order by reducing the term so that it shall not exceed a period of 60 years. I think that the Committee have gone grievously wrong in supposing that the question of extending the period for the repayment of the existing debt does not come within the Standing Order. I am bound to pay some respect to the circumstances which they report in respect of this particular Corporation — circumstances which rather amount to an ad misericordiam appeal rather than to anything substantial. They say that when the Corporation of Bury got their Act in 1872 they thought they were allowed 100 years for the repayment of the debt; that they were obliged to put by a Sinking Fund for the payment of the debt, and to allow it to accumulate every year, which is a very different thing from the repayment of debt. They pray for leniency, and they point out that they are burdened with costly works and with a Sinking Fund, which tells very heavily upon them. The Committee say that the terms are onerous and ought to be relaxed, but in that case the Corporation ought to come to Parliament and ask for its sanction, notwithstanding the Standing Order. They have, however, assumed that they have a right to do what they have done, and that assumption ought not to be allowed to pass without notice. Under these circumstances, I think the House might so far assent to the view taken by the Committee as not to insist on the term of 60 years in this case, but might make a compromise fixing it at 70 years, a sort of half-way house between what the Corporation ask for and the Committee good-naturedly assented to, and that which the House has laid down as the proper period of repayment. If that suggestion recommends itself to the House, it will be easy to add words to the Instruction to the Committee to amend the Bill by inserting 70 instead of 80. I throw out that suggestion with some reluctance, because I recollect that only two years ago another Committee—upon a Sheffield Bill—went wrong in a similar way, they then condoned the error, and we are now asked to condone the same error a second time. My view is that, as the error has been pointed out once, it ought not to have been repeated. At present I will content myself by moving the Instruction which appears on the Paper, but I shall not be averse to consider the compromise which I have suggested.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "[Lords]," to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "the Bill be re-committed to the former Committee in respect of sections 28 and 29:—that it be an Instruction to the Committee, that it is against the spirit and intent of Standing Order 173A to extend beyond sixty years the term of repayment of an existing debt contracted by a Municipal Corporation or Local Authority under a previous Act or Acts."—(The Chairman of Ways and Means.)

Mr. Courtney

*SIR H. JAMES (Bury): I am well aware of the value of the public time at this period of the Session, and therefore I will not occupy the attention of the House at the time of private business at an unnecessary length; the question, however, is of such vast importance to my constituents, that I make no apology to the House for asking to occupy its attention while I state the peculiar circumstances under which my constituents seek relief. I am not going to follow the right hon. Gentleman in the construction he has put upon the Standing Order; but I think that when I have related the whole of the circumstances to the House, it will be considered that the ratepayers of Bury are entitled to the relief they seek. I am not going to ask for the repeal or alteration of the Standing Order, nor have the promoters of the Bill asked for any relief from it. In the year 1872 the Corporation of Bury found it necessary to become the owners of the water works so that they might supply the town of Bury with water. They took upon themselves a burden of £590,000, and they found themselves required not only to find water for the town of Bury, but for the outlying districts, which are greater than Bury itself. The whole burden of the expenditure fell upon Bury ratepayers alone. They were under the impression that the debt they contracted was to be paid off in 100 years; they would not, and could not, have undertaken to pay it off in less. The Standing Order did not come into existence until 1882, and it must be borne in mind that before 1882 100 years was not an unusual period to fix for the payment of money borrowed for water purposes. My constituents accepted the burden, and went on performing what they believed to be their duty. In 1885 they came to Parliament for another Bill, and the penalty was imposed upon them that within 44 years of that time they should pay off the debt. What has been the result? The inhabitants of Bury are now paying the enormous sum of 11d. in the £1 for this sinking fund alone, and, with one exception, I believe there is no town in the kingdom which pays more than 2½d. In Birmingham, the figure is only ½d., but the average is, I believe, 1½d. Yet Bury is paying 11d., and is paying it for a supply of water, four-sevenths of which is supplied outside the borough to non-ratepayers. The outlying districts pay nothing towards the sinking fund, but the people of Bury are compelled to pay the whole. The Chairman of Ways and Means says that the Bill contains two clauses, which have nothing to do with the rest of the Bill. He is entirely in error. Bury is compelled to provide an additional supply of water for manufacturing as well as household purposes, and it was only when they found themselves compelled to borrow a sum of £130,000 that they came to this House to ask for relief. When they borrowed in 1872 they did not know that they would be compelled to pay the money in less than 100 years, and if the right hon. Gentleman the Chairman of Committees succeeds in carrying his proposition, the result will be that either the manufacturers or the poor people will be deprived of the supply of water which they absolutely require. No other town in England approaches Bury in the heavy burden it has to bear for its water supply. Two years ago the town of Sheffield came to this House and obtained the concession for which Bury now asks, yet the case of Sheffield was not one half as strong; the concession was granted because Sheffield was maintaining works greater than the requirements of the town demanded. Sheffield asked for 90 years. We are only asking for 80—62 years from the present time. The Chairman of Ways and Means made a protest in the case of Sheffield; but he did not ask the Committee to reject the conclusion the Committee had arrived at. Yet he asks the House to reject the conclusion which the Committee have come to in the case of Bury. I appeal to the right hon. Gentleman to take the same course as that which he took in 1887, and to support the Report of the Committee, in consequence of the special circumstances of the case. I presume that the Standing Order represents a principle, but there are exceptional circumstances in this case to which the Standing Order ought not to apply. If this Bill is not passed, it will be impossible to continue the sanitary arrangements which are essential for the well-being of the town. I therefore earnestly entreat the House to allow this concession to be made to the town of Bury.

SIR J. PULESTON (Devonport): As Chairman of the Committee by whom this Bill was considered, I wish to say that the peculiar circumstances of the measure have been succinctly stated by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bury (Sir H. James). The Chairman of Ways and Means has to some extent disavowed his action in connection with the Corporation of Sheffield.

MR. COURTNEY: No.

SIR J. PULESTON: At any rate he has asserted that it ought not to be a precedent; but the Committee could not ignore what had taken place in reference to Sheffield. We discussed the question of Bury strictly on its own merits, and if the Chairman of Ways and Means had sat upon the Committee and heard the whole of the evidence, I am sure he would have concurred in what was, in fact, the unanimous view of the Committee. The right hon. Gentleman has repudiated the idea of interpreting the Standing Order as applying to existing debts, but the President of the Local Government Board distinctly stated that the Standing Order of 1882 did not apply to pre-existing debts. We also took into consideration the very important fact that the Bury Corporation came to Parliament for other powers quite distinct from the original powers of the Bury Improvement Act, which have resulted in the onerous charge of an elevenpenny rate. Such a water rate as that is unknown, I believe, in any other community. If this Bill passes, the inhabitants of Bury will have to pay a rate of 2½d., which was, I believe, the sum against which the people of Sheffield protested. The Committee passed the Bill without the least hesitation, and they carefully considered the exact meaning of the Standing Order. I do not agree with the Chairman of Ways and Means in the interpretation he has placed upon the Standing Order, but I agree in the view of the President of the Local Government Board, that loans contracted before the Standing Order came into existence in 1882 do not come within the Standing Order. The Standing Order refers to loans under the Bill, but this is not in any sense a loan under the Bill. The Chairman of Ways and Means says that we ought to have come to the House and asked for permission to disobey the Standing Order, but we did not consider that that was necessary, as we were not infringing the Standing Order. In view of the lateness of the period of the Session and the urgency of the question, we did not think that that was at all practicable. I trust that the House will not refuse to adopt the Report of the Committee. The Chairman of Ways and Means has admitted that the case of Bury is exceptional, seeing that he himself has proposed to set aside the Standing Order by giving 70 years instead of 60. The Committee had evidence that it is impossible to carry on the much needed sanitary reforms in Bury, owing to this grievous burden of 11d. in the £1.

*MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): The question before the House is one of the very highest importance. When the Sheffield Water Bill was under consideration two years ago, I entered my protest against it because I am of opinion that the question of the increase of local debt is one of the most serious which this country has to consider. The wisdom of this House has settled the period for the repayment of debt at 60 years, and it is a decision which ought not lightly to be departed from. There are two points which arise in this Debate. First, does this case come within the operation of the Standing Order? I understand both the right hon. and learned Member for Bury and the Chairman of Ways and Means to allege that it does not come within the prohibitory words of the Standing Order. The hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir J. Puleston) says that the Standing Order does not provide for a pre-existing debt, but surely every debt is pre-existing, and the word 'debt' has no meaning at all if it is to be read in the sense in which the hon. Gentleman puts it. The right hon. and learned Member for Bury contends that the Standing Order does not apply because the Bill does not provide the works, but the debt was incurred in 1872 when the Corporation took over the works. The House is now asked to repeal an Act which was accepted by the Corporation of Bury in 1885.

SIR H. JAMES: The decision of the Committee was to that effect.

*MR. BRADLAUGH: The Bury Corporation could have dropped the Bill.

SIR H. JAMES: They were obliged to go on with the Bill because it contained other things.

Sir J. Puleston

*MR. BRADLAUGH: Then, for the sake of getting higher benefits they decided to go on with it?

SIR H. JAMES: For the sake of performing a higher duty.

*MR. BRADLAUGH: I presume that all these Bills are introduced for the sake of performing a higher duty, and if it be possible to create a debt which is to be spread over an enormous period, there will be no indisposition to create it, because the burden will fall lightly on the generation which creates it. The Corporation of Bury saw fit in 1885 for benefits received to agree to a term of 55 years for the repayment of the debt—12 years having lapsed and 43 years to come. Under these circumstances I ask the House not to create another bad precedent but to insist upon the observance of the Standing Order. We are told that the outlying people take the water. I presume they pay for it.

SIR H. JAMES: The ratepayers pay in addition a rate of 11d. in the £1.

*MR. BRADLAUGH: But the water is surely not given to the outlying districts at a loss?

SIR H. JAMES: Yes, it is.

*MR. BRADLAUGH: Then all I can say is that Bury for some purposes of its own must have seen fit to supply these outlying districts with water.

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): I listened with great attention to the speech of the Chairman of Ways and Means, and I think the House is under great obligations to the right hon. Gentleman for bringing under its notice such cases as the one now before us. In my opinion the Committee to whom the Bill was referred undoubtedly departed from the spirit if not the letter of the Standing Order. My right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Bury did not deal with the case fully. He simply contended that there are peculiar circumstances in the case of Bury. That may be good ground why the House should show some regard for the circumstances of Bury, but I do not think it was sufficient to justify the Committee to whom the Bill was referred, in going, as I think they did, outside their powers and entirely disregarding a Standing Order of the House, which says that no longer period than 60 years shall be allowed for the repayment of a loan. My hon. Friend behind me (Sir J. Puleston) spoke of the case of Sheffield, and seemed to think that because the Standing Order was broken in that particular case, it might properly be broken in this case also. He even went further, and justified the breaking of the Standing Order.

SIR J. PULESTON: On the contrary, I said that I did not think we were breaking the Standing Order.

MR. RITCHIE: My hon. Friend contended that in a certain sense the breaking of the Standing Order might tend to strengthen it. Now, I attach very much value to this Standing Order, and I think it would be a misfortune if the House were to regard with equanimity the setting aside the regulations which the House itself has made for safeguarding the interests of future ratepayers. The Local Government Board are constantly met by pleas such as that which has been put forward by my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Bury. I have had again and again to consider applications from Local Bodies for an extension of time, but it is our duty to protect the ratepayers of the future against the ratepayers of the present. There is hardly a case where a plea is made where special circumstances are not brought before the Local Government Board, which, in the opinion of the persons who press them, would not justify the Board in departing from the healthy principle of not allowing too long a time for repayment. In this case it is for the House to consider whether the circumstances are such as to call upon us to adopt the suggestion of the Chairman of Ways and Means, or, in distinct terms, to express our concurrence in the view of the Committee. If the Chairman of Ways and Means considers it his duty to persevere with the Motion he has placed on the Paper, I for one shall not complain of his action. But I think he has shown that in his opinion there is something to be said for the case of Bury, which, if the Committee are properly instructed, may bring it to consideration, and that 70 years may be given. There is one ground to which some weight may be attached, and it is that these works were undoubtedly authorised before the passing of the Standing Order. I certainly think that that is a ground for an appeal to the House in this case. The hon. Member for Devonport (Sir J. Puleston) has implied that I laid it down as a principle in the Sheffield case that the Standing Order ought not to apply to works which had been previously authorised. I did nothing of the kind. What I did say was that no such case had been presented since the Standing Order had been passed, and that it was to prevent such things being done in the future that the Standing Order was passed. That language hardly bears the interpretation put upon it by my hon. Friend considering the fact that these works were undoubtedly authorised prior to the passing of the Standing Order, and that the Corporation were under the belief that they had been allowed 100 years for repayment of the debt—that not being an unusual period at that particular time—it is a matter for consideration whether the House will not be willing to allow the Bill to go on. If it does, I think it ought to record in the strongest manner its opinion that this is contrary to the spirit of the Standing Order, and it should do so in such terms as would distinctly prevent a precedent from being established. I would therefore suggest the adoption of a Resolution to this effect—

“ That this House is of opinion that the term proposed for the repayment of money borrowed by the Corporation of Bury is contrary to the spirit of the Standing Order 173<sup>a</sup>, but having regard to the fact that the works were authorised before the passing of the Standing Order this House orders that the Bill be taken into consideration to-morrow.”

MR. HOYLE (Lancashire, South-East Heywood): As it is proposed to make the term 70 years instead of 60, I think we may regard the Standing Order as being out of the way, and may consider the question on its merits. The Corporation of Bury are comparatively a new body, and they are engaged in carrying on these works under circumstances of exceptional difficulty. Bury is situated on the Irwell, and there are brick works, dye works, and other works which cast their refuse into the open river with open drains without deodorisers, emptying themselves into the Irwell. I am afraid that the last generation were so intent upon the development of trade that they paid but little attention to the health of the people, and the consequence is that the Corporation of Bury have to do the work which the last generation should have done. The Corporation of Bury have incurred serious financial responsibilities, and when they came to Parliament in 1872 they understood that the capital sum was to be paid back in 100 years. They only ask the House now to confirm the decision of two Committees by making the term 80 instead of 100 years. They are simply endeavouring to secure the health of the people of Bury, many of whom are very poor, and if this rate of 11d. in the £1 is to remain, it will undoubtedly press most heavily on persons of small means whose life is one of continuous toil. The leading inhabitants of Bury have subscribed handsomely to recreation grounds, but if the House refuses the relief now asked for it will be thought that the burden thrown upon the people is too heavy for them to bear, and in future voluntary efforts will be abandoned. I, therefore, ask the House to reject the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman the Chairman of Ways and Means.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): The action of the right hon. and learned Member for Bury is quite natural, but I heard with some surprise the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Chairman of Ways and Means, and that of the President of the Local Government Board. Those speeches indicated to me an alacrity in breaking the Standing Order in the case of an English Corporation, represented by an influential Member of this House; and I cannot help contrasting the course now taken with that which was taken in regard to the Corporation of Dublin, whose case presented a remarkable analogy with that of Bury. The works in regard to which the Corporation of Dublin asked for relief were authorised and executed before the Standing Order was passed; a debt considerably larger than that of the Corporation of Bury was entailed. As in the case of Bury, large outlying districts were supplied with water; it is paid for at an unremunerative rate, and the outlying townships contribute nothing to the sinking fund and nothing to the debt. Yet, when the Corporation came to this House this year for the re-arrangement of debt, they found themselves faced by officials who compelled them to cut down the period for the repayment of the debt to 55 years. The Corporation of Bury are to be allowed 70 years. I say frankly that 60 years for waterworks is too short a period, especially when we consider that in the case of many English Corporations from 70 to 100 years have been sanctioned. Therefore, considering the circumstances of Bury, that it does supply the outlying districts, and that those outlying districts contribute nothing towards the rates of Bury, I think that Bury has made out an excellent case for special treatment. Although I complain very much of the treatment of the Corporation of Dublin, I hope that my attitude on this question will secure better treatment for Ireland in the future.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): I think that the Irish Members are entitled to have some explanation from the Chairman of Ways and Means why Bury is to be treated better than Dublin. The object of my question is to find out why Dublin should be treated badly and Bury generously.

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The question of Bury is now before the House, and it has nothing to do with the case of Dublin.

MR. CHANCE: Then I return to my original question why Bury should be treated better than Dublin, and unless I obtain some information upon the subject I shall feel it my duty to divide the House.

MR. O'DOHERTY (Donegal, N.): I presume that the Standing Order is still in existence, and that the Committee which sat upon this Bill have broken it. Why did they break it, and why should the House, in the face of its having been broken, be called upon to pass this Bill?

SIR J. PULESTON: The Committee contend that they have not broken the Standing Order.

MR. O'DOHERTY: I am quite aware of that.

SIR J. PULESTON: We say so in our Report.

MR. O'DOHERTY: I believe, and the House believes, that the Standing Order has been broken, as it was in the case of Sheffield. For my own part I see no reason for departing from the Standing Order.

MR. COURTNEY: I have no right to address the House again, but I may perhaps be allowed to say a word in explanation. I wish to say that I am entirely in the hands of the House. If it is desired that I should withdraw my Resolution and adopt the suggestion of the President of the Board of Trade I am ready to do so, and will ask leave to withdraw the Motion. [Cries of "No."] I cannot do so without the assent of the House, and if that assent is refused I will certainly divide the House.

The House divided:—Ayes 178 ;
Noes 60.—(Div. List, No. 294.)

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read the third time, and passed, without Amendment.

METROPOLITAN POSTMEN.

COLONEL HUGHES (Woolwich): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether postmen at Woolwich receive 4s. a week less than the postmen in any other part of the Metropolis, although working the same hours; whether a memorial on this subject was presented to the Post Office Authorities two and a half years ago; when is an answer likely to be received; and, who is responsible for the delay?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL RAIKES, Cambridge University): (Mr. No, Sir. It is not the case that the Woolwich postmen are paid 4s. a week less than postmen in London. On the contrary, there are a good many London postmen whose wages are less than those received at Woolwich. Woolwich is not in the Metropolitan District for postal purposes. The memorial from the Woolwich men was duly received; but as I informed my hon. Friend early in the year, the question of making a change there depended on the settlement of the general rates for postmen's wages throughout the Metropolitan District, which has only recently been completed, and will shortly be submitted to the Treasury.
